British sovereignty over the whole of the vast region which had belonged to or been claimed by France having been thus secured, it became the duty of the advisers of King George III. to consider what government or governments should be established in the territories so acquired ; and the Lords of Trade (a name then usually given to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations) first turned their attention to Labrador. On March 15, 1763, in reporting to the King upon the steps proper to be taken for the protection of the fisheries upon the coasts of Newfoundland and in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence, they observed that "upon the coast of Labrador it will be impossible to prevent the French continuing to have the full benefit of their former commerce with the Indians of that coast unless some British settlement should be made there, or sufficient cruisers stationed with instructions to the Commanders to seize all French ships coming within a certain distance of that coast." Shortly after receiving this report the Secretary of State (Lord Egremont) caused a letter to be written to the Hudson's Bay Company, whose territory extended to the entrance of Hudson Straits at the extreme northern end of the peninsula of Labrador, expressing his desire to know as soon as possible "what were the limits upon the coast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the coast of Labrador" ; and on the morning of March 24 Sir William Baker, the Governor of the Company, waited on the Secretary of State and had an interview with him. Immediately after this interview—namely, on March 24—the Secretary of State wrote a letter to the Lords of Trade informing them that the King had "judged it proper that all the coasts of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Straits to the River of St. John's, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the island of Anticosti, including that island with any other small islands on the said coast of Labrador, and also the islands of Madelaine in the gulf of St. Lawrence, should be included in the government of Newfoundland," and requesting them to prepare for the King's approval the draft of a new commission for Captain Thomas Graves (who was then Governor of Newfoundland) to be "Governor of the island of Newfoundland and of the coast of Labrador with the several islands as above described," and revised instructions for the Governor's guidance. Drafts were accordingly prepared, and on March 30 both drafts were submitted to the King in Council and approved for issue in regular form. On April 25 the revised commission was duly sealed and the revised instructions signed by the King ; and, armed with these documents, and also with separate Admiralty instructions issued to him as Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's ships on the Newfoundland station, Captain Graves sailed on May 2 to take up his duties.

By the commission as passed under the Great Seal on April 25, 1763, in accordance with the Order in Council of March 30, King George III. revoked the former commission (dated May 29, 1761) by which Captain Graves had been appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the island of Newfoundland and constituted and appointed him to be the King's "Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over our said island of Newfoundland and all the coasts of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Straits to the river St. John's, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the island of Anticosti, including that island with any other small islands on the said coast of Labrador and also the islands of Madelaine in the gulf of St. Lawrence, as also of all our forts and garrisons erected and established or that shall be erected and established in our said islands of Newfoundland, Anticosti and Madelaine, or on the coast of Labrador within the limits aforesaid," and required him to conform to the instructions given or to be given to him. By the same document power was given to the Governor to administer the oath of allegiance to all persons who should at any time "pass into our said islands or shall be resident or abiding there or upon the coasts of Labrador within the limits aforesaid"; to constitute and appoint judges and justices of the peace for the administration of justice and keeping the peace and quiet of "the said islands and coasts," with power to hold quarter sessions and adjourn the same as might be convenient "for the peace and welfare of our subjects inhabiting there"; and to erect and set apart court-houses for such justices of the peace and prisons for the keeping of offenders. The commission required all officers, civil and military, "and all other inhabitants of our said islands and the coasts and territories of Labrador and islands adjacent thereto or dependent thereupon within the limits aforesaid," to be obedient, aiding and assisting to the Governor in the execution of the commission.

By the instructions to Captain Graves, as passed under the Royal Sign Manual in accordance with the same Order in Council, the Governor was directed (among other things) to use his best endeavours to prevent aliens or strangers from fishing or drying fish "on any of the coasts or in any of the harbours of the islands and territories under your government" except as allowed by the 13th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht and the 5th Article of the Treaty of Paris; to visit all "the coasts and harbours of the said islands and territories under your government" in order to inspect and examine the state of the fisheries carried on there; to endeavour to procure accurate maps of "the several harbours, bays and coasts of Newfoundland and the other islands and territories under your government," and in particular to cause a vessel under his command to "search and explore the great inlet commonly known by the name of Davis' inlet, in order to discover whether the same has or has not any passage to Hudson's Bay, or any other enclosed sea." The instructions also required the Governor to inquire and report "whether any or what further establishment may be necessary to be made or forts erected in any part of Newfoundland or the other islands or territories under your government either for the protection of the fishery, the security of the country, or the establishing and carrying on a commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said islands or inhabiting the coast of Labrador."

It is worthy of notice that in these two documents, which are of primary importance for the purposes of this inquiry, no distinction was made between the island of Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador, both being included in identical terms in the territories placed under the care of the Governor, and the powers applicable to one being equally applicable to the other.

The business relating to Captain Graves's command having been thus disposed of, Lord Egremont turned his attention to the ceded territory in general, and by a letter dated May 5, 1763, requested the Lords of Trade to consider and report upon a number of questions relating to that territory, including the question what new governments should be established and what form should be adopted for such new governments. In the same letter he called attention to the desirability of conciliating the Indians in the "Indian country" by protecting their persons and property and securing to them the rights and privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed. The Lords of Trade replied by an elaborate report dated June 8, 1763, in which, after setting out the advantages which, in consequence of the cession of French Canada, would accrue to the fishing and fur trades and the planting and settlement of North America, they recommended that three new governments should be erected under the names of Canada, East Florida, and West Florida, with certain boundaries indicated in the report, and that certain lands outside those limits—described in the report as "all the lands lying about the Great Lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the river St. Lawrence from the north"—should be left as Indian country, open to trade, but not to grants or settlements. After some discussion as to the boundaries of the proposed new government of Canada (which it was decided to call Quebec), the King agreed to the proposals of the Lords of Trade with the addition of a provision that the "interior country" to be reserved for the use of the Indians should be placed under the control of a military commander-in-chief. A draft Proclamation for giving effect to this decision was accordingly prepared by the Lords of Trade, and was approved for issue at a meeting of the Privy Council held on October 5.

By this Proclamation, which was dated October 7, 1763, the King declared that he had, with the advice of his Privy Council, granted letters patent under the Great Seal to erect within the countries and islands ceded and confirmed to him by the Treaty of Paris, four distinct and separate governments styled and called by the names of Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada. The limits and boundaries of these governments were defined by the Proclamation, those of the government of Quebec being described as follows:—

"Firstly.—The Government of Quebec, bounded on the Labrador Coast by the river St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river, through the Lake St. John, to the south end of the Lake Nipissim; from whence the said line, crossing the river St. Lawrence, and the lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of north latitude, passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea; and also along the north coast of the Baye des Chaleurs, and the coast of the gulph of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres, and from thence crossing the mouth of the river St. Lawrence by the west end of the Island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid river St. John."

After defining the boundaries of the three other new governments, the Proclamation proceeded:—

"And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast, from the river St. John's to Hudson's Streights, together with the islands of Anticosti and the Madelaine and all other smaller islands lying upon the said coast, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland."

The Proclamation also contained the following further declarations:—

"And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting-grounds ; we do therefore, with the advice of our Privy Council, declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our colonies of Quebec, East Florida, or West Florida, do presume upon any pretence whatever to grant warrants of survey, or pass any patents for lands beyond the bounds of their respective governments as described in their commissions ; as also that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our other colonies or plantations in America do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and north-west, or upon any lands whatever which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians or any of them.

"And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ; as also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west as aforesaid ; and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our especial leave and licence for that purpose first obtained."

It is to be noted that this Proclamation, although sometimes referred to in the later documents as if it were the origin of the title of Newfoundland to its territory in Labrador, was in fact only declaratory of an annexation which had already been effected by the commission approved by the Order in Council of March 30 and issued to Captain Graves ; and it is plain that the statement in the Proclamation that the coast of Labrador had been placed "under the care and inspection" of the Governor of Newfoundland was not intended to take anything from the rights conferred upon the Governor by his commission. In the commissions issued to the Governors of Newfoundland who succeeded Captain Graves the language of the original commission was retained unaltered.

The annexation to Newfoundland of the southern coast of Labrador bordering on the gulf of St. Lawrence soon led to difficulties. It had been the policy of the British Government not to encourage planting and settling in Newfoundland or to establish a form of civil government there, but rather to treat the island as a base to which fishing vessels should proceed in each season and which they might use for drying and curing their fish and for other purposes connected with the fishing industry ; and, in pursuance of that policy, it had been the practice to appoint as Governor a naval officer who was also charged, under instructions issued by the Admiralty, with the protection of the free fishing rights of British subjects, such local administration as was required being entrusted to "Admirals of harbours," who were in fact masters of fishing vessels selected in the order of their arrival in the island harbours. Indeed, the Newfoundland of that day was sometimes spoken of as resembling a great ship provisioned and fitted out by the Mother Country, and moored off the American continent for the convenience of English fishermen, and its government as a "floating government." When the Labrador coast was added to Newfoundland, the same policy was applied to that coast ; and Hugh Palliser, who in 1764 was appointed to succeed Captain Graves as Governor of Newfoundland and the coasts of Labrador, applied that policy to the added territory, including the northern shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence. He forbade all persons from Quebec or any of the colonies to winter on the coasts of Labrador under his government ; and ultimately, by a regulation dated August 28, 1765, he went so far as to order that no person whatever should resort to Labrador to fish or trade except ship fishers annually arriving from his Majesty's Dominions in Europe and carrying men engaged to return to those Dominions after the season was over. These restrictions led to serious complaints from the "sedentary fishermen," mostly of French nationality, who had long been settled on the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence and had been engaged in the seal and salmon fishery there, and some of whom had received grants of land from the French Government ; and early in the year 1766 these settlers and some Quebec traders presented memorials to the Lords of Trade praying to be reinstated in their rights and possessions. These memorials were taken into consideration, and after a considerable correspondence with Governor Palliser (against whom some of the complainants brought an action at law in London) the Lords of Trade, by reports dated June 24, 1772, and March 2, 1773, recommended that the part of the coast of Labrador between the river St. John and the Ance des Espagnols or Baie Phillippeaux, near the straits of Belle Isle—being the part of Labrador with which the settlers and traders were concerned—should be taken from the Government of Newfoundland and restored to its dependence on the Government of Quebec. This proposal was apparently approved by the King's advisers, and on April 22, 1773, an Order in Council was passed for the preparation of the instruments necessary for carrying it into effect ; but it was ultimately determined that the matter should be dealt with by a provision to be inserted in the Bill for the Quebec Act of 1774, which was then under consideration. In the course of the preparation of that Bill the proposal made by the Lords of Trade was enlarged so as to provide for the transfer to the province of Quebec not only of the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to the Ance des Espagnols, but of the whole of the territory in Labrador which had been annexed to Newfoundland. The clauses of the Bill relating to Newfoundland were strenuously opposed by Mr. Edmund Burke, Admiral Saunders, and others, but were ultimately carried into law. Accordingly, by the British North America (Quebec) Act, 1774, after reciting (among other things) that by the arrangement made by the Proclamation of 1763 "certain parts of the territory of Canada where sedentary fisheries had been established and carried on by the subjects of France, inhabitants of the said Province of Canada, under grants and concessions from the Government thereof were annexed to the Government of Newfoundland and thereby subjected to regulations inconsistent with the nature of such fisheries," it was enacted that the territories therein described and also "all such territories, islands and countries which have since the 10th February, 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland" be annexed to and made part of the province of Quebec as created and established by the Proclamation of October 7, 1763.

Soon after the passing of this Act it became apparent that, in transferring to the Government of Quebec not only the parts of Labrador where the "sedentary fishery" for seal, seal-cow, and salmon had been carried on, but also those parts facing towards the Atlantic where the great cod and whale fisheries had flourished, a serious blunder had been committed. Complaints were made that the Government of Quebec paid no attention whatever to the cod fisheries on the Atlantic coast, and that "in truth there was no government whatsoever on that coast"; and, ultimately, by the Newfoundland Act, 1809, section 14, it was enacted:—

"That such parts of the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to Hudson's Streights, and the said Island of Anticosti and all other smaller islands so annexed to the Government of Newfoundland by the said Proclamation of the seventh day of October One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three (except the said islands of Madelaine), shall be separated from the said Government of Lower Canada and be again re-annexed to the Government of Newfoundland; any thing in the said Act passed in the Thirty-first Year of His present Majesty's Reign, or any other Act, to the contrary notwithstanding."

It would seem that, in so restoring to Newfoundland the whole of the coast of Labrador originally annexed to that government, Parliament omitted to have regard to the position of the sedentary fishermen in the gulf of St. Lawrence which had given rise to so many complaints before the passing of the Act of 1774; and, as might have been expected, these complaints were soon renewed, with the result that in the year 1825 effect was at last given to the counsel tendered by the Lords of Trade in 1773. By the British North America (Seignorial Rights) Act, 1825, section 9, after reciting that under and by virtue of the Acts of 1774 and 1809 the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to Hudson's Strait and the islands above referred to were "annexed to and form part of the Government of Newfoundland," and that it was expedient that "certain parts of the said coast of Labrador should be re-annexed to and form part of the province of Lower Canada," it was enacted:—

"That so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon, inclusive, as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, with the island of Anticosti and all other islands adjacent to such part as last aforesaid of the coast of Labrador, shall be and the same are hereby re-annexed to and made a part of the said province of Lower Canada, and shall henceforward be subject to the laws of the said province and to none other." The bay or harbour of Ance Sablon referred to in this section lies a little to the east of the Ance des Espagnols or Phillippeaux Bay.

The statute of 1825 is the last of the documents directly affecting the annexation to Newfoundland of a part of Labrador; but it may be here mentioned that by an Act passed in the year 1840 the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, into which Quebec had been divided in the year 1791, were united to form one province of Canada; that in the year 1854 Newfoundland, in which a representative Government had been established in 1832, became a responsible self-governing colony; that by the British North America Act, 1867, the Dominion of Canada was set up, Lower Canada becoming the province of Quebec; and that by an Order in Council made in 1880 it was ordered and declared that:—

"From and after the first day of September, 1880, all British territories and possessions in North America not already included within the Dominion of Canada, and all islands adjacent to any of such territories or possessions, shall (with the exception of the Colony of Newfoundland and its dependencies) become and be annexed to and form part of the said Dominion of Canada, and become and be subject to the laws for the time being in force in the said Dominion in so far as such laws may be applicable thereto."

Thus either by the statutes already cited or by the last-mentioned Order in Council, the Dominion of Canada, and particularly its province of Quebec, has become the next neighbour to the dependencies in Labrador of the colony of Newfoundland, and the question of boundary falls to be determined as between the Dominion and the colony.

At this point it is desirable to set out the contentions of the two parties. The contention of the Dominion is that the "coast" which by the commission and Proclamation of 1763, as modified by the subsequent statutes, was annexed to Newfoundland, is

"a strip of maritime territory, extending from Cape Chidley at the entrance to Hudson Strait, to the eastern headland of the bay or harbour of Blanc Sablon on the Strait of Belle Isle, and comprising, in its depth inland, only so much of the land immediately abutting on the sea, above low-water mark, as was accessible and useful to the British fishermen annually resorting to that coast in the ordinary conduct of their fishing operations, for the purposes of 'the open and free fishery' extended to that coast by the Royal Proclamation and carried on there and for those purposes only";

but, recognizing that it may be found impracticable to lay down such a line upon the land, Canada suggests "that the boundary be located as a line to be drawn from the eastern headland of the bay or harbour of Blanc Sablon on the south to Cape Chidley on the north at a distance from high-water mark on the seacoast of the peninsula of Labrador of one mile."

On the other hand, the contention of the colony of Newfoundland is that the boundary should be "a line drawn due north from Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, and should be traced from thence northwards to Cape Chidley along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean."

In order to make the matter clear, a sketch-map illustrating the two claims is annexed. On this map the territory proposed by the Dominion as the land to be allotted to Newfoundland is indicated by a thick black line following the line of the seashore, while the boundary claimed by the colony is marked by a broken line with a hatching over it.

It may be added that the colony contends that, in the event of the Dominion establishing its main contention, the littoral strip of land which would then represent the territory annexed to Newfoundland should not cross the mouth of the great Hamilton Inlet as shown on the sketch-map, but should be carried along the northern shore of that inlet and round the head of Goose Bay and so back along the southern shore of the inlet to the seacoast.

Before examining these claims in detail, their Lordships think it desirable to formulate two propositions which appear to be common to both sides, and which indeed are beyond dispute.

First, the word "coast" or "coasts" (for both are used in the documents) is a word of undefined meaning; and while it is usually to be understood in the sense which is given to it in Dr. Johnson's and other dictionaries, that is to say, as meaning "the edge or margin of the land next the sea" or "shore," there are many examples of its being used to denote a considerable tract of land bounded by and looking towards the sea. In Murray's Oxford Dictionary (1891) it is stated that the term "is familiarly applied in different regions to specific littoral districts, in India especially to the Coromandel coast"; and in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" (12th edition, 1922) that "the word is sometimes applied to the bank of a river or lake and sometimes to a region (cf., Gold Coast, Coromandel Coast), which may include the hinterland." In the appendix of documents used in this inquiry a number of extracts are given from the Old and New Testaments and from well-known authors, in which the word "coast" is used as signifying a whole country, sometimes extending from the sea to the sources of the rivers running into it; and it is plain that the word is susceptible of more constructions than one, and that its precise meaning must depend on the subject and context.

The second proposition which appears to be beyond dispute in this case is that the effect of the Orders in Council, Proclamation, and statutes which have to be construed was to give to the Government of Newfoundland not mere rights of inspection and regulation exercisable upon a line of shore, but territory which became as much a part of the colony as the island of Newfoundland itself, and which was capable of being defined by metes and bounds. This is evident from the form of the commissions issued to Captain Graves and his successors, by which they were appointed Governors of the island of Newfoundland and of the coast of Labrador in identical terms, and, indeed, in one and the same sentence, and in which reference is again and again made to the "territory" of Labrador comprised in the commission. If there remained any doubt upon this point, it would be set at rest by the language of the statutes of 1774, 1809, and 1825, which refer to the territory in Labrador as being "annexed" first to the Government of Newfoundland and then to the Government of Quebec, and afterwards as being "re-annexed" to Newfoundland and partly "re-annexed" to Lower Canada. Stress was laid by counsel for Canada on the declaration in the Proclamation of 1763 that the Labrador coast had been put under the "care and inspection" of the Government of Newfoundland; but this ambiguous expression cannot affect the plain inference to be drawn from the other documents cited that what was added to Newfoundland was a tract of land, having a boundary which can be located and defined. Indeed, this is assumed by the terms of reference to this Board, to which the parties have agreed.

In these circumstances the question to be determined is, not whether Newfoundland possesses territory upon the peninsula of Labrador, but what is the inland boundary of that territory. Is it to be defined by a line following the sinuosities of the shore at a distance of one mile or thereabouts from high-water mark, or is it to be found at the watershed of the rivers falling into the sea on that shore? No third alternative has been suggested by any person.

When the material documents are considered from this point of view, it is evident that they contain much which supports the contention that the word "coast" is to be construed as including a considerable area of land. The commissions issued to Captain Graves and his successors until 1774 refer to the "territories" of Labrador and to the planters or inhabitants resident there, and they authorize the Governor to appoint judges and justices of the peace for keeping the peace of the coasts and for holding quarter sessions at places convenient to the inhabitants. The instructions issued during the same period direct the Governor to erect upon the "coast" court houses for the trial of offenders and prisons for their detention; and it is plain that a criminal jurisdiction limited to a narrow coastal strip, so that offences committed beyond that limit would not be justiciable and offenders escaping from it could not be apprehended, would be very difficult to exercise. Further, the same instructions require the Governor to report, not only as to the protection of the fishery, but also as to the security of the country and the establishing and carrying on of commerce with the Indians inhabiting the coasts of Labrador; and the directions for protecting the timber from waste and for reporting as to the number of the inhabitants and of the furs taken by them and the improvement of the land, which apply to Labrador as well as to the Island, are appropriate to a government extending into the interior.

With regard to the limit in depth of the country which may be described as "coast," where that term is used in the wider sense, it is argued that the natural limit is to be found (in the absence of special circumstances) in the watershed which is the source of the rivers falling into the sea at that place; and there is much to be said in favour of that view. It is consistent with the doctrine of international law by which the occupation of a sea-coast carries with it a right to the whole territory drained by the rivers which empty their water into its line (see Hall's International Law, 5th edition, page 104; Westlake's International Law, Part 1, page 112; and Lawrence's Principles of International Law, 3rd edition, page 151), and it is certainly difficult, in the absence of any specified boundary or of any special feature (such as a political frontier), which could be taken as a boundary, to suggest any point between the seashore and the watershed at which a line could be drawn.

Further, the use of the watershed or "height of land" as a boundary was undoubtedly familiar in British North America at the period in question, and it is shown as a boundary in many of the maps of that time. Thus, in some of the pre-annexation maps of French Canada which have been produced (Sanson 1656, Coronelli 1689, and Mortier 1693), the watershed running westward from Cape Charles is shown as the boundary between Labrador (or Nouvelle Bretagne) and Nouvelle France. In Bowen's map of 1763 the southern boundary of Labrador appears to run along the fifty-second north parellel of latitude, roughly corresponding with the same line of watershed; and the same feature is reproduced in Rocque's map of about the same date. In Bellin's map of 1755 the "hauteur des terres" is indicated as the boundary between the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company and the territory (then in French ownership) of Labrador or Nouvelle Bretagne; and the same observation applies to Gibson's map of 1763. In the Proclamation of 1763 the province of Quebec thereby constituted was defined as bounded on the south by "the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which flow into the sea." It may well be, therefore, that in allotting to Newfoundland the "coast" of Labrador the framers of the documents of 1763 had in mind as a boundary the "height of land" from which the rivers ran down to that shore—though without any accurate conception of the distance of that boundary from the sea.

The contention that the territory annexed to Newfoundland was intended to run back to the watershed is supported by the fact that in the Proclamation of 1763 the province of Quebec is described as bounded on the north by a line drawn from the head of the river St. John to the westward—a description which leads to the inference that the land on the east or left bank of the river St. John from its head to the sea had been already allotted to the Government of Newfoundland. It has been ascertained by recent surveys that the river St. John here mentioned does not in fact rise near the watershed, but at some point between the height of land and the sea; but it is plain from contemporary maps that the sources of the river Romaine, which rises at the watershed and runs parallel with the St. John, had been taken for the sources of the latter river, and that the eastern boundary of the new province of Quebec at this point was intended to follow the course of the river Romaine from the watershed to the sea.

A further argument for the adoption of the watershed as the boundary of Newfoundland-Labrador is based on the position at that time of the Hudson's Bay Company. That company had always claimed to be entitled under its charter to the land reaching to the watersheds from which the rivers ran into Ungava Bay, James Bay, and Hudson's Bay, and this claim was ultimately conceded by the British Government. Upon this footing the line of the watershed running from Cape Chidley southward was for a considerable distance the eastern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory, and so that watershed might for that distance form a political as well as a natural boundary for the "coast" of Labrador.

But perhaps the strongest argument in favour of an extended construction of the grant to Newfoundland is to be found in the terms of the Act of 1825 above quoted. By that statute, after a recital that it was expedient that "certain parts of the said coasts of Labrador should be re-annexed to and form part of the province of Lower Canada," it was enacted that "so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon inclusive as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude" should be re-annexed to and made part of that province. Now a line drawn due north and south from the bay of Ance Sablon to the fifty-second degree of north latitude would penetrate the interior of the country for a distance of about 40 miles, and the land to the westward of such a line would in some of its parts cover a distance of over 100 miles from the sea; and this being so, it would seem that the language of this enactment, construed in its plain and natural meaning, points directly to the inference that the expression "coasts of Labrador" as used in 1763 and 1809 was understood by Parliament in 1825 to have comprised the interior of the country back to those limits. It is suggested in the case for the Dominion that the line to be drawn north and south as far as the fifty-second degree was merely the draftsman's device for effecting the division of the coastal strip of one mile at Ance Sablon, and was probably intended to serve as a "boundary monument, as it were," for that purpose; but, having regard to the terms of the statute, their Lordships find great difficulty in accepting that construction.

While these arguments make a formidable case in favour of the contention of Newfoundland, it is obvious that the Canadian claim presents great difficulties. A grant of "so much of the land immediately abutting on the sea above low-water mark as was accessible and useful to the British fishermen annually resorting to the coast," even if expressly made in those terms, would have been so vague and indefinite as to be hardly capable of taking effect without some further and clearer definition. Under a grant in those or similar terms, would regard be had only to the needs of the fishermen resorting to the coast at the date of the grant, or would it be necessary to take into account the possibly greater needs of future generations of fishermen? And in case of doubt, upon whom would the duty fall of determining what extent of land was "accessible and useful" to the fishermen? The case for Canada admits that it may be found impracticable to lay down such a line upon the land, and suggests that, in order that neither party may suffer by reason of this difficulty, the boundary should be drawn along the coast at a distance of one mile from high-water mark; but their Lordships cannot think that in adopting such a proposal they would be performing the duty cast upon them by the terms of reference to determine the boundary "under the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations." In any case they could not regard the line proposed as accurately defining the territory accessible and useful for the fishery. Of the ribbon of land along the coast which it is proposed to concede to Newfoundland, a great part lies at the summit of high cliffs not accessible from the sea, and this part of the area proposed would be of no use to fishermen. On the other hand, in places where, owing to the existence of a sea beach or of an inlet, opportunities for landing are available, a limit of one mile would often be found insufficient. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, who has an unequalled knowledge of the country to which he has rendered such devoted service, states that he knows of no building in Labrador which is more than 250 yards above high-water mark, and that all nets are spread and fish dried within that distance from the sea; but his report makes it clear that, for the purpose of obtaining wood for repairs, an allowance of three miles on the average or five miles as a maximum would not be excessive. This view is confirmed by Minutes of the Executive Council of Newfoundland, from which it appears that it has been the practice in leasing the right to cut timber in the island to reserve a margin of three (or sometimes five) miles from the sea in the interest of the fishermen. Further, there are places where a broad peninsula is joined to the mainland by a neck not more than two miles in width, and in each of these instances the one-mile strip would meet in the neck of the peninsula and cut off by an interposed barrier of Newfoundland soil all access to the Canadian enclave on the broader part of the promontory. These considerations seem to show that on any view of the construction of the grant an allowance of one mile from high-water mark would be inadequate, and that any allowance of that kind which might be made would certainly be arbitrary and would probably be insufficient. Indeed, it may be doubted whether any person, noting upon the sketch-map the configuration of the coast as proposed by Canada to be defined, would conceive that the Crown can have intended to annex to Newfoundland an area of that shape and character, to refer to it as a "territory," and to establish a form of government there ; and if, as the Colony forcibly contends, the shores of the Great Hamilton Inlet must be treated as a part of the sea coast, so that the one-mile strip would pass up the northern shore of that inlet and round the head of Goose Bay and would then return along its southern shores, the fantastic character of the boundary proposed would become even more apparent. It is also to be observed that the effect of allotting to Newfoundland a continuous one-mile strip along the shore would be to seal off the hinterland up to the watershed from all contact with the shore, from which access to it would naturally be sought ; and it cannot be supposed that the statesmen of 1763 intended, while setting up a new form of government in the interior, to put that government entirely at the mercy as regards customs duties and otherwise of the Government of Newfoundland.

The principal arguments urged on behalf of the Dominion were based on the terms of the Proclamation of 1763, and particularly (1) on the declared purpose for which the government of the coast of Labrador was entrusted to Newfoundland ; and (2) on the provision made in the Proclamation for the Indians residing in the hinterland. It is true that the actual annexation of part of Labrador to Newfoundland was effected by the commission issued to Graves under the Order in Council of March 30, 1763, which was prior in date to the Proclamation of October 7 ; but the Proclamation is referred to in some of the statutes as a document of great importance, and no doubt regard must be had to its terms so far as they bear on the construction of the commission of the same year.

As to the purpose of the grant, great stress was laid on the declaration in the Proclamation that "to the end that the open and free fishery of [the King's] subjects might be extended to and be carried on upon the coast of Labrador and the adjacent islands," that coast with the islands has been put under the "care and inspection" of the Governor of Newfoundland. Attention was also called to a number of passages in letters and reports of about the same date, in which the control of the fishermen and the prevention of encroachments by the French were referred to as the principal objects to be attained. Having regard to these expressions, it was said the grant of the "coast" must be held to include only so much of the land as was accessible and useful to the fishermen resorting to that coast in the ordinary conduct of their fishing operations.

There is no doubt that the fisheries supplied the principal, if not the only, motive for the annexation of the coast of Labrador to Newfoundland. Labrador, like Newfoundland, was to be a base for fishing and a nursery of British seamen. But although this was the principal motive of the annexation, it does not follow that it was the measure of the grant. The free right to fish off the shores of Labrador, and the right of British fishermen to land there for the purpose of curing and drying their fish and repairing their ships and tackle, was already secured by statute or Order in Council ; and the instructions regularly given to the Admiral in command of the fleet provided for the protection of British subjects and the prevention of foreign intruders. What King George III. and his advisers desired was that there should be a government on the coast, with power to administer justice, to imprison offenders, to encourage trade, and to erect forts for the purpose of defence ; and it was for these purposes, which went beyond the regulation of the fisheries, that the coast of Labrador was subjected to the Government of Newfoundland on the same terms as the island of Newfoundland itself.

Further, the fishing industry would not have been fully provided for by the grant of jurisdiction over a narrow strip of land near the shore. In addition to the cod and the whale which were caught off the Atlantic coast, and to the seal and sea-cow which were found mainly in the gulf of St. Lawrence, the salmon and salmon-trout had to be considered. The salmon fisheries are mentioned in the instructions given to Captain Graves, and the special importance of those fisheries in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and in the rivers running into the gulf, is apparent from many references in the documents produced in evidence. The salmon fishery could only be fully protected by the grant of jurisdiction over the rivers and inland lakes as well as over the seashore ; and from this point of view the reference to the fisheries tends rather to extend than to limit the grant.

But it was pointed out that the Proclamation of 1763 contained a declaration (quoted above) reserving under the sovereignty, protection, and dominion of the King for the use of the Indians the lands and territories not included within the limits of the three new governments of Quebec, East Florida, and West Florida, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ; and it was argued that this reservation applied to the territory occupied by the Indian tribes who were settled between the Atlantic seaboard of Labrador and the watershed, and was evidence that this territory was not intended to be included in the "coast" granted to Newfoundland. The Indians living in this territory consisted of Nascopies, who lived north of the Hamilton River, and Montagnais, who ranged to the south of that river ; and if it were established that those tribes were intended to be included among the Indians in whose favour the reservation was made, the argument would undoubtedly have much force. But it does not appear to their Lordships to be made out that the declaration in question referred to the lands occupied by these two tribes. The reservation is confined to lands occupied by "the said Indians"—that is to say, those who are referred to in the next preceding paragraph of the Proclamation as nations or tribes of Indians with whom the King was connected and who lived under his protection ; and it appears from the report of the Lords of Trade, dated June 8, 1763, on which the Proclamation was based, that the Indians so described consisted of those tribes of the six nations who were settled round the Great Lakes or beyond the sources of the rivers which fell into the river St. Lawrence from the north. This description would not include Indians residing beyond the sources of the rivers which flow into the gulf of St. Lawrence or into the Atlantic. It is true that the exception of lands and territories included in the three new governments or the Hudson's Bay territory does not apply to lands in the "coast" annexed to Newfoundland ; but if the Indians in the "coast" territory were not included in "the said Indians," it was unnecessary to except them. Nor would the lands occupied by these Indians fall within the general description contained in the Proclamation as "lands and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west." Further, the Nascopies and Montagnais, so far as they had taken any part in the Anglo-French conflict, had sided with France, and they were not connected with or under the protection of the King before the cession of the French territory to him. The instructions given to Governor Graves in the earlier part of the same year had required him to report as to the establishing or carrying-on of a commerce with the Indians "inhabiting the coast of Labrador"—a direction which was repeated in the instructions to the Governors appointed immediately after the Proclamation, but which was omitted in those given after 1774, when Labrador was withdrawn from the government of Newfoundland; and such a direction would have been out of place if the Indians settled in Labrador had been altogether excluded from the Governor's jurisdiction. Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that this argument, although well deserving of consideration, is not well founded.

It is said that the territory claimed by Newfoundland is of great extent, being about twice the size of Newfoundland itself; and no doubt this is the case. But the territory in question, when compared with the vast regions with which the British Government was dealing at the time, was relatively small in area and infinitesimal in value.

The colony of Newfoundland claimed to support its case founded on the documents by a reference to evidence showing that the annexation of the "coast" had from the year 1763 onwards been understood and treated by everyone as including the whole area lying between the sea and the watershed or "height of land"; and there is no doubt that, where a document is ambiguous, evidence of a course of conduct which is sufficiently early and continuous may be taken into account as bearing upon the construction of the document. In this case the events of the 60 years next after the year 1763 have a special relevance, as the statute of 1809 (under which the present title of Newfoundland directly arises) and the statute of 1825 may be assumed to have been passed with knowledge of the public events which had occurred before their passing. It may be added that it was a term of the agreement between the two governments that in the discussion before this Board reference might be made to any evidence which (having regard to the nature of the case and the parties to it) the Board might think material and proper to be considered; and that throughout the discussion, which was conducted in the most friendly spirit, both parties were desirous that no available material which might possibly bear upon the question to be decided should be excluded from consideration.

In this connexion the following facts, which were proved, appear to their Lordships to be material and proper to be considered:—

(1) In the year 1765 the Unitas Fratrum, a society of Moravian missionaries, petitioned the Lords of Trade for the allotment to them of four tracts of land on the coast of Labrador containing together about 400,000 acres, with a view to the settlement there of missions to the Eskimos; and with the approval of the Lords of Trade missionaries were sent out by the society and received the support and protection of Governor Palliser. At a meeting of the Privy Council held on May 3, 1769, upon a report of the Lords of Trade recommending that a grant of land should be made to the society, the King in Council authorized certain British subjects as trustees for the Unitas Fratrum to occupy and possess during his Majesty's pleasure 100,000 acres of land in such part of Eskimo Bay on the coast of Labrador as they should find most suitable to that purpose, and directed the Governor of Newfoundland to give them all reasonable assistance and support in forming their establishment. This grant was duly made, and early in the year 1774 two other similar grants to or in trust for the society of 100,000 acres each were sanctioned by the Privy Council and committed to the Governor of Newfoundland to be carried out. In the year 1821, after the retransfer of Labrador to Newfoundland, a fourth grant of a like nature was made to the same society. The lands so granted to the society of Unitas Fratrum penetrated into the country far beyond the suggested limit of one mile from high-water mark, and in the case of the most northerly of them to a distance of about 30 miles from the shore. It would appear that these grants, connected as they were with the Government of Newfoundland, were consistent only with the existence of a Newfoundland jurisdiction extending beyond the littoral strip; and it is hard to believe that when, in the year 1809, Parliament restored to Newfoundland the coast of Labrador, it intended to divide the Moravian settlements then in existence, placing a small fraction of them (one mile in width) under the jurisdiction of the colony and leaving the remainder to Canada.

(2) In the year 1774 John Agnew and others having petitioned for a grant of mines and minerals to be discovered on the "coast or country of Labrador" between the river St. Lawrence and Hudson's Straits, the King in Council approved of the grant to them of all such mines and minerals "upon such parts of the sea coasts of Labrador as lie within 60 miles of low-water mark of the open sea" between the river St. John and the southern limits of the territories granted to the Hudson's Bay Company. This grant appears to treat the "coasts" as extending far inland from the shore.

(3) The administration of justice in Labrador has throughout been under the direction of the Government of Newfoundland. In the early years after the annexation it was found sufficient, as in the case of Newfoundland itself, to administer justice by the agency of naval surrogates exercising their functions on board their vessels or from some place close to the seashore. But by the Act of 1809 (section 15) it was enacted that the Supreme Court of Judicature of Newfoundland might hold sittings for criminal and civil cases in the parts of the coast of Labrador by that Act re-annexed to Newfoundland; and by an Act of 1811 the institution of surrogate Courts for that purpose was authorized. By an Act of 1824 the Government of Newfoundland was empowered to institute a Court of civil jurisdiction on the "coast" itself, and to appoint a Judge of such Court; and Judge Patterson, the Judge so appointed, exercised his functions at various places in the Labrador territory, including Rigolet, Kimmamish, and North West Brook, places which would have been far outside his jurisdiction if it had been limited as suggested by the Dominion in this inquiry. In 1834 the Legislature of Newfoundland, which had then been established, abolished the Court in Labrador on the ground of expense; but by an Act of the same Legislature passed in 1863 the Governor was empowered to institute "at the Labrador" a Court of civil and criminal jurisdiction to be presided over by one Judge to be appointed by the Governor in Council, and with an appeal to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and to appoint such Judge to be a collector of revenue on the Labrador. This Court was duly set up and was presided over by Judges Sweetland, Pinsent, and McNeil successively; and it continued to function until 1874, when it was discontinued. Each of these Judges, in addition to performing his judicial duties, made reports from time to time to the Governor on a number of questions relating to the territory of Labrador, including roads, schools, churches, and the fur trade. Among other incidents may be mentioned a visit of Judge Pinsent in 1873 to the North West River (about 100 miles from the open sea), when a Government official vaccinated a number of Montagnais Indians coming there for trade.

(4) Customs duties have been levied on behalf of the Government of Newfoundland on goods disembarked in Labrador from about the year 1826 until the present time, and the right of the government to collect such duties has from time to time been affirmed by the Secretary of State. In the year 1864 Mr. Donald Smith (afterwards Lord Strathcona), who was in control of the Hudson's Bay Company's trading station at North West River, agreed after some demur to pay the duties on goods landed at that place; and such duties have since been regularly paid.

It may be added that a considerable trade in fur was carried on by traders settled at or near the seashore or on the shores of the Hamilton inlet with the Indians in the interior, and was fostered by the Governor of Newfoundland; but a trade of this character would easily reach beyond the territory of the traders themselves, and it has little bearing on the question of boundary. A similar observation applies to the trade carried on by the Indians with the King's Posts in the province of Quebec, on which counsel for Canada relied. No evidence was given of any exercise of a Canadian jurisdiction in any part of the territory in dispute.

It seems desirable to add some observations on the maps, of which a large number (some of great antiquity and interest) were produced by the parties. [The maps contained in the collection put in by the Dominion are referred to by their numbers following a C, and those contained in the atlas put in by Newfoundland by their numbers following an N.] Maps published by private persons must, of course, be received with caution, as such persons depend to a large extent upon information obtained from general and unauthoritative sources; but from a map issued or accepted by a public authority, and especially by an authority connected with one of the governments concerned, an inference may not improperly be drawn.

The maps issued before 1763 have no direct bearing on this case, although some of them have been already referred to as instances of the use of a watershed or "height of land" as the boundary of a territory; and the later maps down to the year 1842 are of little use, except that they clearly indicate the whole course of the river St. John as the eastern boundary between Quebec and Labrador. Arrowsmith's map of British North America (N 24), published in 1842, is interesting as showing a line drawn from Ance Sablon northward to the fifty-second degree of north latitude and then along that parallel to the head of the St. John River as being at that point the boundary between Lower Canada and Labrador, thus indicating that the construction of section 9 of the Act of 1825 now put forward by Newfoundland was then adopted by the cartographer. The same indication of boundary appears, with greater authority, in the map (N 25) prepared in 1855 by T. C. Keeper, C.E., on the instructions of the Government of Canada for the use of the Canadian Commissioners at the Paris Exhibition. Arrowsmith's map of 1857 (N 26) has some authority as having been ordered to be printed by the House of Commons for the purposes of the Hudson's Bay Committee of that year, and as having been selected as an exhibit in the Alaska Boundary case; and that map not only has a similar indication as to the southern boundary of Labrador, but assigns to that territory the exact boundaries now claimed for it on behalf of Newfoundland. The same observation applies to a map (N 31) prepared in 1871 by two Canadian officials (Russell and Mare) on the order of the Canadian Minister of Agriculture, and to a map (N 32a) compiled by Desbarats in 1873 and sent by Lord Dufferin, as Governor-General of Canada, to the British Ambassador in Washington as showing "the exact boundary on the coast and the assumed boundary in the interior." The dispatch of the Governor-General transmitting this map enclosed a copy of the report of a Committee of the Privy Council approved by the Governor-General in Council on November 12, 1874, which was in the following terms:—

"In a despatch dated 20th June, 1874, from Sir Edward Thornton to Your Excellency, inclosing a communication from the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State at Washington, desiring to be informed whether any part of Labrador is separated from the jurisdiction of either the Dominion of Canada or that of Newfoundland.

"The Honourable the Secretary of State to whom this despatch, with enclosures, has been referred, reports that the boundary-line between the Dominion of Canada and Labrador is a line drawn due north and south from the Bay or Harbour of Ance au Blanc Sablon, near the Straits of Belle Isle, as far as the 52nd degree of north latitude; that Labrador extends eastward and northward from that point to Hudson's Straits.

"That the division-line in the interior separating Labrador from the Dominion of Canada has only been defined as far north as the 52nd degree of north latitude, but it has been assumed that the boundary-line in the interior would have taken the direction laid down on the accompanying map, which follows the height of land.

"That Labrador, with the islands adjacent thereto, is annexed to Newfoundland, and under the Government of that Island.

"Attached to the Report of the Secretary of State are extracts from the Imperial Statute bearing on the question, and a map showing the exact boundary on the coast and the assumed boundary in the interior.

"The Committee recommend that a copy of this Minute with the map and extracts from the Imperial Statute, above alluded to, be transmitted to Sir Edward Thornton for the information of the United States Government."

The terms of this report appear to their Lordships to be significant.

The maps subsequent to 1874 are not less interesting. The boundary now claimed by Newfoundland is assigned to Labrador by a map (N 35) prepared by Johnston in 1878, signed by the Surveyor-General of Canada and published by order of the Ministry of the Interior; in a map (C 36 and N 36) prepared by Johnston and Edmunds in 1882 and issued by the Canadian Department of Railways; and in a map (N 38) compiled by two French-Canadians (Tache and Genest) and issued by the Department of Railways of Quebec in 1883. In a map (C 37 and N 39) prepared by J. Johnston by authority of the Minister of the Interior and issued by the Department of the Interior at Ottawa in July, 1890, the height of land now claimed by Newfoundland as a boundary is shown by a red line; and though it is not clear on that map whether it is intended to be taken as the boundary between Canada and the Dependency of Newfoundland, no other boundary is indicated. This observation does not apply to a map (N 41) issued by the Department of Railways and Canals of Canada in 1891 and signed by the Chief Engineer of Government Railways, for in that map Labrador is clearly shown as bounded by the height of land; nor to a map (N 43) published by the Map and School Supply Company of Canada, Limited, and registered with the Department of Agriculture, in which "Labrador (Dependency of Newfoundland)" is depicted in bold colours as containing (subject to a slight difference to be mentioned hereafter) the precise area for which Newfoundland is contending. In the important map (N 42) prepared by Mr. A. P. Low, an official of the Canadian Geographical Survey, as the result of a careful survey of the country and issued by that department in 1896, the approximate height of land is shown, though not as a boundary; but the line drawn due north from Ance Sablon to the fifty-second parallel is shown and marked "boundary line." No other boundary of Labrador is indicated in that map. It is not until the year 1900 that the boundary now claimed by Canada is found upon any map; but it then appears upon a map (C 39) issued by the Department of the Interior, where a dotted line is drawn along the line of the shore and is marked "boundary undefined." It is also found in later maps; but as these were published after the dispute had arisen, no importance attaches to them.

The maps here referred to, even when issued or accepted by departments of the Canadian Government, cannot be treated as admissions binding on that Government; for even if such an admission could be effectively made, the departments concerned are not shown to have had any authority to make it. But the fact that throughout a long series of years, and until the present dispute arose, all the maps issued in Canada either supported or were consistent with the claim now put forward by Newfoundland is of some value as showing the construction put upon the Orders in Council and statutes by persons of authority and by the general public in the Dominion.

Upon the whole, their Lordships, having considered the facts and arguments put before them with the care which is necessary in a matter of such grave importance, have come to the conclusion that the claim of the colony of Newfoundland is in substance made out; but there are two points of detail to be mentioned.

First, in many of the maps issued after the year 1882, and particularly in the official maps above mentioned and numbered N 38, 41, and 43, and in maps issued by W. and A. K. Johnston (N 37) and by Stanford (N 40), the southern boundary of Labrador is shown as running, not from the point where the north and south line drawn from Ance Sablon meets the fifty-second parallel, and in a straight line along that parallel, but from a point where that north and south line would reach the watershed north of the fifty-second parallel and along that watershed as far as the head of the Romaine River. A boundary so drawn along the watershed would no doubt be more convenient than one which follows the arbitrary line of the fifty-second parallel, and would have the advantage of throwing into Canada the whole course of the rivers which run into the gulf of St. Lawrence. But their Lordships would not feel justified in adopting a boundary which, however convenient in itself, is not warranted by the terms of the statute of 1825; and they are of opinion that the line must be drawn along the parallel as far as the supposed river of St. John—namely, the Romaine River. According to the claim of the colony as illustrated by the sketch-map, the line would be continued westward across the river until it met the height of land; but there is no warrant in the statute of 1825 for such a continuation of the line, the effect of which would be to give to Newfoundland a part of the original province of Quebec as constituted under the Proclamation of 1763. The line should follow the parallel only until it meets the river, and should then turn north to the watershed.

Secondly, a small island called Woody Island, lying opposite to the bay of Ance Sablon, is claimed both by Canada and by Newfoundland. In their Lordships' opinion the transfer to Canada by the Act of 1825 of so much of the coast as lies to the westward of a line drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon "inclusive," with the islands adjacent to that part of the coast, carries with it Woody Island, which accordingly belongs to the Dominion.

For the above reasons their Lordships are of opinion that, according to the true construction of the statutes, Orders in Council, and Proclamations referred to in the Order of Reference, the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine River, and then northward along the left or east bank of that river and its head waters to their source, and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean until it reaches cape Chidley; and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

BRITISH AND NORTH EUROPEAN BANK, LIMITED v. ZALZTEIN.*

Bankers—Overdraft—Fraudulent book-entries by manager for own advantage—Notional credit and debit—Rights of customer.

The account of a customer with the plaintiff bank was overdrawn. The manager, for the purpose of concealing the overdraft from the auditors, fraudulently credited the account with a sum sufficient to put it in credit, and subsequently debited it with a similar sum. In an action by the bank against the customer, Held, that the customer could not rely upon the credit as payment and repudiate the debit as being unauthorized.

This was an action tried in the Short Cause List before Mr. Justice Sankey. The plaintiff bank claimed from the defendant £2,392 8s. 6d. upon the balance of an overdrawn account. The defendant denied liability by reason of circumstances which he alleged to amount in law to payment. The facts appear fully from the judgment.

Mr. Pritt appeared for the plaintiff bank; the Hon. S. O. Henn Collins for the defendant.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE SANKEY read the following considered judgment :—The plaintiff bank claim the sum, subject to adjustment, of £2,392 8s. 6d., being a balance alleged to be due by the defendant to them in respect of the defendant's account with them for money lent, bank charges and interest ; in other words, for a sum due in respect of an overdrawn account. In fact the sum in question is the amount of the overdrawn account.

The defendant himself has not paid anything in respect of it and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover unless, as the defendant alleges, the circumstances of the case permit him to say that in law the overdraft has been paid off. Those circumstances are as follows : Towards the end of 1923 the defendant had two accounts with the plaintiff bank, being overdrawn on No. 1 to the extent of £600 and in respect of No. 2 to the extent of £2,300. A Mr. Wizotzky had guaranteed the defendant's overdraft up to £2,000, and so the defendant's accounts were in debit to the extent of £900 in excess of his allowed overdraft.

The bank manager, a man of the name of Kiaer, who gave evidence before me which I accept, was anxious about the accounts but could not get Wizotzky to put them in credit. Kiaer did not want his company or the auditors to see that the accounts were overdrawn ; no doubt he would have been reprimanded if it had come to their notice. He therefore set about to think how he could get the accounts put in apparent credit. He had at that time a power of attorney from a Mr. Rist, his brother-in-law, and so in September, 1923, he put £2,000 from Rist's account to the apparent credit of the defendant's No. 1 account. The result of his so doing was to put that account into apparent credit, while No. 2 account showed a debit of £2,260 19s. 6d. Subsequently on October 3, 1923, he caused the defendant to be apparently debited in his No. 2 account for that sum, and on October 11 transferred the £2,000 apparent credit from No. 1 account to No. 2 account.

Kiaer in giving evidence before me very frankly admitted that he carried out this manœuvre in order, in his own interest, to deceive the auditors of the bank. He never told anybody about it for some time. The defendant never knew about it for weeks afterwards, but in a letter to him dated November 14, 1924, his account was enclosed showing the book entries above referred to and showing a debit of £300 0s. 7d. in respect of No. 1 account and a debit of £2,375 13s. 6d. in respect of No. 2 account.

Subsequently Rist's account was altered by transferring a credit of £2,000 to him. The net effect of these transactions was to leave the position of the defendant exactly as it had been. The credit and debit were, without begging the question, mere notional book entries. The defendant was repeatedly pressed for payment of the overdraft and copies of the account were sent to him ; in fact, as above stated, he himself did nothing to liquidate the overdraft and at last a writ was issued.

In the proceedings under Order XIV. the defendant filed an affidavit in which he had alleged that his guarantor Wizotzky had paid the sum of £2,000 on his behalf, and the case was remitted for trial. Subsequently, as I was informed, the defendant obtained an adjournment in order that he might prove these facts. The adjournment was granted, but he would never have been able to prove such facts, for Wizotzky had never paid it at all. All that had taken place had been, as above stated, that certain book entries had been made.

When the matter came before me the defendant was unable to prove that Mr. Wizotzky had in fact paid the money, nor was he able himself to go into the witness-box, but then for the first time the point was taken for him that he was entitled in law to rely upon the above facts as constituting payment. The way in which the case was put for him was as follows : (1) That when the £2,000 was placed to his credit in the way above mentioned that £2,000 was a payment to him and became his and his overdraft was liquidated to that extent. (2) That the bank had no right or authority to make the subsequent debit, and therefore their act in doing so was void and he was entitled to rely upon the £2,000 as a payment to him and to his credit and to disregard the debit.

The question for decision is whether he is so entitled. I was referred on the defendant's behalf to the cases collected under the case of Marriot v. Hampton (2 Smith, L.C. 403) with regard to money paid under mistake and also to the case of Eyles v. Ellis (4 Bing., 112).

Before discussing the matter it is necessary to find or to emphasize certain facts. (1) The defendant never knew anything about these transactions at the time when they took place, and the first time when he knew anything about the book entries was after both the credit and the debit had been made, and when the account showed the sum (subject to adjustment) now sued for. (2) The defendant never objected to the accounts as delivered to him and never took this point till the hearing of the case. (3) The manager of the bank made the book entries for his own purpose to deceive the auditors. (4) The bank itself knew nothing about these transactions.

Dealing with the law, I am of opinion that the cases which have been decided on mistakes of fact have very little to do with the present case. Indeed, the defendant contended that there was no mistake here, for the bank manager did what he intended to do and did not do it in consequence of any mistake or misapprehension, the main argument for him being that he was entitled to treat the entry as payment, and he cited the case of Eyles v. Ellis (supra) as being in his favour.

In my view that case is wholly distinguishable. There the plaintiff and the defendant each kept an account with the same banker. The plaintiff desired the defendant to pay in to his account a sum due to him for rent. The defendant wrote stating that he had caused the amount to be transferred to his account, and the banker wrote to the plaintiff to the same effect. At the time when the transfer was made in the books of the banker the defendant's account was overdrawn. The bank having stopped payment, it was held that the transfer was equivalent to payment by the defendant to the plaintiff. Chief Justice Best said that, though no money was actually transferred, yet as the bankers gave the plaintiff credit for the amount, that was equivalent to an acknowledgment by them that they had received the rent from the defendant on account of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff might then have drawn for the sum thus transferred. See Hart on Banking, 3rd Edition, page 214.

It is true that the entries were made by clerks in that case, but it was not suggested that the clerks had no authority to make them or that they were making them for their own purposes only. In the present case the manager was making the entries in fraud of his employers and for his own purposes.

The law applicable to the subject is, in my view, rather to be found in that branch which deals with the effect of entries in passbooks, and the real question is, has there been payment in this case ?

The present position of the law is said to be most unsatisfactory. See Paget on Banking, 3rd Edition, page 344. I do not think that it can be dogmatically asserted that an entry made in a passbook is in all cases conclusive and binding on the bank, or conclusive or binding upon the customer, but each case must be judged on its own particular facts, although the customer in whose favour the entry stands starts with the advantage that prima facie it is an admission by the bank in his favour which cannot in some cases be rebutted. Mr. Justice Bigham has said that statements in a passbook are statements on which a customer is entitled to act. See Akrokerri (Atlantic) Mines, Limited v. Economic Bank (20 The Times L.R., 564; [1904] 2 K.B., 465). That may be so in certain events, but, if a customer after some months examines his passbook and sees a credit of £2,000 and a debit of a similar amount immediately after and knows nothing about either entry, is he entitled to say: I will act on the credit and disregard the debit? Is he entitled to regard and accept the credit as a payment and to disregard and repudiate the debit? In my opinion he is not.

I think, too, that in every case where it is sought to treat a mere book entry as a payment, some other circumstance must be present and relied upon to enable the customer in whose favour it is made to succeed, either some express previous authority to pay, some communication of the circumstance to the defendant and some action on it by him (see Eyles v. Ellis (supra), and Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 B. and C., 281), so that there may be something in the nature both of a payment by one party and of a receipt by the other, or some alteration by the customer, in whose favour the book entry was made, in his position to induce the Court to say that the entry was payment and that the money cannot be recovered from him.

In this case the defendant never knew of the entry or alleged payment till after a debit of a similar amount had been made, and never altered his position because of it, and although it cannot be said that mere acquiescence in the debit entry binds him (see Kepitigalla Rubber Estates, Limited v. National Bank of India, 25 The Times L.R., 402; [1909] 2 K.B., 1010), there is ground for saying that there was no payment at all in this case. See Holt v. Markham ([1923] 1 K.B., 504, per Lord Justice Scrutton, at p. 514).

I find (1) that the bank manager never meant the entry to be a payment or to appropriate it as such; (2) that the defendant himself eventually knew of it and never regarded the entry as a payment. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the entry was not a payment and cannot be relied upon as such.

In the result the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, the exact figures of which I was told would be adjusted by the parties.

IN RE THE RAILWAYS ACT, 1921—EX PARTE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL COMPANY AND DOCK AND HARBOUR AUTHORITIES ASSOCIATION.*

Railways — Standard charges — Ancillary business — Dock undertaking — Consideration of amount of dock charges—Railways Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 55), s. 58 (4).

By s. 58 (4) of the Railways Act, 1921, "When fixing the charges necessary to produce the standard revenue, the Tribunal shall take into consideration the charges in respect of any business carried on by the company ancillary or subsidiary to its railways, the charges for which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and if in the opinion of the Tribunal the company is not making, or has not taken reasonable steps to enable it to make, adequate charges in respect of any such business, the Tribunal shall, in fixing the charges under this part of this Act, take into account the revenue which would be produced by any such business if adequate charges were in operation."

Held, that under this provision, where a railway company is carrying on a dock undertaking as an ancillary business, the conclusive test as to what is railway service and what is dock service is not whether the service has been performed within the territorial ambit of the dock undertaking, but the Railway Rates Tribunal has to take into consideration the different operations which make up the business of a dock undertaking and for which separate charges are made, and the Tribunal may come to the conclusion that some of the charges are subject, and some are not subject, to its jurisdiction.

These were appeals from an order of the Railway Rates Tribunal in reference to the principles on which standard railway charges should be fixed under the Railways Act, 1921.

The main question in dispute was with regard to the extent of the railway-owned dock undertakings whose rates were outside the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The Tribunal decided that the docks consisted of the water spaces, quays, pontoons, &c., but did not include the dock lines. The appellants, the Manchester Ship Canal Company and the Dock and Harbour Authorities Association, contended that the Tribunal's definition of the limits of the railway docks enabled the railways to put what were really dock charges on to other rates and thus exposed the independent docks to unfair competition.

Under the Railways Act, 1921, the net annual or standard revenue of the respective amalgamated companies was to be obtained from two sources—namely (a) railway charges, and (b) other sources of revenue. What the other sources of revenue did not supply, the railway charges had to make up. The Tribunal was engaged in estimating what "other sources of revenue" would contribute to the revenue of the "A" year. Each of the amalgamated companies had deposited "estimates of revenue from other sources for the 'A' year."

In connexion with those "estimates" of revenue from "ancillary and subsidiary businesses," the statute imposed a duty on the Tribunal by section 58 (4), which was as follows:—

"When fixing the charges necessary to produce the standard revenue, the Tribunal shall take into consideration the charges in respect of any business carried on by the company ancillary or subsidiary to its railways, the charges for which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and if in the opinion of the Tribunal the company is not making, or has not taken reasonable steps to enable it to make, adequate charges in respect of any such business, the Tribunal shall, in fixing the charges under this part of this Act, take into account the revenue which would be produced by any such business if adequate charges were in operation."

The Tribunal, having taken all the evidence into consideration, was not prepared to find that, in respect of the business of "docks, harbours, and wharves," of the respective companies, the companies were not making, or had not taken reasonable steps to enable them respectively to make, adequate charges. In their opinion the intention of the subsection was to prevent an available source of additional revenue from being disregarded and neglected on the part of the railways, and imposed the penalties prescribed by the section in cases where it was found that the railways were not making charges commensurate with, or equal to, the highest effective charges that they could make to secure more revenue. The Tribunal did not consider that the charges in force could be held to be inadequate, because they were the highest that could legally be made, and, in addition, higher charges would be ineffective to produce a greater revenue.

The Manchester Ship Canal Company and the Dock and Harbour Authorities Association appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., and the Hon. Stafford Cripps appeared for the Manchester Ship Canal Company; Mr. Craig Henderson, K.C., and Mr. J. Forster for the Dock and Harbour Authorities Association; Mr. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., Mr. Bruce Thomas, and Mr. Tylor for the Railway Companies; and Mr. Bowstead for the Ministry of Transport.

Lord Justice Bankes, in delivering his considered judgment, said:—These appeals are from a decision of the Railway Rates Tribunal, a statutory body set up by the Railways Act, 1921, for the purpose, among other things, of settling the schedule of standard charges which the railways as from the appointed day may make for all services rendered in respect of which the charges are fixed. By section 26 of the Act the same right of appeal is given as was conferred in the case of the Railway and Canal Commission by section 17 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, which right includes the right to appeal upon any question of law. The Railways Act, 1921, lays down a number of principles and rules which the Tribunal is to follow in settling the schedules of charges. It is obvious that in the course of deciding how far the schedules submitted by the railway companies do, or do not, comply with the statutory requirements of the Act, and in deciding from what point of view the Tribunal is to approach the consideration of those schedules, questions of law must continually crop up.

The Tribunal appears to be under no obligation to give any intimation what decision it may have arrived at on any question of law, or to give any reasons for its decision. It is, however, manifestly to the interest of all parties concerned that when an important question is raised upon which either the Tribunal, or the parties interested, desire the decision of this Court, the Tribunal should state what its decision is, and the reasons for it, so as not only to give a right of appeal, but also to inform this Court what the grounds of the decision were.

In the present case this has been done. A formal judgment in the form of an order and declaration was drawn up and issued on May 28, 1926. It is from this decision that the present appeals are brought.

The appellants are the Manchester Ship Canal Company and a body representing dock interests who appeared before the Railway Rates Tribunal as interested parties. Their present complaint is that the Rates Tribunal put a wrong construction upon certain directory provisions of the Railways Act, 1921, with the result that they, as independent dock companies competing with railway-owned dock undertakings, are placed in a much less favourable position than, under the Act, they are entitled to be put.

The whole question turns upon the proper construction to be placed upon section 58 (4) of the Act.

His Lordship read the subsection and proceeded:—

The construction of this subsection was considered by the Tribunal in a judgment delivered on December 1, 1925. The question then before it had reference to the charges made by railway companies for collection and delivery and for warehousing. It had there been contended, as it was contended in the present appeal, that section 58 (4) was a protective section inserted by Parliament in the interest of the independent dock companies. The Tribunal refused to accept that view. The President said:—

"This subsection seems to be in aid of the person called upon to pay the standard charges and to be designed to prevent him from being called upon to pay charges which contain an element of subsidy of certain other businesses which the railway companies may be carrying on. It assumes that he will be doing so if the charges in these businesses are inadequate."

I agree that this is the primary object of the statute, the terms of which, taken as a whole, plainly indicate in my opinion that Parliament had in mind in framing its provisions two parties—namely, the railways which perform the services, and the public who pay for them. It seems unnecessary to decide whether Parliament also had in view the position of the independent dock companies, because their interest in questions such as are raised in the inquiry before the Tribunal is such as clearly to entitle them to the locus which was granted them to appear as opponents of the railway companies' proposals and to claim that the true construction must be placed upon the subsection, whether it was inserted in the statute with the object of protecting their interests or not.

In order to follow the subsequent proceedings before the Tribunal reference must be made to the decision of December 1, 1925. It was in the following terms:—

"(1) That for the purpose of fixing standard charges under the Railways Act, 1921, (a) collection and delivery is a business carried on by the said railway companies, as ancillary or subsidiary to their respective railways; (b) warehousing as now undertaken by the said railway companies in connexion with their respective railways (including the provision of accommodation for storage under fixed space agreements) is a part of railway working and is not a business carried on by them ancillary or subsidiary to their respective railways. (2) That the charges in respect of the aforementioned business of collection and delivery are not charges which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal within the meaning of section 58 (4) of the Railways Act, 1921, the adequacy of which the Tribunal can, under the said subsection, take into consideration in fixing standard charges. And the Court doth further order:—

"1. That the expenses of collection and delivery be omitted from the respective companies' estimates lodged with the Court and marked respectively—" then the marks are given—

"and be transferred to their respective estimates—" then the marks of those are given.

"2. That to enable the Tribunal to fix the standard charges the said railway companies do from time to time as required furnish to the Tribunal accounts showing the properly ascertained receipts and expenditure from and on the services of collection and/or delivery as performed by them."

Although warehousing was dealt with as appears in the Order, the question then before the Tribunal was warehousing in general. At a later stage the question of warehousing on dock premises was raised, and argued before the Tribunal. On this question the Tribunal came to the decision of March 30, 1926, which is the subject of the present appeals. The decision of December 1, 1925, has not been appealed from. In order to follow the form of the Order of March 30, 1926, it is necessary to refer to the case presented to the Tribunal and to the arguments put forward in support of it. This very clearly appears from the speech of Mr. Cripps, appearing for the Manchester Ship Canal. He began by setting out the points to which he desired to call attention, and said :—

"There are two points which, in my submission, arise here on the consideration of other sources of revenue. The first is the definition of 'ancillary business,' and the second is the adequacy of the charges, and that second point divides itself into two : first, the meaning of 'inadequate,' and secondly, whether, on the proper interpretation of the word 'inadequate,' the charges are in fact inadequate. So far as my clients are concerned, they are particularly concerned to get the proper legal interpretation on the first two points. They submit on the facts shown that the charges are not adequate ; but that is not a point which so vitally concerns them ; the point which vitally concerns them is what they consider the final determination now of the Tribunal as to 'ancillary business,' because when the Tribunal comes to consider section 59 (6) they feel that the Tribunal will be bound by the decision which they now give as to the ambit of those ancillary businesses. I do not suggest that at this stage it would be profitable for the Tribunal to go into the details of each dock and settle the exact ambit of it, but on the other hand, knowing as we do that at the present time the form of this account is under revision by the Minister and the railway companies, it is obviously a very opportune moment for the Tribunal to give their decision on the point as to what an ancillary business is, so that the railway companies and the Minister may have the assistance of that decision when they come to re-cast their accounts under the Act."

He then proceeded to contend that, in construing the subsection in reference to docks, the entire business of the dock must be considered as the business carried on by the company referred to in the subsection, and that it is not legitimate to split up that business into warehousing, cooperage, &c., and treat each branch of the business as a business for the purposes of the subsection ; and further that, in determining what the business of the dock is, the ambit of that business must be determined by a consideration of the statutes creating the dock undertaking.

It followed from that contention, and it was freely admitted by Mr. Cripps, that no general rule could be framed applicable to all docks, because the case of each dock must depend upon its own particular statutes. His proposal to the Tribunal was :—

"What I propose to do is to examine one series of Acts, and if this Tribunal should lay down some such principle as that an ancillary business is a business defined by statute in which the charges are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, I should suggest that then the whole matter might easily be referred to some person, perhaps the Minister of Transport, to decide in the case of each dock what was the ambit of the dock undertaking, with power to Parliament perhaps to refer it for reply to this Tribunal in case there is any insuperable difficulty : but as I anticipate, once the legal position is ascertained by this Tribunal the parties will probably have no great difficulty in themselves agreeing the actual ambit of the various docks."

He proceeded with the question of law arising upon what is the meaning in the subsection of the expression "adequate charges," which he construed as meaning charges sufficient in amount to defray the cost of the services and to give some reward upon capital, and he dealt with the contention that the railways were relying upon their charges being maximum charges. He completed his case with a contention that the railway companies had not complied with the Order of the Tribunal of December 1, 1925, directing them to furnish accounts of collection and delivery services.

The Order appealed from is in the following terms :—

"The Court doth order and declare as follows :—(1) That for the purpose of fixing standard charges under the Railways Act, 1921, (a) the estimates of other sources of revenue for the respective companies aforesaid as set forth in the tables R.T.2.c., R.T.3.c., R.T.4.c., and R.T.5.c. conform to and satisfy the requirements of the Railways Act, 1921, and be accepted. (b) That the ancillary or subsidiary businesses of docks, harbours and wharves carried on by the several companies aforesaid, are not businesses in which the several companies are not making or have not taken reasonable steps to enable them to make adequate charges in respect of such businesses. (c) That that position of the said estimates relating to joint lines and to collection and delivery be accepted."

I understand the last clause to have reference, in part at any rate, to Mr. Cripps's complaints that the accounts rendered by the railway companies were not in order, and this is confirmed by paragraph 4 of the notice of appeal of the Manchester Ship Canal Company. Nothing has been said in reference to this part of the appeal, and I pass from it to consider heads (a) and (b) of the Order and paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the notice of appeal.

The way in which the Tribunal dealt with the arguments addressed to it appears from its written judgment, to which I must refer. It sets out the capital expenditure of the four railways upon their dock undertakings, and goes on to say that except in the case of the Southampton Docks the figures do not include any expenditure on railway sidings and warehouses. It then goes on to explain that the railway companies have adopted a division of railway receipts and dock receipts by which all receipts and expenses in respect of railway sidings and warehouses, whether they are within the area of a dock or not, are included as railway receipts. The Tribunal treats this division as a satisfactory compliance with the requirements of the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911.

The Tribunal then proceeds to set out the objections of the present appellants to the course adopted by the railway companies, and gives its decision in the following words :—

"In our opinion Parliament, when passing the Railways Act, 1921, must be assumed to have had knowledge of the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, and the statutory form of accounts thereunder, and of the established practice in connexion with it, and in providing the methods which the Act contains for ascertaining railway charges must be deemed to have kept these statutory provisions as to accounts, and the practice which had been established under them, in view, and to have utilized the division of receipts and expenses which it contained as the basis upon which the provisions of the Act as to fixing charges should proceed. This, we think, appears upon a consideration of the terms of the Act of 1921."

It is not disputed that this decision is based upon a misapprehension. There was not at the time of the passing of the Railways Act, 1921, any settled practice ; only one set of accounts under the Act of 1911 had been delivered before the war, and with regard to that one set the practice was not uniform. No accounts were rendered during the war, or until after the passing of the Act of 1921. It follows that the Tribunal has, for a reason which cannot in law be supported, declined to take into consideration the matters submitted for their consideration by the appellants. Unless their decision can be supported on other grounds the appeal must be allowed.

Mr. Tyldesley Jones attempted to support the decision upon the ground that all the charges to which reference could be made were subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. In support of this contention reference was made to section 28 (1) (f), section 59 (6), and Schedule V., para. ii. It was further contended that section 58 (4) was confined to the first fixing of standard charges, and, that being so, no meaning could be given to the part of the subsection referring to jurisdiction unless it was read as including the jurisdiction conferred by section 28 (1) (f) and Schedule V., para. ii. I do not agree with this contention.

In my opinion the jurisdiction conferred by section 28 (1) (f), not being exercisable until the appointed day, and then only for the purpose of determining questions brought before the Tribunal, is not the jurisdiction which is referred to in section 58 (4). Whether the draftsman had in his mind any particular form of exercise of jurisdiction when he drafted the subsection, or whether it was introduced merely as a matter of drafting because subsections 1 (a), (g), (h), and (i) of section 28 were not subject to the same restriction as subsections (b) to (f), I do not know. It seems to me, however, clear that when the statute expressly provides that certain powers of the Tribunal shall not be exercisable until the appointed day, it cannot mean that before that time the jurisdiction, though not exercisable, shall be deemed to be existing.

Mr. Tyldesley Jones made a further appeal to the Court not to send the matter back to the Tribunal, on grounds which it is unnecessary to go into, but which amounted to an appeal to us to exercise a discretion in the matter. Sir John Simon relieved us of any necessity to consider this question, as he stated quite early in his argument that his clients had no wish to compel the Tribunal to reconsider at the present juncture the decision to which it had come, the object of the appeal being to make it quite clear that on any further consideration of the questions involved the Tribunal must not follow its present decision, but must deal with the questions afresh and on entirely different lines.

How far the considerations which are material when section 58 (4) controls the situation will continue to be material when section 59 (6) is the controlling section I express no opinion. The question has not been argued. I merely call attention to the difference between the language of the proviso to section 59 (6) and that of section 58 (4).

It remains now to consider how far, if at all, it is possible to lay down any rule of construction which will guide the Tribunal in the future. This at least is clear, that the Tribunal must reconsider its decision. The appellants ask us to accept their test of what are railway and what are dock charges, and to decide as a matter of law that it is the correct test. I take the appellants' contention from their notice of appeal as supplemented by the draft form of order which Sir John Simon asked this Court to make.

In substance it amounts to this, that in the case of a dock undertaking, taken over, or acquired, by a railway company, the deciding and conclusive test of what is railway service and what is dock service is whether the service has been performed within the territorial ambit of the dock undertaking. If this principle were adopted it would no doubt apply to all docks and every kind of service in every dock. The difficulty of then deciding where the dividing line between railway undertaking and dock undertaking is to be drawn is attempted to be got over by asking for a direction of this Court to the Minister of Transport to find out and report to this Court where, in the case of every dock undertaking of the respective railway companies, the line is to be drawn. What jurisdiction this Court has to give any direction to the Minister of Transport I do not know, and in the view which I take of the appellants' contention it is immaterial to inquire.

I do not agree with the construction put upon the subsection that what the Tribunal has to do is to consider the business of the dock undertaking as one entire whole, and that it may not take into consideration the separate services which go to make up the entire business. I think that what the Tribunal is directed to take into consideration is not the business carried on by the company, but the charges in respect of any business carried on by the company. Under this direction the Tribunal is, in my opinion, entitled, and, under the last part of the subsection, specially directed, to take into consideration the different operations which go to make up the business of a dock undertaking, for which operations separate and distinct charges are made. If this construction of the subsection is correct it follows that the Tribunal may come to the conclusion that some of the charges are subject to and some are not subject to its jurisdiction. This conclusion of itself disposes of the appellants' main contention.

In addition to the difficulty in the appellants' way created by this construction of the subsection, there is also the decision of the Tribunal, upon a construction of the statute as a whole, that the charges for collection and delivery services within the dock area are subject to its jurisdiction. This decision has not been appealed from. There is the further difficulty, which, in my opinion, is insuperable, and that is that, in view of the number of dock undertakings, the diversity of provisions under which they were created or are operated and the different kinds of services which may be performed within the territorial ambit of a dock undertaking, it is quite impossible to lay down any general rule which would cover every dock undertaking and every kind of service performed within the limits of the dock undertaking.

It may be that when the question of revision of charges arises the Tribunal may consider that, the appointed day having passed, its jurisdiction and powers under section 59 (6) are very different from what they are under section 58 (4), and that questions which are now material for consideration will be no longer material. But, assuming that this is not so, and that it will still have to consider what charges are or are not within its jurisdiction, it is impossible to frame an exhaustive list of all the matters which should be taken into consideration. Until all the facts relating to any particular service are known, no one can say what it is necessary to consider in relation to that service. This decision may seem to impose a grievous burthen upon the Tribunal, but it will not be greater than those which they have already borne, and which they have been materially aided in bearing by the good sense and assistance of the parties interested, which good will and assistance will no doubt be forthcoming in the future as in the past.

As the appellants have succeeded in displacing the decision of the Tribunal, the appeals will be allowed, but the only order made will be that the respondents pay the appellants' costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is an appeal from the Railway Rates Tribunal established under the Railways Act, 1921, to the Court of Appeal. This appeal is on questions of law only; there is no appeal as to questions of fact, or as to the locus standi of persons appearing before the Tribunal. Under this power of appeal the Dock and Harbour Authorities Association (which includes the Port of London Authority, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and the Clyde Navigation Trust, as well as numerous other Docks and Harbour Authorities), and the Manchester Ship Canal Company appeal to this Court against what they allege to be an erroneous decision in point of law of the Railway Rates Tribunal.

The question arises in this way. The Railways Act, 1921, which amalgamated the railways of Great Britain into four groups, proposed also to regulate their income and the charges from which it was partly derived. They were by section 58 (1) to be given a standard revenue which was to be equal to their net revenue in 1913 with additions to represent interest on capital since expended. This standard revenue was to be derived from "standard charges" for certain matters, with the addition of "other sources of revenue." The standard charges were to be fixed by the Tribunal at such a rate as would, with the other sources of revenue, yield, in the opinion of the Tribunal, the standard revenue; and there was to be a yearly revision to adjust charges to revenue required. But some of the "other sources of revenue" were businesses subsidiary and ancillary to the railways, in which the Tribunal could not fix the charges, and Parliament appears to have thought that it might be that the railways, by making insufficient charges in their subsidiary businesses, might require too much revenue to be raised from standard charges. To prevent this, Parliament, by section 58, subsection 4, required the Tribunal, if it considered that the charges of the companies in these subsidiary businesses were inadequate, but had not power directly to fix these charges at an adequate level, to attempt indirectly to make those charges adequate by only allowing so much standard revenue from "standard charges" as would be necessary if the subsidiary charges were adequate. In other words, inadequacy in subsidiary charges was, if possible, to be corrected by disallowing the amount of the inadequacy in estimating the revenue which should be raised from standard charges. This it was hoped would induce the railway companies to supply the amount which otherwise might be disallowed from standard charges, by raising their subsidiary charges to an adequate level. This provision certainly might protect the payer of standard charges on the railways from paying more in standard charges because the railways were making inadequate subsidiary charges. It also would tend to protect independent undertakings which competed with the subsidiary businesses of the railways from competition by means of charges inadequate for the subsidiary work done, which the railways were able to keep inadequate because they made up the loss out of standard charges on the user of railways. To carry out this object harbour authorities appeared before the Tribunal to say that the charges in docks subsidiary to the railways, or "railway docks," were inadequate to the capital involved and work done. They were given a locus standi by the Tribunal, and this decision is unappealable. Working out section 58, subsection 4, the Tribunal had to "take into consideration the charges in respect of any business carried on by the company ancillary or subsidiary to its railways, the charges for which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal." The reason for the latter provision appears to be this. The Tribunal was fixing standard charges before "the appointed day" at which those charges were to come into operation. If at that time there were any subsidiary charges which it could at that time fix, in respect of such charges there was no need to attempt to correct their inadequacy by cutting down standard revenue and charges. It was only with regard to subsidiary charges which the Tribunal could not at that time fix, that it was necessary to use the indirect method of correcting their inadequacy, by giving the railway companies notice to make them adequate. This consideration, in my opinion, shows that the fact that after the appointed day (see section 28 (2) and section 55 of the Act) the Tribunal could, under section 28, and Schedule V., Clause ii., determine, on application by a trader, the reasonable charges which he should pay, does not make such charges, before the appointed day, charges subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal and therefore excluded from consideration under section 58 (4) of the Act. They cannot be fixed, where the consideration of standard charges is to take place.

The next question is, what are the subsidiary and ancillary businesses, the charges of which the Tribunal cannot fix but is to consider. We were told that one of the few things on which the parties before us were agreed was that railway docks and harbours were businesses ancillary and subsidiary to the railways. These might be of two classes: they might be docks originally constructed by the railways, or docks originally constructed as independent undertakings under Dock Act powers and then purchased or absorbed by railway companies under Amalgamation Acts; and in this latter case subsequent additions might have been made to them either under dock powers or railway powers. There were more than a hundred of these railway docks, differing widely in situation and statutory powers. For instance, the position at the Southampton Docks was completely different from that at the Hull Docks, and the individual docks at Hull differed considerably from each other in the statutes applicable. It would seem an almost impossible task to lay down any general principle which would apply to all these various docks. The railway companies, however, proceeded to endeavour to do it, and persuaded the Tribunal that their attempted solution was right. It is a melancholy fact that their counsel now admit that the conclusion which they persuaded the Tribunal to come to was erroneous in law.

In considering the adequacy of charges in an ancillary dock business, a line had to be drawn to indicate where the dock ended and the railway began. The eminent accountant for the railway companies prepared a careful statement of what was included in the "dock," which he read to the Tribunal at answer 15,181, page 1166 :

"Water spaces, jetties, piers, pontoons, stathes, floating and graving docks, lock entrances, bridge plant, floating craft, cranes, coal hoists and shoots, bridges across docks—provided they are not for railway purposes—paths or roads for access to the area, workshops, stores and offices solely used by the company's staff engaged in the upkeep and working of the area, and any other appliances in connexion with the working of that area." This answer he shortened later in his answers to questions 15,520 and 15,521 : ". . . the properties and spaces dealt with as 'dock' you may take roughly as water spaces, quay walls and wharves." The last word is, of course, ambiguous, for it depends on how much of the "wharf" on the landward side you are considering.

Mr. Quirey does not seem to have been aware that on many quays the goods discharged from a ship go straight into a "transit shed" at the ship's side, where they are sorted, and some taken delivery of by consignees and carted away, and some taken away on trucks. He did not intend to exclude all dock warehouses from docks and include them in railways (A. 15,184), though the warehouses may have been part of the original dock undertaking and used largely or even entirely for goods which do not go on the railways at all. He did intend to exclude all dock railways, i.e., lines of rail in the dock undertaking, and dock bridges, if they had lines of rail on them. He apparently did exclude (though whether he knew about their existence or not does not appear), all charges made for work done on land of the dock undertaking, or storage on that land, as, for instance, charges for storing timber in the open at Hull on land belonging to the dock undertaking, charges for "coopering" or mending casks or packages of goods discharged on the dock land, and there dealt with, and charges for rent or transit sheds, where goods discharged from a ship remained there for more than a certain length of time. Mr. Quirey said quite truly, "This is the division we are now making between dock and railway in our accounts." The Tribunal adopted the division as satisfactory, in its judgment of March 30, 1926, the judgment appealed against, and apparently the Tribunal adopted it because it took the view that it was an existing practice at the time of the passing of the Act of 1921 : "something which is already known does not require to be re-settled" ; and that the Act continues and utilizes a division which already exists. (Page 1318). This view appears to rest on a complete misunderstanding of the evidence, which it was admitted by counsel for the railway companies did not justify it. It appears that after the Railway Companies (Accounts and Returns) Act, 1911, which required a separate item of revenue and expenditure on "Docks, Harbours and Wharves," only one set of accounts had been presented by the various railway companies concerned, namely, in 1913, and the practice of the various companies in allocating revenue and expenditure "to docks" varied. (A. 15,202.) It further appeared that it was only after the passing of the Act of 1921, when it first became of importance to the companies to limit the items included in docks, that the companies more or less agreed on the division put forward by Mr. Quirey. I say "more or less," for it was clear that the Southampton Docks were treated in a different way. A division which did not come into existence till after the Act was passed cannot possibly have been recognized and continued by the Act. But acting on its view, the Tribunal excluded from its consideration all charges relating to dock undertakings except those specified by Mr. Quirey, and did not consider whether they were adequate. Whether this exclusion was right in law was the first question raised by the appeal.

I am of opinion that there is in the Act nothing which justifies the division stated by Mr. Quirey, and the exclusion from consideration of all charges on the landward side of it, and indeed counsel for the railway companies did not contend that there was. Docks, historically, are much older than railways. The statutes relating to the docks of London and Hull begin in the 18th century, when railways were not thought of ; and many of the present railway docks had their origin quite independently of railways, under Dock Acts. In 1847 the common clauses in Dock Acts were included in the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which in most Dock Acts since that date is incorporated in whole or in part. The scheme of the Act was that there was a dock undertaking, the harbour, dock, and pier, and the works connected therewith, including lands authorized to be used in connexion therewith, and section 33 of the Act of 1847 read as follows :—

"Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the Special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers."

Section 83 gave power to the dock company to make by-laws for regulating the use of the harbour, dock, or pier, which had to be confirmed by a Judge of one of the superior Courts, and one of the subject-matters of by-laws was "for regulating the duties and conduct of the porters and carriers employed on the premises of the undertakers and fixing the rates to be paid to them for carrying any goods . . . from or to the same." The scheme of dues or tolls contained in the Acts was (1) a tonnage rate on vessels using the dock ; (2) a tonnage rate on goods using the dock undertaking. Questions, of course, arose as to the period for which these rates franked the vessel or goods, and this was dealt with by fixing, sometimes by by-law, sometimes by rate-book, a period after which "rent" began, whether the goods were stored in warehouses, transit sheds, or in the open on land of the dock undertaking. Further, the dock companies, from the first, performed services to the goods, of which cooperage or repairing breakages is a very good example, and from the middle of the last century it was common to find in Dock Acts a kind of omnibus clause authorizing reasonable charges for all services rendered to goods, a long list of special kinds of services being enumerated. Further, for a long time no railway engines were found in docks at all. Goods were brought and removed by various kinds of carts, and though the dock companies laid down rails on docks, there were statutory provisions, as in the Hull Acts, that no locomotives were to be used on them ; trucks were to be moved on them by horse or man power. This, however, in each dock would vary with its history, its statutory authorities, and the extent to which, if a railway company which had not constructed it or absorbed it, railway powers were given by the relevant Acts, whether with or without the extension of dock powers. In fact the Act of 1921 contains in Schedule V., clause 9, a provision preserving to railway companies all their dock powers, a provision repeated from the rates and charges orders made before the passing of the Act. Clause 19 of the same schedule appears to prevent docks or shipping places, the charges for the use of which are regulated by Act of Parliament, from being treated by the railway companies as "terminal stations." Clause 11 (vii.) as to "dock charges" is also worthy of attention.

In view of this state of the law and facts, it appears quite impossible to extract from the Act of 1921 and the evidence the division between railways and ancillary businesses of docks which the Tribunal has adopted, and in acting on which it has excluded from consideration charges at dock warehouses or storage spaces, though none of the goods stored in them use railways, and all charges in respect of conveyance on railways in the dock, in whatever circumstances those rails were laid or charges were made for their use.

It follows that a point of law was wrongly decided by the Tribunal. The question is what is to be done. Counsel for the railway companies, while admitting after a time the error in law, urged that it would occasion excessive delay without any real benefit, if the Tribunal which had now fixed a scale of standard charges was required to withdraw it and reverse the whole schedule if a protracted investigation of individual railway docks should show that some charges therein were inadequate. Counsel for the harbour authorities were clearly afraid not so much of this prospect as of the effect on the Court of the prospect, and they said they did not want the schedule sent back and reconsidered, but would be content with a declaration which could be used by them at the next revision of standard charges. Sir John Simon, in the course of the argument before us, submitted a suggested form of declaration which, it is fair to the Tribunal to say, he had not submitted to it. It declares in effect that if accommodation has been provided under Acts authorizing the construction or maintenance of docks, all use of or services rendered in connexion with such accommodation are to be taken as part of the ancillary business of docks. I suppose it involves that if a railway company stores goods which have come by rail in a warehouse on land originally acquired for a dock undertaking, though those goods are never going to be shipped at all, the rent is to fall into dock business. In my view, it is quite impossible to make such a wide declaration which may affect some hundred docks, about whose statutory conditions and working history we know nothing. If a particular dock comes before us, with relevant findings of fact by the Tribunal, we can deal with any questions of law decided by the Tribunal in settling the sphere of the ancillary business ; but in making a general declaration affecting docks, of whose working conditions and statutory conditions we are ignorant, we may easily fall into the most hopeless errors.

I agree with both sides that the Tribunal was wrong in law when, accepting the demarcation between docks and railways submitted by the companies, it declined to take into consideration any matters on the railway side of that line. I agree with both sides that, although this is so, it is not desirable to reopen the whole of the present consideration of inadequacy of charge, with its possible result on the schedule of standard charges. The dock authorities, treating the matter generally, and with very slight reference to particular docks, got some such result as this. The capital invested in railway docks, they said, should have produced £700,000 revenue, and did produce £300,000 ; the amount of inadequacy was £400,000, which should be deducted from standard revenue. But the gross revenue to be raised by standard charges was about 200 millions ; the inadequacy was less than one-quarter per cent. of this, or less than 5s. in the £100, or a little over a halfpenny in the pound. If this inadequacy was spread over a hundred docks, it was minute in each, and there was no attempt to differentiate between particular docks.

It may be said that to decide nothing but that the Tribunal adopted a wrong line of demarcation in its construction of the statute, and to abstain from fixing the right line, does not help the Tribunal, and indeed the Tribunal is disposed to say that it will be impossible to work the Act, if it cannot adopt the line of demarcation in the railway accounts. I sympathise with its difficulties, but I think the answer is that Parliament has, probably without appreciating it, set it a very difficult task, which cannot be performed by treating all the docks of all the companies as one ancillary business to which one rate can be applied without considering the particular facts and statutes and charges of such docks. If when in future they consider, under section 58 (4), the adequacy of charges in ancillary businesses, no one and make a case that those particular charges are inadequate, its task is easy. If such an objector does come, it seems to me that he may be required, in the first instance, to take a particular dock with its particular circumstances and statutory history and make a case that those particular charges are inadequate, the line of dock business being drawn by the particular circumstances of that dock. Generally, without finally committing myself, it seems to me that warehousing, or storing exported or imported goods in the open on dock lands, the use of transit sheds, and services such as coopering, are dock and not railway charges. Charges for conveyance on rails on dock lands raise more difficult questions, and I should want to know how and under what powers the rails were laid down, and what statutes or by-laws are applicable to the rates charged, whether anything is charged for (a) use of the land on which the rails are laid, (b) use of rails so laid, (c) any and what kind of terminal charges, or whether the charge is merely for haulage, also how the expenses of maintenance are provided. I gather that the railway companies agree that such an inquiry would produce quite a different result in the case, for instance, of Southamption, from that in the case of some other docks. The result is that the appeal against the refusal of the Tribunal, by reason of its construction of the Act of 1921, to consider under section 58 (4) of the Act the adequacy of any charges of dock ancillary business other than those covered by Mr. Quirey's definition in answer 15,181, must be allowed because the Tribunal arrived at an erroneous construction of the Act for the reasons stated in its judgment. But the Court does not give any further directions as to reconsideration of adequacy of charges for ancillary business, or revision of the standard charges, which, on the view taken by both sides before us, is undesirable at this stage. When the next revision of charges comes, the Tribunal, if called upon to act under section 58 (4), will have regard to the views expressed in the judgments of the Court as to the legal position.

The appeal must be allowed with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—In view of the admissions made by both parties and the judgments already delivered, I find it unnecessary to give a detailed judgment of my own. I agree with the reasons given by the other members of the Court for allowing the appeal.

There is one matter, however, which I think it desirable to mention. By reason of the wrong construction adopted by the Tribunal as to the extent of the subsidiary business in question it has been unnecessary to consider the precise meaning of the word "adequate" in "adequate charges" in section 58 (4). If ever it has to be considered it will probably be found to entail some consideration of the expenses of the business in respect of which the adequacy of the charges is being investigated. And, if this is so, it may be found that the problem of the delimitation of the dock undertaking will not be solved by merely ascertaining whether charges are dock or railway charges. The expenses of maintaining the dock structure on or in which railway charges are earned may be found to be dock expenses.

THE GOULANDRIS.*

Ship — Salvage — Lloyd's salvage agreement, "No cure no pay"—Maritime lien—Arrest under foreign jurisdiction—Saisie conservatoire—No maritime lien under foreign jurisdiction—Sale of ship by syndic (trustee) in bankruptcy of owner in Egypt—Arrest of ship, after sale, in this country.

The plaintiffs, a firm of salvage contractors, by a writ in rem claimed salvage for services rendered by them to the defendants' steamship under the terms of a salvage agreement in Lloyd's Standard Form, known as "No cure no pay," signed by the master. The agreement expressly provided that in the event of security not being given by the owners of the ship and cargo the salvors should be entitled to take steps to enforce their maritime lien. After the salvage services the ship was arrested in Constantinople, but she was released upon her owner undertaking that she would proceed forthwith to Alexandria and there submit to re-arrest until such time as security was provided. The vessel duly sailed from Constantinople, but before her arrival at Alexandria her owner had become bankrupt in Egypt, and the ship, on reaching the Egyptian port, was seized by his syndic or trustee in bankruptcy, and by that official sold, in the bankruptcy proceedings, to the defendants, free from encumbrances. An order obtained by the plaintiffs for a saisie conservatoire of the ship, in accordance with Egyptian law, was therefore ineffective. The plaintiffs proceeded to arbitration in accordance with the terms of Lloyd's agreement, and having obtained an award in the absence of the shipowners, entered a claim in the bankruptcy in Egypt for the amount of the award. The syndic, however, opposed the claim on the ground that the master had no authority to sign the salvage agreement, and that matter was now pending in the Egyptian Courts. No maritime lien or right in rem is recognized by Egyptian law, or conferred by a saisie conservatoire. After being sold by the syndic the ship came within the jurisdiction of the English Courts, and she was thereupon arrested by the plaintiffs in an action in rem. On a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ in that action,

Held, that the sale by the syndic was not a sale of the res, as a sale on a judgment in an action in rem, which would confer a title free from encumbrances, but was merely a sale of the interest of the bankrupt owner, and therefore a sale cum onere, and could not discharge the maritime lien of the salvors; that the salvors' maritime lien had not been discharged by the signing of the salvage agreement, because although Lloyd's salvage agreement was a bargain to arbitrate, the contract itself was based on the owner of the salved property providing security in the terms of the contract, and the salvors' lien could only be defeated if the whole of the salvage agreement was carried out; and that, in fact, security never had been provided in the terms of the agreement, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to maintain an action and assert their maritime lien.

This was a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ and stay proceedings in an action for salvage brought by the Ocean Salvage and Towage Co., Ltd., against the owners of the steamship Goulandris.

Mr. R. H. Balloch appeared for the defendants in support of the motion; Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. Harold Stranger for the plaintiffs.

In 1925 the Egyptian steamship Carston stranded near the Black Sea entrance of the Bosphorus, and the plaintiffs, the Ocean Salvage and Towage Company, entered into an agreement with the master, on Lloyd's standard form of salvage agreement—"No cure no pay"—to salve her. After the Carston had been refloated the plaintiffs demanded bail in the terms of the salvage agreement, and when security was not forthcoming they arrested the ship at Constantinople. The vessel was, however, released on an undertaking being given that she would proceed forthwith to Alexandria, and there submit to arrest until such time as security had been provided. On behalf of the plaintiffs an order was obtained in Egypt for a saisie conservatoire of the ship, in accordance with Egyptian law, but before the arrival of the ship within Egyptian jurisdiction her then owner had become bankrupt, and when the Carston reached Alexandria she was at once seized by his syndic (or trustee) in bankruptcy, and sold by that official, in the bankruptcy proceedings, to Greek purchasers, the present defendants. The plaintiffs proceeded to arbitration under the terms of the Lloyd's salvage agreement, and in the absence of the shipowner the arbitrator appointed by the committee of Lloyd's (Mr. H. C. S. Dumas) awarded the plaintiffs £1,200 against the Carston and £500 against her cargo. The award against the ship being unsatisfied, the plaintiffs entered a claim in the bankruptcy in Egypt for the amount awarded, but the syndic recommended that the claim should be disallowed, on the ground that the master of the Carston had no authority to sign the salvage agreement. That matter was therefore pending in the Egyptian Courts. The evidence of a French lawyer who was called as a witness was to the effect that no maritime lien or right in rem is recognized by Egyptian law or conferred by a saisie conservatoire.

Upon the Carston—the name of which had been changed by her Greek purchasers to Goulandris—coming within the jurisdiction of the British Courts the plaintiffs, as unsatisfied salvors, issued a writ in rem and sought to arrest her. A solicitor's undertaking to put in bail was, however, given on behalf of the defendants, who now moved to set aside the writ and stay all subsequent proceedings.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—I cannot assent to this motion. The facts of the case seem to be that on November 26, 1925, a vessel, then called the Carston and now called the Goulandris, left Galatz on a voyage with cargo. On November 29 she grounded at a place called Sil Burnu, when services of a salvage character were rendered to her by a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs, the Cleopatra III., a well-known salvage vessel in those waters.

The services were rendered on the well-known Lloyd's form. That form is a "No cure no pay" agreement; that is to say, it is a salvage contract, and provides for security being given by the owners of the ship and cargo. Clause 5 says: "In the event of the security not being provided as aforesaid"—that is, as arranged in the contract—"or in the event of any attempt being made to remove the property salved contrary to this agreement, the contractor may take steps to enforce his aforesaid lien." That is, the maritime lien which he has, of course, on performing the salvage services.

That contract was signed by the master of the Carston on behalf of the owner of the ship and of the cargo, and by the master of the Cleopatra on behalf of the plaintiffs, and under that contract salvage services were rendered, and those services gave the plaintiffs who rendered them a maritime lien on the ship. They were salvage services rendered under a salvage contract.

On November 30 the vessel was refloated and taken to Constantinople. Negotiations then took place with regard to security, but that could not be satisfactorily arranged, and on December 7 the vessel was arrested in the Turkish Courts. Further negotiations followed. The owners of the cargo were very anxious to get the cargo to Alexandria, and the owner of the ship no doubt was also very anxious to get her away from Constantinople, because he was on the verge of bankruptcy. What happened was that the solicitors for the plaintiffs, the well-known firm of Catzeflis and Lattey, managed to arrange, as appears on page 8 (b) of bundle Z, for the arrest at Constantinople to be taken off, and for the ship to proceed with her cargo to Alexandria. The owners of the cargo were going to give security, and the owner of the ship was going to allow the vessel to be seized in Alexandria on what is known as a saisie conservatoire.

The terms are set out on page 8 (b) in this form:—"After a number of long discussions with the shipowner and cargo owners and their underwriters we succeeded in finding the solution to the problem, which we telegraphed to you forthwith in our cablegram of the 12th inst., i.e., to obtain an order for the seizure of the vessel here upon her arrival with the consent of the shipowner, and at the same time to consent to the release of the vessel at Constantinople."

That is amplified in a letter from Mr. Paschalis, who was then the owner of the Carston, which letter is to be found on page 12 of bundle Z. He there says: "With the object solely of permitting the immediate departure of the Carston from Constantinople, and its arrival at Alexandria, as well as the immediate lifting of the embargo placed at present on the said vessel at Constantinople, and under formal reservation of all my rights, and notably of contesting later both the existence, the nature, the necessity and the extent of the services alleged to have been rendered by the Ocean Salvage Company, and the amount of the remuneration claimed by it, I agree to allow that the embargo placed by this latter on the s.s. Carston at Constantinople may be renewed on the arrival of the Carston at Alexandria in the form of a new conservative seizure, in guarantee of my contributive share of the average in question, in the event of its being eventually recognized as founded by the Mixed Tribunal, and that up to the maximum sum of £E2,500. In consequence, I authorize formally and irrevocably by these presents the Ocean Salvage Company to proceed immediately to obtain an order authorizing it to seize conservatively the s.s. Carston on its arrival at the port of Alexandria, whither I undertake to bring it immediately and directly from Constantinople, and I debar myself either from taking my ship from the said port of Alexandria, before I have furnished an equivalent guarantee, or from demanding the lifting of the above-mentioned conservative seizure under any pretext, and notably under the pretext that I may myself be domiciled at Alexandria, the home port of the Carston, and this until the full settlement of the dispute before the Mixed Tribunal of Alexandria."

So the owner was saying that he gave the plaintiffs an equivalent to the arrest in Constantinople by this conservative seizure in Alexandria.

That was assented to, and on December 24 the order so attaching the vessel was obtained from the Court, although the vessel had not then arrived.

On January 12—all this was done by cable—the Ocean Salvage and Towage Company, Limited, wrote to Lloyd's saying: "We beg to inform you that in respect of the salvage services rendered by us to the s.s. Carston we have now accepted the following arrangement with regard to the guarantee:—

"1. Messrs. P. Wigham Richardson and Co., Limited, open guarantee.

"2. Shippers at Alexandria on behalf of Hamburg interests, £3,000.

"3. Mr. C. D. Paschalis, attachment of ship at Alexandria.

"We have, therefore, wired to Constantinople to-day as follows: 'Carston. Satisfactory arrangements guarantee settled. Give captain our written consent to proceed Alexandria subject to immediate arrest of ship at that port.'"

It is pretty clear from those documents that the arrangement was that the arrest in Constantinople should be lifted on the terms that a similar arrest should be provided at Alexandria and give the same results at Alexandria, so as to protect the plaintiffs for the amount of their maritime lien. Thus the vessel escaped from Constantinople and got to Alexandria.

She was released on January 14 or 16, 1926, as appears by a judgment of the Constantinople Court. But subsequently she was arrested by other creditors, and did not in fact get away till February.

In the meantime, on January 27, the plaintiffs' solicitors in Alexandria wired to the plaintiffs: "Carston shipowner declared bankrupt and order to seize vessel here ineffective, as she passes into Receiver's hands. If possible detain vessel Constantinople as question of privilege not certain here."

I think I am justified in assuming that that is an accurate statement of the facts; that at that date Mr. Paschalis, the owner, was declared bankrupt, and his offer, which had been accepted, to give a similar security by arrest of the ship at Alexandria became quite ineffective. The result was that the arrangement which the plaintiffs had made to release the ship in Constantinople in exchange for a similar arrest in Alexandria came to nothing.

The ship, in fact, did not leave Constantinople till about February 16. From that cable it appears that the Carston had left before it was possible to re-arrest her. It is dated February 16, and that is why I say she left by February 16. It says: "Carston left before re-arrest. Endeavour arrest Alexandria." That, of course, was hopeless, when once the owner had gone bankrupt.

On February 18 the solicitors for the plaintiffs in England, Messrs. Downing, Middleton and Lewis, wrote to Messrs. Catzeflis and Lattey, in Alexandria, the letter of that date on page 22:—"Our clients were not able to re-arrest the ship before she left Constantinople. There is no doubt our clients have a maritime lien on the ship for salvage services, and they propose to exercise that lien irrespective of whatever hands the steamer may get into, unless in the meantime we are able to get security for the ship's proportion of the salvage. And it may be desirable to warn any buyer that that is the position, and you might also let the Receiver know."

So as early as February, 1926, the position which the plaintiffs took and take up was made plain to the gentleman in charge of the bankruptcy. If those orders were carried out—and I have not the least doubt they would be—the position which the plaintiffs were going to take up had been definitely decided.

Then on February 21 the steamer arrived in Alexandria. It is quite true that in Mr. Mathias's affidavit, paragraph 5, he says that Mr. Paschalis was only declared bankrupt on March 22. There it says "declared bankrupt by definitive judgment." Whether that was some formula that was finally concluded on March 22, though in fact he had gone bankrupt early in January, I do not know, but I do not think there is the least doubt that the bankruptcy began in January.

On April 8 Mr. Mathias, who was the syndic, or as we should call him, I suppose, the Trustee in Bankruptcy, appointed to carry out the bankruptcy, made an application to the Juge Commissaire—(what exactly his position is I am not sure; in some of the documents he is called "Registrar")—asking for an order authorizing him to object to the above-mentioned dispute being settled by arbitration. That was the dispute as to the salvage, under the agreement that had been made by the master of the ship when he was in trouble in November, 1925.

The attitude of the Trustee in Bankruptcy representing the bankrupt from that time forward has always been that any arbitration under that "No cure no pay" agreement was null and void. On May 5 he wrote to Messrs. Philippides and Co., Alexandria, who were the representatives of the owners of the cargo, sending them certain documents in connexion with the negotiations which were going on with regard to the arbitration, and he said: "Please note that the above mentioned information is furnished to you for your own defence, for, as I have already intimated to you, I have advised the Ocean Salvage Association that I consider that the arbitration now pending is null and void as far as I am concerned." And he repeats that in substance in document "Z" at pages 24, 26 and 27. So it is quite clear that the attitude which the syndic was taking up with regard to settling the dispute by any arbitration was null and void so far as he was concerned.

An arbitration was, in fact, held on August 26 before Mr. Dumas, a well-known practitioner of great experience, and he made his award on that date. The award does not recite who was represented—whether the owners of the ship as well as the owners of the cargo were represented—but I am told by Mr. Dunlop—and I do not think there is any doubt about it, because his client, I understand, has informed him, and he was present at the arbitration—that nobody appeared on behalf of the ship in that arbitration, and only the owners of the cargo and the plaintiffs were present, and discussed the case there. The award is made by Mr. Dumas in these terms: "I find that salvage services were rendered by the contractors to the steamship Carston and her cargo, and I assess the amount payable to the contractors by the owners of the Carston at the sum of £1,250 (One thousand two hundred and fifty pounds) and the amount payable to the contractors by the owners of the cargo of the Carston at the sum of £500 (Five hundred pounds); and I further award and direct that the owners of the cargo of the Carston do pay their own and the contractors' costs of the hearing before me," &c. So the costs of the arbitration were confined to the only persons before the arbitrator, which bears out the statement that there was nobody there on behalf of the ship. But the amount payable to the contractors was stated to be £1,250 as far as the ship was concerned.

Then on August 31, five days afterwards, there was a creditors' meeting, at which was discussed the sale of this vessel by the syndic, who had on August 24 asked the Court for permission to sell the ship. That appears in document "E." It does not say whether the plaintiffs were at that meeting or not. It does not appear anywhere in the proceedings that they were there. The creditors present agreed to a sale in accordance with the deed and formalities put before them. That sale was completed by documents on September 3, and finally allowed by the Court on September 13. I say allowed by the Court, because that is the date on which the confirmation of the sale by the Court took place.

Now the sale was a sale by the syndic, and was no doubt approved by the Court, but it was certainly not a sale after a judgment in rem. The Trustee in Bankruptcy had applied to the Court for permission to sell, and he got permission to sell, and it was sold in accordance with the practice of the Court, and it was approved by the Court ; but it was not a sale by the Court in the sense that it was a sale on a judgment in rem, which would be a sale of the thing as it stood, and not merely a sale of such interests as the parties to whom it belonged had in it. I cannot think there is any doubt about that. It was a sale such as any other Trustee in Bankruptcy would make, namely, a sale of the interest of the debtor, such as it was. In other words, it was a sale cum onere. When you look at the terms of the contract I think that is made clear.

First of all it begins in Article 1 with these words : "Mr. Ferdinand Mathias, acting with the express consent of Mr. Ch. D. Paschalis, sells, cedes and makes over to Messrs. Leonidas Dambassis and Antoine Diapoulis, who accept it subject to the reservations in the following article." So the Trustee in Bankruptcy sold the ship to the present defendants upon the terms of the articles in this document with the approval of the Court. Article 2 is : "Mr. Ferdinand Mathias in his capacity as above, guarantees that the vessel is at present and will be handed over to the buyers in the condition as shown in the two certificates from the English Lloyd's at Alexandria." Article 5 says :—"The vendor,"—that is, Mr. Mathias —"acting in his capacity as above, takes upon himself the exclusive liability for, and agrees to pay to the brokers," &c. Article 6 is :—"Mr. F. Mathias, in his capacity as above, declares that the bankrupt, Ch. D. Paschalis, is the owner of the vessel Carston, he having acquired the vessel by his own moneys according to a contract dated the twenty-second of June One thousand nine hundred and twenty-one from the Bathampton Steam Navigation Company, Limited, of Cardiff. In addition, he declares that as concerns the buyers the said vessel is free of all charges in general of whatever kind. The vendor, acting in his capacity as above, guarantees the buyers that they will not have to submit to any proceedings on the part of Mr. Paschalis's creditors, undertaking, under penalty of the cancellation of the contract, to obtain the withdrawal of any seizure of the vessel." Then Article 7 is :—"Mr. F. Mathias, acting in his capacity as above, declares that the present sale is authorized by the Juge Commissaire (Registrar) in the bankruptcy of Mr. Charalambo D. Paschalis, in accordance with a decree dated the twenty-fifth of August, One thousand nine hundred and twenty-six. . . . He states that the present sale is subject to the definite confirmation of the Mixed Tribunal of Commerce of Alexandria."

As I understand it, that is a sale by the Trustee in Bankruptcy, guaranteeing that the buyers will not have to submit to any proceedings on the part of Mr. Paschalis's creditors, and if he fails to make that good no doubt he will be liable to the buyers for breach of his guarantee.

I ought perhaps just to draw attention to the letter of September 3 attached to Mr. Hadoulis's affidavit, in which it is made quite clear that the negotiation of the sale was an ordinary negotiation of the sale of a ship, brokers acting on one side and on the other—Messrs. Embiricos acting for the present defendants, and Messrs. Griffiths, Tate and Co. acting apparently for the syndic. Mr. Hadoulis says in terms in his affidavit : "The sale was made with the approval of the liquidator in the Egyptian bankruptcy proceedings, and I was given to understand that the sale gave to my clients a title to the vessel free of all charges and incumbrances." And if one looks at the document itself one sees at once that the terms are that the syndic guarantees freedom from claims by creditors.

When you look at Mr. Mathias's affidavit with regard to this, he says, in paragraph 6 : "The s.s. Carston was properly sold to Messrs. L. Dambassis and A. Diapoulis, according to a notarial act executed before the Greffier-Notaire of the Mixed Tribunal of Alexandria, September 13, 1926, for the sum of £10,250. The said sale was homologated by judgment of September 15, 1926. The proceeds of sale after deduction of certain expenses were deposited with the cash department of the Mixed Tribunal for subsequent distribution among creditors."

Then on October 18 the plaintiffs, being unable to enforce their rights except by action in the Courts of Alexandria, or get any security at all—they could put forward their claim, no doubt, in the bankruptcy and be met by the syndic saying that the arbitration contract was null and void—caught the ship in Hull and issued their writ, and claimed, as I think they were entitled to claim, a maritime lien on the property. They caught the res and issued their writ, and it is that writ that the defendants are trying to set aside on the ground that they have bought the ship free of all incumbrances. They say that for that and other reasons the writ ought to be set aside.

On the following day, October 19, it is said by Mr. Mathias that the Ocean Salvage Company, the plaintiffs, put in a claim in the bankruptcy for the salvage, and, as he states, that had been referred to the Court.

On October 26 Messrs. Catzeflis and Lattey wired to the plaintiffs saying : "Carston receiver disposed settle five hundred pounds stop If you succeed seizing vessel and purchasers disposed furnish you banks guarantee we recommend you insist payment subject decision English Court as arbitration submission attackable Egyptian Courts." If that is right, it seems that not only can the syndic say the arbitration is null and void, but he can say the whole agreement to arbitrate may be set aside, and there was some suggestion before me that a point could be taken, and would be taken, in the Egyptian Court that the master of the ship had no authority to bind the owner, and that the whole foundation of the "No cure no pay" agreement had gone. What the position may be in the Alexandrian Courts I really do not know ; I am not sufficiently informed about the matter ; but at any rate it seems quite clear that the plaintiffs have no security of any sort or kind in Alexandria. They have only the claim, which may or may not turn out to be good, against the proceeds of the bankrupt's estate in the hands of Mr. Mathias.

There is only one other telegram that I think I need refer to, and that is one on January 13, 1927. The warning which the plaintiffs had given to their solicitors in Alexandria to tell anybody that they were going to insist upon their maritime lien on this vessel was conveyed by them to these very defendants. Apparently the same solicitors acted for these defendants in Alexandria in connexion with the sale. The telegram is this : "Carston Goulandris on thirteenth September Dambassis and Diapoulis personally consulted us upon draft purchase contract and after informing them of possible seizures by creditors including Ocean Salvage they instructed us to attempt insert clause for indemnification by vendors in event of seizure stop We drafted necessary clauses but same refused by vendors and purchasers accepted vendors terms and contract duly executed and registered same day stop Can send affidavit giving full facts if necessary."

So it appears that when the present defendants bought the ship they had full warning of the possible claim by the Ocean Salvage Company for their salvage services. They did not get the clauses which their advisers had drawn up for them inserted in the contract, but it looks as if they had something towards that in the terms of the guarantee which I read out some time ago.

That—so far as I think it is necessary to go into it—is the order of events in this case.

Mr. Balloch, for the defendants, takes, as I understand, four, or possibly five points, which he says entitle him to have this writ set aside.

The first point that he takes is this : Lloyd's form of salvage contract (" No cure no pay ") prevents the plaintiffs from bringing an action for salvage. He says that it is just the same as in The Solway Prince (12 The Times L.R., 184 ; [1896] P., 120), where the contract by the salving vessel to salve a ship made with the insurers of the vessel excluded them from any right to sue the ship herself when the insurers became bankrupt and failed to pay. I think the two cases are totally different. In The Solway Prince (supra) there was a contract between the salvors and the insurers to do a particular work at a particular price. It meant, therefore, that the salvors were not volunteers. It was not a " No cure no pay " contract, and inasmuch as they were not volunteers there could not be any salvage. In the present case the contract was a contract to salve " No cure no pay," with all the attending consequences if salving services are performed of there being a maritime lien on the property in favour of the salvors ; and that maritime lien on the property has never been put an end to by any action of a competent Court or by any bargain which has been fulfilled between the parties.

Then Mr. Balloch also says that it is a contract by the owner of the ship, and no one else, for remuneration in a mode specified. It is perfectly true that the bargain of " No cure no pay " in Lloyd's form is a bargain to go to arbitration and have the thing settled by an arbitrator out of court, but it seems to me that the contract itself, by clause 1 and clause 5 together, is based on the owner of the salved property providing security in the terms of the contract, and if he does not provide security then the contractor may take steps to enforce his lien, namely by the Court. There is no other way of enforcing his lien. He cannot enforce his lien except through the Court. In the very terms of the contract it is provided that if no security is furnished by the owner of the salved property the plaintiffs may resort to the Court to enforce their maritime lien. The truth is that the salvors have a right against the ship which can only be defeated if the whole of the salvage agreement, " No cure no pay," is carried out. I think the real answer to Mr. Balloch's point here is that the owners of the salved property as far as the ship is concerned never put up any security at all in accordance with the terms of the contract. They did not implement the bargain.

It is also said by Mr. Balloch that the plaintiffs did get the security for which they bargained, because they only bargained for a saisie conservatoire, and that they got. I think perhaps they got an order for a saisie conservatoire, though they never actually got seizure. Certainly, in my view, what they bargained for was not a mere paper saisie conservatoire, but an effective arrest of the property equal in value to the arrest in Constantinople, which would ensure their obtaining payment from any award that was made. I think the terms of their letter show that they only released her in Constantinople on terms of arrest in Alexandria. I think " arrest " there means arrest as we understand it—an effective arrest which will produce security .

Then Mr. Balloch says that the security which they got was good security, because by means of the sale by the syndic the proceeds of the ship were put into Court and made available for any claim which they might have. I do not think that is the meaning of what was done or a carrying out of the intention of the parties. No doubt the property of the bankrupt went into a common fund and the plaintiffs would have some rights against it as distinct from their maritime lien. That language itself seems to me to be only giving them a partial remedy instead of a complete one.

Then his next point was that the award by Mr. Dumas was a binding award against the owners, or an award which could be made binding on them, and which could be made a rule of Court, and that in effect the rights of the salvors were merged in what is equivalent to a judgment. He cited the cases of The Sylph (L.R. 2 A. and E., 24) and The Charles Amelia (L.R. 2 A. and E., 330). He admitted that The Sylph (supra) and The Charles Amelia (supra) were dead against him, but he sought to distinguish them—on, as I thought, slight grounds. He tried to distinguish them on the ground that there was some reservation in each case. But I think Mr. Dunlop was right in saying that really they were on all-fours with this case, and conclude the matter.

In the case of The Charles Amelia (supra) the defendants had given a bill of exchange, and had been allowed to go away with the ship. The ship came to England, and although the bill of exchange had been given it had not been paid, and it was held that the plaintiffs had not lost their lien for damage, either by laches or by the subsequent sale of the vessel. The case of The Sylph (supra) was an action for personal injuries. The plaintiff went to arbitration and was awarded compensation. He, however, never was paid, and he sued in Admiralty, and it was held that he was entitled to do so. The reservations in both cases I do not think amount to any more than would be implied in law if, on a bargain, one side failed to carry out or make good its part of the bargain. I think in this case the owner of the ship distinctly failed to make good his part of the bargain to give security for the plaintiffs' claim.

Mr. Balloch further contended that the award in itself was a good defence ; but if the award is not performed, and so far from being performed it is contested in every possible way, as far as one can see, it is no defence at all to an action in rem.

His next contention was that the sale by the syndic under the authority of the Court in Egypt was as good as a sale in an action in rem. Now my first observation with regard to that is this. It was not a sale in an action in rem because the action of the syndic had nothing whatever to do with an action in rem. Secondly, the sale does not purport to be by the Court; it is a sale by the syndic with the approval of the Court. Nor does it purport to be any decision as to the property in the ship. It transfers property no doubt; that is to say, such interests in the property as the debtor may have had, but it does not purport to decide the rights in the property.

Then Mr. Balloch said that according to Castrique v. Imrie (L.R., 4 H.L., 414), a sale by the Court in France is just the same as a sale in rem. I do not think that is the proper result of Castrique v. Imrie (supra). I think Castrique v. Imrie (supra) was a decision that what had happened in that case was the same as a sale in an action in rem. I think here the facts are quite different, and I do not think the sale in this case has any resemblance to a sale in an action in rem.

Mr. Dunlop cited on the other side Abbott, 14th Edition, pages 1012 and 1013, and quoted this passage:—"In the case of a judgment in personam"—and at most that is what this is, if it is anything at all, because according to the evidence there is no proceeding in rem in the Egyptian Court—"the Court does nothing more than issue process against the property of the defendant, and if the officer of the Court should sell a particular chattel as being the defendant's property, there is nothing to prevent a third person impeaching such sale and setting up a claim to the chattel. All the Court does in such circumstances is to sell the defendant's interest, if any, in the particular chattel. In the case of a judgment in rem the Court directs that the res, and not the defendant's interest in the res, be sold. In other words, it determines on the disposition and status of the res. To this extent a judgment in rem binds third parties." And so far as I know it is only a judgment in rem that does bind third parties.

Then Mr. Dunlop followed that up by quoting Parson's Law of Shipping, Vol. II., chapter X., page 332; The Nestor (1 Sumner's Rep. (Amer.), 73), and The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moore P.C., 267), and Daniell's Chancery Practice, 8th edition, page 939—all much to the same effect.

He further said that he relied on the origin of a maritime lien as shown in The Bold Buccleugh (supra), The Ripon City (14 The Times L.R., 219; [1897] P., 226), and in The Tervaete (38 The Times L.R., 460, 825; [1922] P., 259), showing that a maritime lien is something more than a mere right in rem. It is described in The Bold Buccleugh (supra) as a kind of property; it is described in The Ripon City (supra) as a jus in re aliena; and it is described in The Tervaete (supra) as a subtraction from the interests of the owner. But whatever form of words is used, there is no question that it is something more than a mere right in rem, and I think Mr. Dunlop was right in saying that in order to get rid of it you must have a decision in an action in rem or something equivalent to it. The only other ways in which you can get rid of it are by saying that you are impleading the Sovereign State or the Sovereign of this country is being impleaded, or by showing laches. He says those are the only ways in which you can get rid of a maritime lien, and as far as I know he is right. Castrique v. Imrie (supra) itself draws this distinction between a sale in rem and a judgment in personam.

In this connexion the law of Egypt was referred to, and I had before me Mr. Duhamel, who gave me a great deal of assistance with regard to the law in France, and helped in the discussion of the Egyptian Code. I think that if a ship is sold by the Egyptian Court it must be sold in accordance with the Code de Commerce Maritime. As Mr. Dunlop said, there are only certain privileged claims, salvage not being amongst them, which are dealt with in the sales by the Court, and certain formalities must be carried out before they extinguish the privileged claims.

Article 5 sets out what are privileged claims. Article 7 says how the privileges of creditors are extinguished by a sale, but as that only refers to those privileged claims in Article 5 it has no relation to the extinction of a claim which does not come under Article 5. And salvage certainly does not come under Article 5. As he says, it is only privileged claims of the classes set out in Article 5 which are extinguished. Salvage is not one of those, and therefore a salvage claim is not extinguished by such a sale. Therefore, under Article 4 the salvor has the right to follow the property notwithstanding that there has been a sale.

Furthermore, if you have to find some right of salvage in the Egyptian Code, it must be under section 729 of the Code Civil Mixte; but, as he says, that is only a common law right—for work and labour done. It is quite a different right from salvage as we understand it. And there is nowhere to be found in any of these codes any right in rem, or any maritime lien for salvage at all. Therefore his points are that this is not a sale by the Court at all, and if it is a sale at all it does not extinguish the salvor's lien.

Lastly, Mr. Balloch says that under the circumstances in this case, where the plaintiffs have the power of putting forward a claim against the proceeds of this bankrupt's estate in Alexandria, and where they have done what they have in regard to releasing the vessel in Constantinople and arranging for her re-arrest, so to speak, in Alexandria, it would be inequitable after the sale to his clients that the plaintiffs should be allowed to follow the ship again here. I do not agree. As the plaintiffs have a maritime lien on the ship and find her here when they have been kept out—I will not use any other expression—of their security, and when they have not any means of getting their claim secured elsewhere, and find the ship in the hands of somebody else who must have known the danger and risk which he ran in purchasing such a vessel, I do not think there is much want of equity in saying that he should take the consequences.

That really is not a plea to jurisdiction. It is a plea to the exercise of it. The remedy here, it seems to me, would be quite different from the remedy available in Egypt, if any, and therefore it does not come within cases, like The Christiansborg (1 The Times L.R., 634; 10 P.D., 141), of lis alibi pendens, or double vexation of the defendant. Of course, it cannot be double vexation in a case of this sort, because it is really a different defendant, if and when the defendant appears.

I have tried to deal with all the arguments as well as I could without reserving my judgment.

There is one other matter to which I ought perhaps to refer, and that is this. The award of Mr. Dumas is unsatisfied. It is just like a judgment that is unsatisfied. That is at the highest. It could not be put higher than to say it is just like a judgment that is unsatisfied. If a judgment at common law in personam were unsatisfied with regard to the claim for salvage, there would be no question but that the plaintiffs could issue a writ and sue in this Court to enforce their maritime lien. I think that is clear from The John and Mary (Swabey, 471) and The Bengal (Swabey, 468), and also The Sylph (supra).

I think I have covered all the arguments for the defendants.

In my judgment the motion fails, and should be dismissed, with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1927. Feb. 23.

GLASKIE v. WATKINS.*

Practice — Short Cause list — Moneylender's action—Disputed claim—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XIV., Rule 8.

In a moneylender's action properly brought before the Judge or Master at Chambers on a specially indorsed writ supported by an affidavit in proper form the Judge or Master still retains the full jurisdiction, under Order XIV. of the Rules of Court, to direct a disputed claim for interest, alleged to be excessive, to be sent to the Short Cause list for trial, but that jurisdiction ought to be exercised very sparingly and only in simple and plain cases.

Bennett v. Stubbs ([1926] 1 K.B., 272) not followed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, a moneylender, from an order of Mr. Justice Swift at Chambers affirming an order of Master Ball refusing to direct an action to be tried in the Short Cause list.

The plaintiff had issued a writ against the defendant claiming to recover £325, the balance of the amount of a promissory note for £750 dated July 28, 1926, made by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff by equal consecutive monthly instalments of £125 each, commencing August 28, 1926.

The defendant, by his affidavit, said that he had repaid the plaintiff the sum of £425, leaving a balance in respect of principal of £75. He further said that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and was such that a Court of Equity would grant relief. He asked for leave to defend the action on its merits; for relief under the Moneylenders Act, 1900; and to have the matter reopened and to be relieved from payment of any sum in excess of the amount fairly due to the plaintiff.

On the hearing of the summons under Order XIV. the Master gave judgment for £75, the balance of the principal owing, and gave leave to defend as to the balance. He refused an application by the plaintiff to send the case to the Short Cause list for trial, holding that he was precluded from doing so by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bennett v. Stubbs ([1926] 1 K.B., 272).

On appeal, the Judge at Chambers, also considering himself bound by Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. R. F. Levy appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Woodgate for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Swift in Chambers affirming an order of a Master. The appeal, which has been very fully argued on both sides, raises an important point of practice. The question is whether there is any decision of the Court of Appeal which renders it impossible for a Master or a Judge in Chambers to order a disputed claim in a moneylender's action—where the claim for interest is disputed on the ground that it is excessive—to be tried in the Short Cause list.

It is very important to bear in mind what the contention put forward on behalf of the respondent in this case involves, because if that contention is to prevail, it will deprive the plaintiff of a statutory right, and the Judge in Chambers and the Master of a statutory jurisdiction which is conferred on them by the Rules of the Supreme Court.

To make that point plain I will refer quite shortly to a few of the rules. First of all there is Order III., Rule 6, which provides that if a case comes within those provisions a plaintiff may specially indorse his writ, and if a writ is specially indorsed, and the plaintiff has followed the directions of the rules by making a sufficient affidavit, two consequences follow, as it seems to me: one is that the plaintiff has the statutory right under the rules to take proceedings for summary judgment under Order XIV. That arises from the fact that he has got a specially indorsed writ, and he has made a sufficient affidavit. The next consequence is that, the plaintiff having that right and having exercised it, the rules confer a statutory jurisdiction upon the Master or Judge, as the case may be, to deal with the application which comes before him in certain specified ways. He may, if he has jurisdiction, give judgment for the full amount. In a proper case he has jurisdiction to give judgment for a part of the amount, and to give leave to defend as to another part of the amount. Then Rule 4 of Order XIV. directs: "If it appear that the defence set up by the defendant applies only to a part of the plaintiff's claim, or that any part of his claim is admitted, the plaintiff shall have judgment forthwith for such part of his claim as the defence does not apply to or as is admitted, subject to such terms . . . as the Judge may think fit." Therefore the matter is not discretionary in such a case, subject to the terms that the Judge may enforce, but the rule directs that if there is no defence to a part of the claim the plaintiff shall have judgment for that part. Then the Judge also has jurisdiction given him where a matter comes before him on a summary application, among other things under Rule 8, to give directions as to how the case shall be tried and where it shall be tried, and, in a proper case, to order it to be put into the Short Cause list to be tried. There is another rule giving the Judge jurisdiction, Rule 9 (b), where the plaintiff makes an application: "Where the case is not within the Order, or where the plaintiff, in the opinion of the Judge, knew that the defendant relied on a contention which would entitle him to unconditional leave to defend, the application may be dismissed with costs to be paid forthwith by the plaintiff."

It seems to me that those rules give the Judge or Master a certain statutory jurisdiction in every case which is brought before him, because the writ is a specially indorsed writ, and the plaintiff has made a proper and sufficient affidavit. The contention, therefore, that the Master or Judge has no jurisdiction to order the contested part of a moneylender's claim, the part in reference to interest, to be tried in the Short Cause list is in substance saying that something has happened which has deprived the Judge and the Master of that jurisdiction. Now where do you find anything that can have deprived them? The only possible contention—I do not in the least agree with it—as it seems to me, is the one advanced by counsel in Wells v. Allott (20 The Times L.R., 799; [1904] 2 K.B., 842), that the effect of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, to put it in his language, was to oust Order XIV. The only way in which it could oust Order XIV. would be by construing the Moneylenders Act, 1900, as altering a claim of a moneylender upon a bill from a claim for a liquidated amount into a claim for an unliquidated amount. That, in substance, was the contention of counsel in Wells v. Allott (supra). It was not accepted, and, in my opinion, as a contention going to the jurisdiction it is an impossible contention. So far, therefore, as there is anything in the Moneylenders Act, 1900, which deprives the Judge or the Master of the jurisdiction which the rules confer upon him, in my opinion there is nothing in that Act which can possibly support such a contention. That being so, the question we have to consider is, Is there any decision of this Court which binds us to say—whether we agree with it or whether we do not agree with it—that the Judge or Master has been deprived of that portion of his jurisdiction which would have enabled him to make an order that the case should be dealt with in the Short Cause list? That drives one to consider not only what the real effect of the decision in Bennett v. Stubbs ([1926] 1 K.B., 272) is, but whether Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) is itself in conflict with other decisions of this Court, and, if so, which of the two sets of decisions we think that we ought to accept as being the law.

In Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) the judgment of the Master of the Rolls is founded upon his view of the judgment of the former Master of the Rolls, Lord Collins, in Wells v. Allott (supra). Speaking with all respect, it seems to me that the language of Lord Collins in that case has been considered without reference to the facts of the case about which the learned Master of the Rolls was expressing his view. In Wells v. Allott (supra) the case was one where there was a specially indorsed writ. It was one in which when the defendant put in his affidavit under Order XIV. he admitted that a portion of the principal was still due, and he contested the claim for the interest on the ground that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable. Mr. Matthews has sought to draw a distinction between Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) and the other cases upon the ground that there is a difference where a defendant in his affidavit admits that some of the principal is due. With submission, I do not think that that is a real distinction, since, if the Judge has jurisdiction to deal with the case because the writ is a specially indorsed writ, it seems to me to be immaterial whether, when the defendant comes to split up the claim into principal and interest, he is not in a position to dispute that some of the principal still remains unpaid; however, those were the facts in Wells v. Allott (supra), and the Master had given leave to sign judgment for the admitted amount of the principal and a certain amount of interest. I need not trouble about that, but he gave the defendant leave to defend as to the general claim for interest. On an appeal from that order the moneylender swore an affidavit which set out his grounds for contending that there was no foundation for suggesting that the bargain was harsh and unconscionable, and thereupon Mr. Justice Phillimore discharged the order of the Master and gave the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment for the full amount claimed. The question before the Court of Appeal was whether that was a right order, and what the Master of the Rolls and the other members of the Court had to deal with was whether in a case where the defendant admitted part of the claim but swore an affidavit which disclosed a prima facie defence as to the rest of the claim an order ought to be made under Order XIV., either for judgment or in any other form except giving the defendant unconditional leave to defend. It was in reference to that view, and that state of facts, that the Master of the Rolls used the language which he did use. He says at page 846 of the report in [1904] 2 K.B.: "It is clear in the present case that there is prima facie a debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff," and that was the reason why he allowed that part of the Master's order which had given judgment to stand; but how could that be if the contention is right that there is something in the Moneylenders' Act, 1900, which would deprive the Master or the Judge of his jurisdiction to deal with the claim at all under Order XIV. proceedings? Then he goes on and uses the expression to which the Master of the Rolls in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) has referred, and which is really the foundation of the Master of the Rolls' judgment. He says this: "The procedure under Order XIV. is meant to give a short and speedy remedy for the recovery of debts which are either admitted to be due or as to which there is no defence. But where in a particular class of case a special jurisdiction is given to the Court by the Moneylenders Act, 1900, to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled in the circumstances to recover what is a prima facie debt"—he is there obviously only referring to the claim in that particular case for the interest—"it seems to me to be clear that that class of case is taken out of Order XIV." One seldom criticizes the language of so accurate a Judge as Lord Collins, but when he speaks of a case being taken out of Order XIV. it does require some explanation as to what exactly he means. The Master of the Rolls, I think, in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) has interpreted that as meaning that the Judge or the Master has no longer any jurisdiction to deal with it. It cannot be that Lord Collins used the expression in that sense because in this very case he restored the order of the Master which had given the plaintiff judgment for part of his claim, the admitted part; and when this language of Lord Collins is read in reference to the facts of the case it seems to me really not possible to place the interpretation upon his language which Mr. Woodgate asks us to place upon it, or which the Master of the Rolls in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) did place upon it. So much for Wells v. Allott (supra).

I need not really refer to Dott v. Bonnard (21 The Times L.R., 166) or Tumin v. Levi (28 The Times L.R., 125) because in neither of those cases is there anything of real assistance upon the point that we have to decide. In one case the question was whether any order should be made under Order XIV., the defendant having in fact alleged in his affidavit that he had paid or more than paid the whole claim of the plaintiff moneylender for principal and interest. Of course it is perfectly obvious that in face of that affidavit no order under Order XIV. in the sense of an order giving judgment could be made. In the other case there was the battle of the two Divisions. The borrower there brought an action in Chancery to set aside the whole bargain upon the ground that it was harsh and unconscionable. After that proceeding had commenced the plaintiff took out a specially indorsed writ and took proceedings under Order XIV., and the question really turned upon what was the right procedure to follow in those circumstances. It is quite true that there was some difference of opinion between the Chancery members of the Court and Lord Justice Kennedy. The former were very strongly inclined to the view that such a case as that particular one could not possibly be dealt with satisfactorily in the Short Cause list, though Lord Justice Kennedy was not at all convinced upon that point, but, as it seems to me, in that case nothing was said which bears directly upon the question that we have to consider or is if any real assistance. There are three other cases, all of them decisions of this Court, which are very material. I think the problem which is presented to us is whether we should accept the decisions in those cases in preference to the decision in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) if it goes as far as Mr. Woodgate contends.

The first of those cases was Lazarus v. Smith (24 The Times L.R., 592; [1908] 2 K.B., 266). There it is material, as Lord Justice Scrutton has pointed out, that Lord Cozens-Hardy was a party to the decision, and he had also been a party to the decision of Wells v. Allott (supra). There the facts were that there was a claim by a moneylender and a specially indorsed writ. The defendant by his affidavit set up the defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900. The Master gave leave to the plaintiff to sign judgment for the sum of £40, being the amount admittedly due from the defendant in respect of the sum actually advanced, and gave leave to the defendant to defend for the residue of the claim, and ordered the action to be placed in the Short Cause list for trial, and this order was confirmed by Mr. Justice Ridley in Chambers. Mr. Chaytor was for the defendant in the appeal, and his contention (at p. 267) was: "In a moneylender's action, where the borrower sets up a defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, Order XIV. has no application: Wells v. Allott (supra)." That means to say that it has no application for any purpose either for giving judgment for a portion of the principal, or for giving directions, or for ordering the case to be put in the Short Cause list, or for any other purpose. That was his main contention. Then he went on: "It is true that the only question there was as to the claim for interest, but the principle of that decision extends to the whole claim." Upon that the then Master of the Rolls, Lord Cozens-Hardy, says at page 268: "I have no desire or intention to depart from one word that I uttered in Wells v. Allott (supra), and in what I then said I was merely following and adopting the language of the then Master of the Rolls. I desire to make it quite clear that my view is that in any case in which an issue has to be decided under the Moneylenders Act that is a matter which ought to be dealt with at the trial of the action, and not by summary judgment under Order XIV." Now, is he there saying anything more than this: You ought not to give a summary judgment under Order XIV., and a summary judgment is an order for judgment; you ought not to do that where the defendant raises an issue under the Moneylenders Act, 1900? In other words, he is saying that the defendant took it upon himself to swear that the interest charged was excessive and exorbitant. That must be accepted as establishing a prima facie case, a prima facie case which entitles him to defend, and entitles him, therefore, to have his case tried, but it says nothing as to the tribunal which shall try it or the directions as to the mode of trial, or anything which suggests that a short cause is not a proper way of trying a very simple case. Lord Justice Kennedy uses language to exactly the same effect. He says at page 269: "It seems to me that, while it is our duty to maintain in all proceedings in which the Moneylenders Act comes into operation everything necessary to make the Act effective, it would be going beyond anything which that Act either demands or authorizes to say that Order XIV. does not apply to an admitted debt—a debt which is admitted quite irrespective of any matter with which that Act has to deal. Here the defendant is in a position in which he must admit that, even if this loan had been given without any terms as to interest, it has not been repaid to the extent of £40. It cannot be right, if Order XIV. is to be used at all, to hold that, where there is an admitted debt as to part of the claim, Rule 4 is not to apply, whether it is a moneylender's claim or the claim of any other creditor. The Moneylenders Act only relates to transactions which can be reopened and modified under its provisions, and what would be reopened and modified under those provisions is not the amount of an admitted debt apart from all questions of bonus or interest, or of bonus or interest consolidated with principal." The result of that decision, which was a decision of the Court of Appeal, was that the order of the Master and the Judge ordering the claim for interest to be placed in the Short Cause list was affirmed. It is impossible, in my opinion, having regard to the argument, and having regard to the language used, to say that it was not present to the minds of the Lords Justices whether or not the Short Cause list was not only in that case within their discretion a proper tribunal in which to try the dispute, but that they also had jurisdiction to affirm the order which had been made in Chambers by the Judge and Master.

In addition that case, which seems to be a clear authority in the Court of Appeal, that this contention in this particular case is not well founded, is really supported by the two unreported decisions which Mr. Matthews has cited. One is City and County Finance Company v. Dolphin (unreported), February 12, 1920, in this Court, in which I and, I think, Lord Justice Scrutton were members of the Court. I forget whether we affirmed an order directing a trial in the Short Cause list or whether we made the order in the first instance, but, at any rate, it was quite present to our minds that we had the jurisdiction to do it, and we in fact did it, because we thought that that was a proper case. A similar order was made in the other case to which attention was called, of Rothfield v. Leighton (unreported), December 5, 1918, where, I think, Lord Justice Scrutton and Mr. Justice Eve, sitting together as a Court of Appeal to deal with interlocutory matters, made a similar order.

If one assumes that Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) does decide the question of jurisdiction, and does decide that the Master had no jurisdiction, and that the Judge had no jurisdiction, to make an order directing the trial of a moneylender's claim of disputed interest in the Short Cause list, with all respect to those who gave the decision it seems to me in conflict with the three other decisions of this Court to which I have referred, and which personally I prefer, because I cannot see anything anywhere which deprives the Judge of the jurisdiction which the rules give him in a case which is properly brought before him, because the writ is specially indorsed and the affidavit is in proper form. If that is the correct view it follows that the head-note in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) does not correctly state the decision of this Court upon this particular matter, and for myself I should say, and I do say, that in this particular case, or in any case where the facts are the same, that is to say, where a moneylender properly indorses a writ for a liquidated amount, and the liquidated amount is represented by a promissory note or a bill of exchange, and where the defendant in his affidavit raises a case under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, in my opinion the Judge or the Master still retains the full jurisdiction given him under Order XIV. to deal with such a case, and he does retain and has jurisdiction, among other things, to order any disputed part of that claim to be placed in the Short Cause list; but I desire to say this also, and to say it very emphatically, that I think that jurisdiction ought to be exercised very sparingly, and it ought to be exercised in cases which are simple and clear cases. It is impossible to lay down any rule which shall define what constitutes a simple and a plain case. I think I can go to this extent, and say that in a case where a defendant is seeking to rip up not only the particular transaction in respect of which the claim is made but previous transactions with a moneylender, that would certainly not be a proper case in which to send the trial of such a dispute to the Short Cause list. Indeed, I think that probably it is true to say that in the majority of cases, in the exercise of a wise discretion, it would be better not to send the disputes under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, into the Short Cause list, but in every case the Master or the Judge has a discretion, and it is for him to exercise it. Speaking for myself, with all respect I should say that they would be wise to exercise that discretion with considerable caution and only to make orders sending this class of case into the Short Cause List where it is reasonably plain that the dispute is a short one.

In these circumstances I think that this appeal should be allowed with costs in any event, and that there being in this case really nothing tangible to suggest that this is not a proper case for the Short Cause list, we ought to make an order to remit this case to the Short Cause list, treating it as an exceptional case rather than as an application of a general rule.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This case raises a question of some practical importance in regard to what undoubtedly forms a considerable branch of the business of the King's Bench, known as moneylenders' cases, and as the decisions of the Court of Appeal are not at present consistent I express my reasons for allowing the appeal in my own language.

In this particular case a moneylender sues on a promissory note, giving credit for certain instalments paid. The defendant says, "Yes, that promissory note is for money that you lent me. As to the principal that you lent me I have paid all but £75. I have not paid £75 of the principal. As to the interest it is at least 100 per cent., and I desire to raise the point that the interest is excessive and the transaction harsh and unconscionable." Thereupon the Master made an order in effect giving judgment for the £75, the balance of principal unpaid, and gave leave to defend as to the interest, and he was then asked to put the case in the Short Cause list. The Master took the view that the decision of two members of the Court of Appeal in Bennett v. Stubbs ([1926] 1 K.B., 272) prevented him from putting the case into the Short Cause list because it related to the adequacy and amount of interest. On appeal to the Judge the Judge took the same view, that he was precluded by Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) from putting the case into the Short Cause list. We have asked the learned Judge whether he exercised any discretion in the matter, and he tells us that he did not; he thought he was bound by Bennett v. Stubbs (supra). On looking at Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), from the statement of Mr. Levy, who was counsel in it, the point that there was no jurisdiction to put the case into the Short Cause list was not raised before the Master or the Judge in that case but appeared for the first time in the Court of Appeal, with the consequence that all the authorities in the Court of Appeal bearing upon the point were not cited to the two learned Judges who decided Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), and, in particular, the reported case of Lazarus v. Smith (24 The Times L.R., 592; [1908] 2 K.B., 266) was not cited to the Court, and is not referred to by the Court in its judgment, and it is extremely difficult to reconcile the judgment in Lazarus v. Smith (supra) with the judgment in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra). Two unreported cases were also cited to us, unreported decisions of the Court of Appeal which also were wrongly decided if Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) is right. The result is that, considering the question as one of judicial comity, this Court, a Court of three, has before it a series of judgments of the Court of Appeal which do not appear to be consistent with each other. It is not that the later judgment has considered the earlier ones and decided that they mean so-and-so; it is that the later judgment was given when the Judges were not aware of three of the previous decisions. In those circumstances, in my view, as a matter of judicial comity, it is open to this Court to consider all the decisions of the Court of Appeal, and to form its own views as to which are the more accurate and which it shall follow in this case. It is quite true that it is possible to make a distinction between Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) and this case, and the distinction is this: that in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) it appeared from the defendant's evidence that all the principal had been repaid, and in this case it appeared from the defendant's evidence that there was still a balance of principal left unpaid, but when one considers the matter from the point of view of principle I cannot see that that fact makes any legal difference.

Approaching the matter from the point of view of principle, if one can use such a word about the White Book, before one comes to any authorities, the Rules of Court, which have the authority of a statute, give power to the Masters and Judges in certain specified cases mentioned in Order III., Rule 6, to give summary judgment without the cases going through the form of trial in Court. You require, to get that jurisdiction, that the claim on the writ of the plaintiff shall comply with certain specified rules mentioned in Order III., Rule 6. It is undoubted that if on the writ you find something that comes within Order III., Rule 6, and something which does not, the writ does not comply with the statutory requirements, and the plaintiff cannot go on and get summary judgment unless he has struck off the writ that which does not come within the matters described in Order III., Rule 6; but in moneylenders' cases there is almost always this to start with, that the moneylender sues on a promissory note or bill of exchange which exactly complies with the requirements of Order III., Rule 6, and unless the defendant raises some defence which entitles him to object to summary judgment, Order XIV. will be complied with. Judgment can be given if the defendant does not appear. Usually in moneylenders' cases the defendant does appear and he says : "True it is that I have signed this bill, but it is for money lent. The principal lent was" so much. Sometimes he says that and sometimes he says he does not know what the principal was. He says, "The interest is at such a rate, and I say, as I am entitled to say under the Moneylenders Act, that that interest is excessive and the transaction is harsh and unconscionable." He then raises a prima facie defence to a writ which comes within Order XIV., and in my view, the writ coming within Order XIV., as to such part of the claim represented on the writ as does not come within Order XIV., or does not entitle the plaintiff to summary judgment under Order XIV., the powers given to a Judge who gives leave to defend as to a part of the claim remain unaltered because there is a writ properly indorsed under Order III., Rule 6, which gives the Judge power to exercise the jurisdiction contained in Order XIV. I do not know that it is necessary to decide it, but it seems to me that the Judge, reading the defendant's affidavit under Order XIV., may say, "There is no evidence on which any one can say that this interest is excessive or harsh and unconscionable," but may not say, "I decide on the evidence before me on each side that it is or is not harsh and unconscionable." That was what Mr. Justice Phillimore did in Wells v. Allott (20 The Times L.R., 799 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 842), and he was held to have done that wrongly. To take a possible case—I say "a possible case"—supposing that all that the defendant says is : "You lent me £100 at 1 per cent. interest, and I was in the retreat from Mons," I should have thought that in a case like that it was open to a Judge to say : "Nobody can reasonably say that you have raised a contention of excessive interest or of a harsh and unconscionable transaction ; nobody can say that 1 per cent. is an excessive rate of interest" ; but as soon as the affidavit gets to a point where it is a doubtful question what the decision will be, then it is quite clear in principle, it seems to me, that a Master or a Judge cannot deal with the matter under the summary procedure of Order XIV. by giving judgment. He can deal with so much of the principal as is unpaid, because there the defendant admits the principal lent, and he admits that he has not repaid all of it, and judgment may be given for part of the principal which the defendant has not repaid. It seems to me on principle and on the rules that the Master is in this position : There is a properly indorsed writ under Order III., Rule 6. The defendant shows no defence to part of the claim when that claim is analysed. He shows a possible defence to part of the claim. Then there is leave to sign judgment for the part for which he shows no defence, the balance of principal, and as to the part for which he shows a possible defence you deal with it under Order XIV., Rule 4 ; under Order XIV., Rule 8 (a), by giving directions as to the further conduct of the action ; under Order XIV., Rule 8 (b), by, if you think it right and it is a proper case, putting it into the Short Cause list. That is how it seems to me the case would stand on principle if there had been no decisions of the Court at all.

When we come to decisions of the Court there is no doubt that the practice of Masters and Judges has changed from time to time. For instance, in the first case to which we were referred, Wells v. Allott (supra), the Court allowed summary judgment to stand for 5 per cent. interest on the principal, and there is no doubt that in Lazarus v. Smith (supra), the later decision of the Court, the Court of Appeal said that that was wrong and that it should not be done. In Wells v. Allott (supra) part of the principal was still unpaid when the case came for summary judgment. The Master having given judgment for part of the principal, with interest at 5 per cent., and leave to defend as to the rest of the interest, Mr. Justice Phillimore took the view that he could decide on the affidavits whether the transaction was or was not harsh and unconscionable. He decided that it was not harsh and unconscionable, and gave judgment for the whole amount claimed. That was the substantial point raised in Wells v. Allott (supra), and that was the point that the Court decided when they set aside Mr. Justice Phillimore's judgment and restored the judgment of the Master. There were two members sitting in the Court, Lord Collins, who was then Master of the Rolls, and Lord Cozens-Hardy, who was afterwards Master of the Rolls. I think the source of misunderstanding as to Wells v. Allott (supra) has been this : there is a passage in Lord Collins's judgment at page 846 : "It is impossible now to say that the procedure of Order XIV. can be made applicable to an action by a moneylender to recover interest on money lent, where the loan appears prima facie to carry an excessive rate of interest." That has been read, and I think it was read in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) as if it meant the whole procedure of Order XIV., whereas I am fairly clear on reading the judgment that all that Lord Collins meant was the procedure of summary judgment so far as interest was concerned, which was the particular matter which they were deciding because they were considering whether Mr. Justice Phillimore could give summary judgment for principal and interest, there being the conflict on the affidavit. That appears to me to be the point decided in Wells v. Allott (supra), where judgment was given in fact for the balance of principal due, and in fact also where judgment was given for some interest on that principal. One is confirmed in that view when one sees that Lord Cozens-Hardy was a party to the case of Lazarus v. Smith (supra) later, in which he did give judgment for principal and said that the judgment should not be given for interest on the principal, not even 5 per cent., and ordered the case to be placed in the Short Cause list for trial.

Dott v. Bonnard (21 The Times L.R., 166) does not seem to me to have very much to do with it. In Dott v. Bonnard (supra), a claim being made on a bill of exchange and a promissory note, the defendant's answer was : "I have paid the whole principal and interest, not in money, but I have given you shares which are worth far more than the amount of principal and interest that you claim" ; and the Court said there what I should have thought was fairly obvious, "This is not Order XIV. at all. You cannot possibly use Order XIV. when this is the answer made on the affidavit."

Next in date comes the case to which I have referred of Lazarus v. Smith (supra), where the point that was argued was the point that had also been argued unsuccessfully in Wells v. Allott (supra), that if the defendant shows that there is excessive interest judgment cannot be given against him for any principal that he owes, and the Court said that certainly it can. In a case where you have a properly indorsed writ, and where the defendant shows a defence as to part but no defence as to the other part, you can give judgment for the part for which he shows no defence. You must give leave to defend as to the part for which a possible defence is shown, and may put the case into the Short Cause list. In that case it was left in the Short Cause list where it had been put by the Court below.

Tumin v. Levi (28 The Times L.R., 125), it seems to me, would be better described as Chancery v. King's Bench. Tumin v. Levi (supra) was decided at a stage when the procedure was constantly being adopted, of which we have not heard so much lately, that the borrower rushed to the Chancery Division with a writ to reopen all the transactions, and the moneylender rushed to the King's Bench Division with an application under Order XIV. At that time—I do not know whether it had anything to do with the procedure adopted by the various parties—it took very much longer for a case to come on in Chancery than it did in the King's Bench, and also the Chancery idea of a short cause was one which took only ten minutes, and the King's Bench idea of a short cause was one which was said to take an hour and which frequently took a day. In those circumstances one can conceive that there was likely to be a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal which had in it a Chancery Lord Justice and a King's Bench Lord Justice. In Tumin v. Levi (supra) you had, and this was really the point of the case, two actions. The first action was by the borrower in the Chancery Division to reopen all the transaction, and the second action by the moneylender in the King's Bench Division was to take advantage of the procedure under Order XIV. The majority of the Court—and with great respect to my Lord I do not think he was quite right in saying that they were both Chancery men ; Lord Justice Vaughan Williams was one of the majority—acted on the rule which I think has been acted on largely with regard to those cases since, that the person who issues his writ first will be the person who will be allowed to proceed, and they allowed the Chancery action to proceed where the writ was issued first, Lord Justice Kennedy dissenting ; but undoubtedly in that case Lord Justice Buckley did say, and he repeated it five days afterwards in a case where the question did not arise but where he used it as an illustration of principle, that he did not think that questions of interest were ever intended to come into the Short Cause list.

Two unreported cases, in one of which Mr. Matthews has furnished us with a contemporary note, and in the other with the papers, also came before, in each case, two Judges of the Court of Appeal. I happened to be a member of both Courts. My Lord was a member of one Court with me, and Mr. Justice Eve was a member of the other Court. In each of those cases we put the question of interest in the Short Cause list. In the second case the only question argued was whether it should or should not go into the Short Cause list, although, as far as I remember, the question was argued as one of discretion and not one of jurisdiction. It was not argued to us, as far as I remember, that there was no jurisdiction to put the case into the Short Cause list.

In that state of the authorities in 1925 Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) came before two other Judges of the Court of Appeal, and, as I have said, Mr. Levy tells us that the point not having been taken before the Master and the Judge he had not that command of all the authorities that he would have had if he had known what point was coming. Lazarus v. Smith (supra) was not cited to the Court in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), and the two unreported cases, of course, were not cited to the Court, so that the two Lords Justices who sat in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) were not aware that in three cases, in one of which short cause was the only point argued, their brothers, in each case two other members of the Court, had done what they were saying in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) there was no power to do. In my view, Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) proceeded upon a misreading of the decision in Wells v. Allott (supra) in thinking that the Court had said that Order XIV. did not apply to all the procedure instead of, as I think, to the power to give summary judgment on the question.

Having considered all the authorities in the Court of Appeal, I come to the conclusion that the view taken in Lazarus v. Smith (supra), and the two unreported cases, is right. I understand it to be this, that if you have a writ properly indorsed under Order III., Rule 6, but the defendant is able to raise a defence to part of it, namely, as to the interest by making a prima facie case of excessive interest, the powers given to the Master or a Judge when the Master or a Judge gives leave to defend as to part, the powers of giving directions for the action under Rule 8 (a) and putting it into the Short Cause list, under Rule 8 (b), apply, although you cannot give summary judgment for the amount of interest, a prima facie case being raised that there is a defence.

Next, of course, comes the question in this case ; there being jurisdiction in the Court to do it, and the Master and the Judge having declined to exercise jurisdiction because they thought they were bound by the decision of Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), and this Court having held that they were not in view of the other decisions in the Court of Appeal, what should this Court do as to the Short Cause list. I quite agree with what my Lord has said, that this power of putting moneylenders' cases into the Short Cause list should be exercised with considerable caution. It is certainly not to be taken as a rule that whenever the only dispute is as to the adequacy of interest in a moneylender's case, the case should go into the Short Cause list. Moneylenders' cases are very complicated, particularly cases where the defendant desires to reopen a previous transaction, and I think that the Master would be safe, although I do not lay down any final rule, in never putting any cases into the Short Cause list where there is a claim to reopen previous transactions as well as a dispute as to the particular transaction put on the writ. Where only one transaction appears to be concerned the Masters must use their judgment as to whether it is likely to be a short cause, and I think they may require the defendant to show them some reason why it is likely not to be a short cause. The questions what the financial position of the borrower was at the time of the loan, and how much the moneylender knew about him, are sometimes quite simple. Sometimes the borrower knows exactly what he has had, and there are undoubtedly some cases which are properly dealt with in the Short Cause list, but I think the Masters would be wise to approach the question rather with a prejudice against the Short Cause list in moneylenders' cases. They are not always short, and I do not know of any reason of public policy which requires that moneylenders whose claims are being investigated because a prima facie case of extortionate interest is shown should have any special precedence over other litigants who are not in the position of having a prima facie case of extortion made against them, but I do not think it is possible to say more to help the Masters as to whether or not cases should be put in the Short Cause list. A case should not be put in the Short Cause list unless the Master has strong reason to believe that it will be short; perhaps that is as simple a rule as one can give him.

Lord Justice Atkin.—If it were not for the decision in Bennett v. Stubbs ([1926] 1 K.B., 272) I should have found this case a reasonably simple one, and I should not have given a judgment of my own except to concur in the judgments that have been delivered, but the judgment in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) stands and presents a difficulty. It is because of that case that I feel bound to express my own reason for concurring in this appeal being allowed. If the case of Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) had stood alone it appears to me that it would govern this case. I think that it is an expression of opinion by the Court of Appeal that in a case where a moneylender has sued upon a bill of exchange and a defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, is raised which the Court ought to give effect to and treat as raising a defence to be tried, in such a case the Court has got no jurisdiction under the provisions of Order XIV. to allow the case to be put in the Short Cause list. It is true that in the case in question the only matter that was in dispute was the question how much interest should be paid in addition to the principal which had already been paid, but I can see nothing in principle which would make any difference to any degree, although there was still some undoubted balance of the principal sum due. I could not say that, taking that view of the case if it stood alone, it would make any difference, and I should feel, and indeed I am quite sure that we should all feel, bound by it. It is obvious that a Court of Appeal consisting of three Judges is not entitled to overrule a decision of a Court of Appeal expressed by two Judges, but the case does not stand alone, because now it is quite apparent that there were at least three previous decisions of the Court of Appeal which have been mentioned, and to which I need not refer, which are inconsistent with the decision in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), and in each of which the Court of Appeal, to my mind quite obviously, considered and gave effect to their opinion that it was within the jurisdiction of the Court to order a trial as a short cause in a moneylender's case where the defendant had raised a prima facie defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, and it also is the case that none of those three cases were in fact cited to the Court in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra). It is not a case, therefore, where there is an authoritative decision of the Court of Appeal distinguishing the two previous cases.

There being this state of the authorities, it appears to me obvious on authority and on principle that this Court now is not bound by the decision in Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), but has to express its own view of what the law is. I do not decide whether or not the Court is bound by the previous decision in those cases, but I think it is open to us to deal with the matter on principle, which is the way in which I propose to deal with it. Dealing with the matter on principle, it appears to me that the provisions of Order XIV. depend in the first place upon observing whether or not a writ has been specially indorsed under Order III., Rule 6. If the plaintiff has in fact indorsed his writ with a specially indorsed claim under Order III., Rule 6, and has made a sufficient affidavit following the rules in Order XIV. it appears to me that the case is then within Order XIV., and he is entitled to make an application for summary judgment. It also appears to me quite plain that in the case where a moneylender sues, at any rate upon a bill of exchange, including in that term a promissory note or cheque, and claims an amount for interest which is either due as being part of a fixed sum mentioned in the bill or is a rate of interest expressed to be in the bill of exchange at a fixed rate, then the amount of the claim is a liquidated claim as far as the interest is concerned, by reason of the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. It is quite true that by reason of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, the party liable on such a bill may, in a moneylender's transaction, raise a defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900—namely, that the interest was excessive, and that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable. If he makes a prima facie case to that effect then he is precisely, in my opinion, in the same position as any other defendant against whom a summons is taken out under Order XIV.—that is to say, he has raised a case of a prima facie defence which has to be tried. It is in no way different from the case of a man sued on a liquidated claim for goods sold and delivered who raises a prima facie defence, either that he has not had the goods or that they have not been delivered, or that the goods are not of the quality, and so on, or that they did not comply with some condition. There is a case to be tried, and in that case, where he has raised a defence at the time, it appears to me that the Judge is equipped with all the powers which are expressly provided in Order XIV. in such a case where he desires to give leave to defend. He may give leave to defend conditionally or unconditionally. He may give directions as to the mode of trial, and among the directions that he may give it appears to me by the express rule that he may think the case is a simple one and order the case to be tried in the Short Cause list. I see no reason at all for supposing that there is some magic in the defence under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, which makes the defence to a bill of exchange anything other than a defence and a defence which has to be tried. It has to be remembered that the mere fact that the defendant raises a case that the interest is excessive, and that the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, is one which on authority, and by the plain words of the Rule, cannot be determined by the Master or the Judge. It is a question for trial, and it still remains an issue. It may be that the moneylender will prove either that the interest was not excessive or that the transaction was not harsh and unconscionable, and in that case his bill of exchange remains as he sued upon it, and he is entitled to judgment for a liquidated sum. It is obvious to my mind that it is quite illogical for the Court, before the matter is determined whether the transaction was a transaction in which the interest was excessive and was harsh and unconscionable, to presume the fact against the plaintiff, and on that assumption decide that the claim is not a liquidated claim.

That is how the matter seems to me to stand, apart from authority, and I think that the decision to the contrary, apart from the fact that the three previous cases were not brought to the attention of the Court, rests upon what I venture to think is not an uncommon misuse or misunderstanding of language as to a case not being within Order XIV. I have known the expression commonly used at the Bar, and I have often heard it used on the Bench in this particular connexion, as a compendious way of stating that it is not a case where the Court ought to give summary judgment on an application made on the summons taken out under the provisions of Order XIV. Merely used in that way all that it means is that the Court will not give summary judgment. One has often known the case where a plaintiff claims on a specially indorsed writ. The defendant makes an affidavit which seems to suggest a trial defence, and at once everybody thinks "This is not a case for Order XIV.," and so I suppose the expression might be used "This is a case which is outside Order XIV.," but in all those cases all that is meant is that it is not a case in which the ordinary right of a defendant to have the case determined by trial should be taken away from him and summary judgment should be given. Without referring to the whole of the language used by the late Lord Collins in the case upon which Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) was mainly founded, namely, the case of Wells v. Allott (supra), I think that is made quite plain in two passages of Lord Collins's judgment. He begins at page 846 by saying: "The question we have to determine is whether the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the whole amount claimed under Order XIV.," and in dealing with that he goes on in the next sentence to say: "It seems to me that, whatever may have been the law before the passing of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, it is impossible now to say that the procedure of Order XIV. can be made applicable to an action by a moneylender to recover interest on money lent, where the loan appears prima facie to carry an excessive rate of interest." I think that what the learned Judge is saying there is that it is impossible, dealing with the question which we have to determine, to say that he is entitled to judgment under Order XIV. in an action where the loan appears prima facie to carry an excessive rate of interest. He goes on to say: "In such a case the moneylender has not an absolute right to recover what the borrower has agreed to pay, but only a right sub modo involving an investigation by the proper tribunal for the purpose of seeing if the plaintiff's prima facie right of action is one to which in the particular circumstances effect ought to be given." Then he goes on to say: "The procedure under Order XIV. is meant to give a short and speedy remedy for the recovery of debts which are either admitted to be due or as to which there is no defence." That is meant to give a right to judgment, and it is obvious, therefore, that when the Master of the Rolls is saying that the procedure of Order XIV. cannot be made applicable, he means the procedure as defined by him later on—namely, the procedure of a short and speedy remedy for the recovery of debts which are either admitted to be due or as to which there is no defence, or, in other words, to give judgment.

I think, therefore, that there is no authority other than Bennett v. Stubbs (supra) which lays down, or indeed which, on my construction of the Rules, could lay down, that where the defendant, sued by a moneylender on a moneylending transaction, makes a prima facie defence under the Act there is no power to give the necessary directions under the provisions of the Order, including the power to order the case to be put into the Short Cause list.

The only other question which arises is whether or not the discretion ought to be exercised in this particular case. In reference to that I should like to express my adherence to the views which have been expressed by my Lord and by the Lord Justice as to the propriety of putting such cases into the Short Cause list. First of all, it is quite clear to my mind that there ought to be no general rule, which it is rather suggested to us at the Bar existed before the case of Bennett v. Stubbs (supra), to put all cases of this kind in the Short Cause list. In the second case, it appears to me that prima facie the kind of investigation that has to be embarked upon in order to do justice to the parties is a discussion which is very unlikely to be properly conducted within the limits of time which a short cause ought to take. I think that it is a matter in which the fullest investigation ought to be made, and in which the Master ought to have it quite clearly in his mind that time should be allowed to both parties for the purpose of dealing with the matter. As I say, although I am far from saying that there may not be cases in which the case is so short and so simple that it would come within the formula which was given some time ago by a Judge as a case likely not to take more than an hour, yet in the majority of cases I should have thought myself that it would be extremely difficult to say that such a defence could be adequately and justly tried within the limits of a short cause.

There is one other point to which I wish to refer. Nothing that we have said as to the power to order a case to be tried in the Short Cause list applies to cases where the claim indorsed on the writ is obviously one that does not fall within the provisions of Order III., Rule 6. If it is such a case it seems to me extremely doubtful whether or not the Court has any power to make any order at all except possibly an order giving unconditional leave to defend. The doubt is raised in this way. There is a decision in the Court of Appeal based upon the rule which formerly existed, that in such a case the only order that can be made is to dismiss the application. That is the case of Symon and Co. v. Palmer's Stores (1903, Limited [1912] 1 K.B., 259), but since that case the provisions of Rule 9 of Order XIV. have been altered, and instead of providing that in such a case the application shall be dismissed, the Rule now says that the application may be dismissed with costs, and it may therefore be that the effect of that is that the Court has still power, although, as I have said, the decision of the Court of Appeal on the old rule is to the contrary; but there is another provision which stands in Order XIV., Rule 9, and that is in substance that when a plaintiff makes an application under Order XIV. in such circumstances that he must have known that he had no right to summary judgment and leave to defend is given, the Court may also dismiss the application with costs. There is a dictum of Lord Justice Buckley's, but a dictum with which I am bound to say that I myself agree, to the effect that it would be an illegitimate use of the provisions of Order XIV. to make an application in a case where it should be quite plain to the plaintiff that he is not entitled to summary judgment merely for the purpose of getting an order for trial in the Short Cause list. Therefore I think that the Master and the Judge in exercising their discretion as to whether or not they should put a case in the Short Cause list are entitled to have regard to the question whether or not the plaintiff in this case, always the moneylender, was or was not justified in his claim for summary judgment. That, of course, depends upon whether or not he had reason to suppose in the circumstances that a defence could be raised, and that if raised it would be likely to be successful, but no general rule can be laid down upon it. If these were found to be the facts, then I think the Court, in exercising its discretion, might very well refuse to order the case to be tried in the Short Cause list, treating the application as being an illegitimate use of Order XIV.

I think that is all that remains to be said, except that in this particular case it appears to me from the facts that the case is an exceptionally simple case, and that there is no reason disclosed why the case should not be heard in the Short Cause list. The learned Judge obviously did not exercise any discretion, and we are told by counsel that he rather suggested that if he had had a discretion he would have exercised it in the way in which we propose to exercise it.

I therefore agree that this appeal should be allowed and an order should be made that this case should be heard in the Short Cause list, but whether any direction should be given, or whether it should go back to the Master for the purpose of getting directions, is a point which perhaps we might have to consider.

Railway and Canal Commission. (Sankey, J., Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C.) 1927. Mar. 3.

IN RE DENABY AND CADEBY MAIN COLLIERIES, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Mines—Amalgamation—Scheme—Application for confirmation—"National interest"—"Fair and equitable"—Mining Industry Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 28), s. 7 (2).

Observations on the meaning of the expressions "national interest" and "fair and equitable" in s. 7 (2) of the Mining Industry Act, 1926.

This was an application for the confirmation of an unopposed scheme for the partial amalgamation of the Denaby and Cadeby Main Collieries, Limited, the Rossington Main Colliery Company, Limited, the Dinnington Main Coal Company, Limited, and the Maltby Main Colliery Company, Limited, in accordance with the provisions of the Mining Industry Act, 1926, Part I., sections 1 (1) and 7 (2). This was the first application made to the Court under the provisions of this Act.

Mr. MAUGHAN, K.C., who appeared with Mr. Rabagliati and Mr. Osbert Peake in support of the application, stated that the matter had already been investigated by the Board of Trade. There were no objections to the scheme, and it was therefore his duty to satisfy the Court, in accordance with the provisions of the Mining Industry Act, 1926, that the terms of the scheme were in the national interest and were fair and equitable to all persons affected thereby. The four companies owned about the same area of coal to be worked, but the financial position of each company was different. The scheme recognized that two of the companies, Rossington and Maltby, required financial assistance. The method of the scheme was for partial amalgamation by share control and by the provision of a separate company which would acquire all or at least a controlling interest in the Ordinary shares of the constituent companies. Those shares would be divided into several groups for the purpose of enabling all the constituent companies to be represented on the board, and also for the purpose of postponing the payment of dividends on the Rossington and Maltby shares for a certain period.

The working, treating and disposing of coal over a large area would thus be subjected to a single policy. A policy of unified control would enable the financial resources of the whole group to be brought into play in aid of any of the constituent companies. The name suggested for the new company to be formed by the amalgamation was "The Yorkshire Amalgamated Collieries, Limited."

LORD ABERCONWAY, chairman of three of the four companies, gave evidence. He stated that amalgamation would save establishment charges all round. It would enable better provisions to be made for the men employed, both as regards housing and recreation. It would also provide increased opportunities of employment.

Evidence was also given by Major John Leslie, D.S.O., chairman of the Denaby and Cadeby Main Collieries, Limited; by Mr. William Humble, a colliery engineer, and chairman and managing director of numerous collieries, who had made an independent valuation of the four collieries ; and by Mr. William Birkenhead Mather-Jackson, managing director of three of the collieries.

MR. JUSTICE SANKEY, in the course of his judgment, said that the Court had ordered notices to be given publicly and to the members of the companies concerned so that anyone who desired to oppose the scheme might have an opportunity to do so. The Registrar had furnished a certificate that those notices had been given, and that there was no opposition. It might be urged that the application to the Court was unnecessary, since the amalgamation might be accomplished by voluntary agreement. By coming to the Court under the Act, however, the applicants would escape stamp duties amounting to £76,000, and, even if that were their only object, he could see no reason why they should not take advantage of the Act if the law allowed it. He would rather congratulate the coal industry on escaping liability to stamp duties in a way not enjoyed by other depressed industries.

When an application was made to the Court, what was the Court's duty ? As this was the first application, they had thought it desirable to indicate what their views were, though they had not had the advantage of hearing argument against the scheme, which was of the simplest character. Section 7 (2) of the Act provided :—

"The Commission . . . may confirm the scheme either without modifications or subject to such modifications as the Commission think fit, or may refuse to confirm the scheme : Provided that the Commission—(a) shall confirm a scheme if satisfied that it would be in the national interest to do so, and that the terms of the scheme are fair and equitable to all persons affected thereby. . . ."

The two questions upon which the Court had to be satisfied were (1) Was this scheme in the national interest ? (2) Were the terms fair and equitable ?

What constituted the national interest was a very difficult question, upon which opinions differed and which might become a political question more suitable to be decided by the High Court of Parliament than by the High Court of Justice. The difficulty was especially shown in a case like the present, where there had been no one to show in what respects the scheme was not in the national interest.

The Court did not wish to lay down any definition of "national interest." Each application must be considered upon its own merits. But they thought that the Court ought to adopt a benevolent attitude towards applications. The tendency of the Act was meant to be favourable to amalgamations.

Colliery amalgamations were said to be likely to effect a cheapening of the production of coal. Where a cheapening was produced, it would be in the national interest that it should be reflected in the selling price of coal. It could not be to the national interest merely that the coal industry should be enriched without the consumer sharing the benefit.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present scheme affected a total area of about 33,000 acres, and it was estimated that the scheme, if confirmed, would increase the total annual output of coal from 3,400,000 to 5,000,000 tons. The Denaby and Dinnington Collieries were flourishing concerns. Rossington and Maltby were not in the same position, and one of the great advantages of the scheme would be the assistance which it would render to those two companies. It was also alleged that partial amalgamation would allow a large amount of coal to be won which would otherwise be left as barriers—some 3,000,000 tons would be saved in the Barnsley seam alone.

The partial amalgamation was sought to be effected by the method of share control through a new company holding a controlling interest in the Ordinary shares of the constituent companies with the principal object of vesting in the amalgamated company the constituent companies and of making such financial provisions as would enable the Rossington and Maltby companies to develop their undertakings so as to attain the maximum output.

His Lordship read the grounds on which the scheme was alleged to be in the national interest, which might be summarized as development of Rossington and Maltby ; elimination of barriers ; joint selling arrangements ; increased output and employment ; joint financial resources operating as an insurance against future loss in the event of explosion or disaster to one of the companies involving a breakdown and loss of coal to the nation ; more economical working through the pooling of wagons ; and the reduction of overhead charges through a single controlling policy.

It appeared to him, said his Lordship, that if the scheme was sanctioned all those advantages were likely to be attained—he would not say at once, because of the position of Rossington and Maltby. But anyone with experience of colliery management could see that the amalgamation was likely to produce the results suggested, and he thought that all those advantages were in the national interest.

On the question whether the terms were fair and equitable, he repeated that the Court should maintain a benevolent attitude, always, of course, paying careful attention to any substantial objection. The way in which the present scheme had been put forward had been very fair and reasonable. An independent valuation had been made. As a result of that valuation a scheme for allotting shares in the amalgamated company equivalent to the holdings of ordinary shares in the constituent companies had been drawn up. Debenture-holders and Preference shareholders would be in no way prejudiced.

In accordance with the practice of the Chancery Division the Court had ordered meetings to be held of the shareholders of the constituent companies. At those meetings the scheme was very fully and carefully explained to the shareholders by Lord Aberconway and Major Leslie respectively, and he (his Lordship) was confirmed in his view that the scheme was fair and equitable by the results of those meetings, which approved it by enormous majorities in each case. He could not help thinking that those who voted against it would vote for it if a second vote were taken, since none of them had come to oppose it. For those reasons he thought that they ought to confirm the scheme.

Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, in a judgment agreeing with that of Mr. Justice Sankey, pointed out that the Court had nothing to do with the general policy of amalgamation of collieries or its effect on the industry. They had merely to answer the questions whether a particular scheme was in the national interest and whether its terms were fair and equitable.

Sir Lewis Coward, who also concurred, emphasized the importance of the pooling of wagons, and said that it was not always realized how large a proportion of the capital of a company ought to be allocated to the provision of wagons. He thought that the scheme before the Court would provide the amalgamated collieries with an adequate stock.

The amalgamation of the railways had been followed by disastrous results to the trader. In the area affected by the present scheme railway competition had been almost eliminated with the result that there were congestion and delay in the use of wagons. Lord Aberconway had given evidence that there would have been a supply of wagons if there had been competition, but that it was now impossible to put pressure on the railway companies.

Court of Appeal.

J. GORDON ALISON AND CO., LIMITED v. WALLSEND SLIPWAY AND ENGINEERING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract—Sale of Goods—Defect—Cylinder for ship's engines—Supply to ship repairers—Subject to "our usual" guarantee clause—Damages for detention of ship—Uncertainty as to clause indicated.

The plaintiffs, a ship-repairing company, requiring a new intermediate pressure cylinder for the engine of a steamer which they had contracted to repair, obtained a quotation from the defendants, who were marine engineers. At the head of the defendants' letter was a printed notice, "All offers are subject to our usual strike and guarantee clauses, accidents, &c." The plaintiffs ordered the cylinder, but after it had been delivered and fitted it was found to be defective. A new cylinder was subsequently supplied by the defendants, but owing to the delay the plaintiffs were not able to complete the repairs in accordance with their contract with the shipowners, and had to pay them damages. In an action to recover the amount of the damages the defendants alleged that the contract for the supply of the cylinder was made subject to "our usual" guarantee clause and that their guarantee clause provided (inter alia) that "the contractors shall not in any case be liable for any detention of the vessel or other consequential damages howsoever arising."

Held, that as it was not clear what guarantee clause was incorporated, since the clause suggested by the defendants was inapplicable to the contract, and as it was not proved that the defendants had made it clear that they intended to limit their liability, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of Roche, J. (43 The Times L.R., 104) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Mr. Justice Roche (43 The Times L.R., 104).

The plaintiffs, J. Gordon Alison and Co., Limited, a ship-repairing company at Birkenhead, claimed to recover damages from the defendants, the Wallsend Slipway and Engineering Company, Limited, marine engineers on the Tyne, in the following circumstances :—

Early in 1925 the plaintiffs were engaged in repairing a steamer, the Beechwood, and in the course of executing the repairs they had to fit a new intermediate pressure cylinder in the steamer's engine. They ordered the cylinder and fittings from the defendants at a cost of £622, and the cylinder was delivered and fitted on board in due course. When tested under steam pressure it was found to be cracked and useless, and the plaintiffs returned it to the defendants. A new cylinder was subsequently supplied by the defendants, but owing to the delay the plaintiffs were not able to complete the repairs of the Beechwood in accordance with their contract, and they became liable to her owners in respect of the extra time involved.

The plaintiffs compromised the claim of the owners by a payment of £4,000, and they claimed to recover from the defendants that sum, together with a further sum of £281 in respect of expenses and other matters.

The defendants put in a general denial and said that they only contracted to supply a cylinder which would satisfy the test of Lloyd's surveyor, and the cylinder in question had passed the test. They also said that their contract with the plaintiffs was subject to "our usual" strike and guarantee clauses, and that their guarantee clause, which was customary in the trade, was in the following words :—

"The contractors guarantee the machinery against all defects of material or workmanship that may be discovered within a period of six calendar months after completion of the machinery. The contractors will . . . supply and fit at their works new articles and/or materials to replace or make good such defective part or parts of the machinery arising within such period and due to such causes as aforesaid. . . . The contractors shall not be liable to the purchasers in respect of defects whether in original or substituted work or material except to the extent provided for in the last preceding clause, and the contractors shall not in any case be liable for any detention of the vessel or other consequential damages howsoever arising."

While the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was under negotiation the defendants wrote on April 25, 1925, quoting their price and specifying the time required for delivery and other matters, and at the head of that letter was a printed notice in red type, "All offers are subject to our usual strike and guarantee clauses, accidents, &c." On April 29, 1925, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants accepting their tender, but making no reference to the guarantee clause.

Mr. Justice Roche held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. His Lordship found, on the evidence, that the cylinder when delivered was defective. With regard to the defence of the guarantee clause, he held that it was not clear what guarantee clause was incorporated. The clause suggested by the defendants was the clause in their usual engine agreement, which was drawn up to meet the case of engines being supplied to a shipowner, and did not seem to meet such a case as the present. Further, it was not proved that the defendants had made it clear that they intended to limit their liability.

The defendants appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Lilley appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Probyn Jones for the respondents.

The Court did not call on counsel for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that the case was a plain one. He agreed that the notice in red type at the top of the defendants' offer was a notice of the existence of some usual strike and guarantee clauses, but he did not agree that there were any strike and guarantee clauses applicable to this case. The guarantee clause which had been suggested, even if it could be relied on, was quite inapplicable to the present contract, and the appeal failed.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that the Court acted on the principle—and it was a very healthy principle—that if a person was under a legal liability and wished to get rid of it he could only do so by using clear words. In the present case there was a clear liability on the defendants to pay the damages, and they had failed to use sufficiently clear words to enable them to escape that liability. The appeal failed.

Mr. Justice Romer agreed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1927. Mar. 7.

IN THE ESTATE OF JONES, DECEASED.*

Probate — Executor—Appointment of holder of office — Person entitled to probate—Whether holder at date of will or of testator's death.

This probate motion raised the question whether, in a case where the holder of an office had been appointed executor, the person entitled to probate was the holder of that office at the time when the will was executed or at the date of the testator's death.

The Rev. John Jones, late of the Chantry, Garway Hill, Hereford, clerk in Holy Orders, died on March 23, 1926, and by his will dated November 28, 1912, he bequeathed to the president and committee of the Monmouthshire branch of the English Church Union the residue of his property for the benefit of the poor clergy in Monmouthshire. He appointed as executors "the President of the Monmouthshire branch of the English Church Union", and a Mr. George Davies. Failing the above-mentioned persons, he appointed the Public Trustee.

At the time of the testator's death, James Edward Garnons Lawrence was President of the Monmouthshire branch of the English Church Union, while the occupant of that office at the time when the will was executed was Mr. Edward Steer, who was still living, but had resigned his office.

* Reported by Clifford Mortimer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law,

Mr. Clifford Mortimer moved for probate to Mr. Garnons Lawrence as one of the executors designated in the will. He submitted that, on the construction of the will as a whole, it was clear that the testator intended to appoint as his executor the person who held the office of president at the time of his death and who could give effect to the charitable bequests in his will. The general rule of construction that words indicating an existing individual were considered to refer to the date of the will and not to the testator's death did not necessarily apply where the gift was to a person holding an official position (Jarman on Wills, sixth edition, p. 401); In re Laffan and Downes' Contract ([1897] 1 I.R., 469).

Mr. Justice Hill said that he was satisfied that Mr. Garnons Lawrence was entitled to the grant, and made the order as prayed.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. Mar. 7.

IMPORTERS COMPANY, LIMITED v. WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED.*

Bills of Exchange—Cheque—Crossed cheque—"Account payee only"—Forgery of indorsement—Non-liability of collecting bank—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82.

By section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title . . . the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

The plaintiffs, who were merchants in London, bought paper from German manufacturers through S., their buying agent in Germany, and sent him a crossed cheque, marked "account payee only," drawn on the National Provincial Bank in London, and payable to the vendors. S. indorsed the cheque by forging the name of the vendors and added his own name, and he then paid it into his own bank at Dresden. The Dresden bank collected the money from their English agents, the defendant bank, and the latter collected the amount from the National Provincial Bank. In an action for wrongful conversion of the cheque the defendants relied on s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Held, (1) that as there was nothing in the indorsements or in the words "account payee only" to make the defendants suspicious, since S. might have been the managing director of the vendors, the defendants had not been negligent; (2) that the word "customer" in the section included another bank; and (3) that, although the defendants were acting as a collecting bank, they "received payment" within the meaning of the section; and therefore that the action failed.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed £1,905 15s. 11d. as damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of a number of cheques.

Mr. Pritt appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. Somervell for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were merchants in London, who, in the course of their business, bought from time to time large quantities of paper from manufacturers in Germany. In 1924 they appointed one Schultz as their buying agent in Germany. When they bought paper through him their practice was to send a cheque to him to be handed over by him to the particular manufacturers. The cheque was drawn on the plaintiffs' bank in London, the National Provincial Bank, Limited, and was made payable to the manufacturer, and was crossed and marked "account payee only."

After a time Schultz began a series of frauds. He indorsed the cheques by forging the name of the manufacturers to whom the money was payable, disguising his handwriting for the purpose, and added his own name beneath. He then paid them into his own bank, Heilmann's Bank, Dresden. Heilmann's Bank then collected the money from their English agents, the defendants in this case, and the defendants in due course collected the amount from the National Provincial Bank.

Schultz had now become bankrupt and Heilmann's Bank had also become insolvent, and the plaintiffs, being still liable to the German manufacturers, now sued to recover the amount from the defendants.

By their defence the defendants put in a general denial, and pleaded that Heilmann's Bank was their customer and that they had acted in good faith and without negligence in receiving payment for such customer and sending him the proceeds. They relied on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Alternatively, they pleaded that the words "account payee only" were only a direction to the receiving bank concerned and did not in any way affect a collecting bank. The cheques in question were always payable to payees abroad and in the ordinary course of business would always have to be presented by a foreign bank through an English collecting bank. They also pleaded that they had remitted to Heilmann's Bank before they had any notice of the plaintiffs' claim.

Evidence having been called, Mr. Goddard was beginning to address the Court when Mr. Justice MacKinnon said that he would hear Mr. Pritt.

Mr. Pritt referred to section 72 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, as to the law of the country applicable in regard to indorsement and submitted that in German law Heilmann's Bank had no title. As to section 82, he submitted that the defendants did not act without negligence, that they did not "receive payment," but that if they did they did not receive it "for a customer." Section 82 in speaking of a customer meant someone who might be described as a layman. It never was intended to include one bank dealing with another. Heilmann's Bank was a "correspondent" of the defendants, not a "customer." For a collecting banker to ignore indorsements or markings on a cheque was negligence (Paget on Banking, 3rd edition, p. 295).

If the defendants were acting as a receiving bank in dealing with these cheques it was negligence on their part not to see that the indorsements were in order. If they were not a receiving bank they were not protected by section 82. Bankers might do things as a matter of convenience in banking practice, but if they did not keep within the law they acted at their peril. To gain the protection of section 82 the defendants should have paid attention to the express instruction "account payee only." It was no answer to say that banking practice justified them in ignoring those words.

During the argument the following cases were referred to :—National Bank v. Silke (7 The Times L.R., 156 ; [1891] 1 Q.B., 435) ; Bevan v. Capital and Counties Bank, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 65, at p. 68) ; Akrokerri (Atlantic) Mines, Limited, v. Economic Bank, Limited (20 The Times L.R., 564 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 465, at p. 472) ; Great Western Railway Company v. London and County Banking Company (17 The Times L.R., 700 ; [1901] A.C., 414, at p. 418).

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that he would deal with the case of one cheque as typical of all. The plaintiffs' practice was to draw a cheque in favour of some German manufacturer and send it out to Schultz in Dresden, whose duty it was then to discharge the plaintiffs' debt by handing the cheque to the manufacturer. Schultz, however, indorsed the cheque by forging the manufacturer's name and adding his own name. In some cases Schultz wrote the indorsement in pencil, but it was held as long ago as 1826 that a pencil indorsement was valid and effective. Schultz then took the cheque to Heilmann's Bank, where he had his own banking account, and paid it in. Heilmann's Bank in due course sent the cheque to the Westminster Bank for collection, having indorsed it to "order of Westminster Bank, value in account." The Westminster Bank received the cheque, and, having indorsed it and presented it to the National Provincial Bank, received the proceeds and credited Heilmann's Bank with them in account.

Prima facie the plaintiffs' claim would be good ; for undoubtedly the defendants had become possessed of the plaintiffs' money. But the defendants relied on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provided that "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title . . . the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

Mr. Pritt submitted, first, that the section did not apply because the defendants had been negligent. He contended that as the words "account payee only" appeared on the cheque the defendants should have ascertained that they were really receiving on account of the payee. He further contended that the indorsements ought to have put the defendants on inquiry. In his (his Lordship's) view there was nothing in either of those contentions. There was nothing in the indorsements to make the defendants suspicious ; the cheque was indorsed with the name of the manufacturer and the name of Schultz was added beneath it, and the defendants might perfectly well suppose that Schultz was the cashier or the managing director of the manufacturer concerned.

As for the effect of the words "account payee only," there was really nothing to suggest that that mandate was being departed from. The defendants might naturally suppose that the particular manufacturer was a customer of Heilmann's Bank and had paid the cheque into his account there, and that Heilmann's Bank was collecting it in the ordinary course. There was nothing therefore to support the suggestion of negligence.

Then Mr. Pritt contended that in any case there was no "payment for a customer" within the meaning of those words in the section. His suggestion was that the word "customer" only included a private individual or firm and was not intended to include another bank. He (his Lordship) saw no reason whatever for so limiting the meaning of the word "customer," and he held that Heilmann's Bank was a customer of the defendants within the meaning of the section. It would, indeed, be impossible to define precisely what was meant by a customer if Mr. Pritt's contention was upheld.

Then Mr. Pritt contended that the defendants did not "receive payment" within the meaning of the section because in this transaction the defendants were acting as a collecting bank and not as a receiving bank. But that involved using the word "receiving" in different senses, and it was really clear that the defendants did receive payment of the proceeds of the cheque within the meaning of the section.

The defendants were, therefore, entitled to rely on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and judgment must be entered for them, with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) } 1927. Feb. 23.

LEYTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WILKINSON.*

Justices—Appeal—Recognizance—Drainage expenses—Appeal by corporation—Recognizance of clerk—Appeal dismissed by Divisional Court—Leave to appeal—Whether competent—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 43), s. 3—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 31 (1) (d) (f),

By section 31 (1) (d) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 :—

"(1) No appeal shall lie . . . (d) from the decision of the High Court or of any Judge thereof where it is provided by any Act that the decision of any Court or Judge, the jurisdiction of which or of whom is now vested in the High Court, is to be final ; . . . (f) without the leave of the Divisional Court or of the Court of Appeal, from the determination by a Divisional Court of any appeal to the High Court. . . ."

Held, that the Divisional Court still has a right to give leave to appeal where such a right had been given by a previous Act.

Held, also, that although a corporation can enter into a recognizance by a properly authorized agent, yet where, on a case stated by justices, the appellants are a corporation, a recognizance entered into by their clerk, which does not show that it was entered into on their behalf and that it is their property which is made liable, does not satisfy the requirements of s. 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857.

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin and T. W. Morgan, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 35 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 315) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 35 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 315) upon a preliminary objection which was taken on behalf of the respondent when a case stated by justices for the Becontree Petty Sessional Division of Essex, on proceedings by the appellants to recover from the respondent drainage expenses under the Public Health Acts, came on for hearing. The questions raised by the objection were whether a corporation was bound to enter into a recognizance to prosecute an appeal, and, if so, whether the recognizance in this case was sufficient.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, after providing in section 2 for the making of an application for a case to be stated, enacts in section 3 :—

"The appellant, at the time of making such application and before a case shall be stated and delivered to him by the justice or justices, shall in every instance enter into a recognizance before such justice or justices or any one or more of them, or any other justice exercising the same jurisdiction . . . conditioned to prosecute without delay such appeal, and to submit to the judgment of the superior Court, and pay such costs as may be awarded by the same. . . ."

The recognizance was in this form :—

"Be it remembered that on the 26th day of May, 1926, John Atkinson, of Town Hall, Leyton, Clerk to the Leyton Urban District Council, personally came before me, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said County, and acknowledged himself to owe our Sovereign Lord the King the sum following—namely, the sum of £100, to be levied on his several goods and chattels, lands, and tenements if he the said principal fail in the condition hereon indorsed."

The Divisional Court held that, inasmuch as the recognizance entered into did not show that it was entered into on behalf of the corporation and that it was their property which was made liable, it did not satisfy the requirements of section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and they upheld the preliminary objection.

The Leyton Urban District Council (now the Leyton Corporation) appealed by leave.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. William Allen appeared for the appellants ; Sir James O'Connor, K.C., and Mr. G. W. H. Jones for the respondent.

When the appeal came on for hearing, Sir James O'Connor submitted a preliminary objection on behalf of the respondent that no appeal lay by reason of the prohibition contained in section 31 (1) (d) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. That section provides :—

"(1) No appeal shall lie . . . (d) from the decision of the High Court or of any Judge thereof where it is provided by any Act that the decision of any Court or Judge, the jurisdiction of which or of whom is now vested in the High Court, is to be final. . . . (f) without the leave of the Divisional Court or of the Court of Appeal, from the determination by a Divisional Court of any appeal to the High Court. . . ."

He further submitted that by reason of the provisions of that Act there was no jurisdiction in the Divisional Court to give leave to appeal.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment on the preliminary objection, said that the only construction which could be put on the section of the Act of 1925, was that it, in substance, reproduced the somewhat patchwork condition of things under which it was held that a subsequent statute which gave the Divisional Court a right to grant leave to appeal must be taken to have impliedly overridden, because it did not repeal, a previous statute which provided that the decision of that Court should be final.

Under the Act of 1857, if a special case was stated, it was specially and distinctly provided that the decision of the Court to which the appeal was made was final. To some extent that was varied by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, but section 45 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1873 provided that the decision of the Divisional Court should be final unless special leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal was given by the Divisional Court, and by section 1 (5) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, the leave might be given either by the Divisional Court or by the Court of Appeal.

It was quite certain that the draftsman of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act of 1925 did not intend to restrict the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court by no longer admitting a jurisdiction to give leave to appeal. He might have done it by misapprehension or mistake ; but what he did was this : By section 31 (1) he defined the jurisdiction by providing that no appeal should lie. Then under clause (d) in substance he reproduced what was equivalent to the provision of the Act of 1857. Then, when he came to clause (f), he, in terms, reproduced the provision of the statute of 1894. Having regard to the fact that the Act of 1925 was a Consolidation Act, clauses (d) and (f) must be read together in the sense of the decision in Crush v. Turner (3 Ex. D., 303) on the statutes existing up to the time of that decision. There being a provision that a Divisional Court might give leave to appeal, the case must be treated as one where the Divisional Court had the right to give leave notwithstanding the provision in section 31 (1) (d) of the Act of 1925 with regard to the decision of the Court being final.

For these reasons the preliminary objection failed and the appeal must proceed.

Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Atkin agreed.

The hearing of the appeal was then proceeded with.

Mr. Montgomery submitted on behalf of the appellants that a corporation was entitled to appeal without entering into a recognizance at all, though the recognizance actually entered into here by the clerk was in order even if not correctly recorded. He contended that the form in which it was recorded was sufficient.

Without calling on the respondent's counsel to argue, the Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord Justice Bankes.—I begin by saying that there are no merits whatever in the objections to the hearing of this appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court, but we have to decide the question of law which has been raised.

The matter arises in this way : the appellants, the Leyton Urban District Council, were parties to a proceeding before justices as complainants, and the justices decided in a way which did not satisfy them. They determined to appeal by way of a special case. They thereupon applied to the justices to state a special case, and that was done. Under the provisions of the statute, where this procedure is adopted it is necessary that the appellants, who in this case were the district council, should at the time of making such application, and before the case is stated and delivered to them by the justices or justice, enter into a recognizance.

The district council here passed the necessary resolution—if it was to have any effect at all it was the necessary resolution—giving their clerk authority to enter into a recognizance on their behalf, and he thereupon attended before the justices. What exactly happened we do not know, because the details of what happened were not brought before the Divisional Court, and we do not think it right to allow materials to be brought before us at this late stage, one effect of which would be to attempt to contradict the written record. The result of the clerk's appearance before the justices was that a form of recognizance was drawn up, and that recognizance is, I venture to think, manifestly insufficient as a recognizance entered into by the clerk on behalf of the council. The form is the proper form for an individual entering into a recognizance on his own behalf. It recites that Mr. Atkinson, the town clerk, appeared personally before the justices of the peace, and then it sets out the condition of the recognizance. The condition states by way of recital: "And whereas the said" clerk "being dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law"—of course he was not dissatisfied; it was his council that was dissatisfied—"hath applied to the said Court, pursuant to section 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination, for the opinion thereon of the King's Bench Division of His Majesty's High Court of Justice; if therefore the said John Atkinson, after the said Court of Summary Jurisdiction shall have stated a case setting forth the facts and grounds thereof as aforesaid for the opinion of the said Court, shall prosecute without delay such his appeal and submit to the judgment of the said Court thereon," and so on. That is obviously insufficient as a recognizance on behalf of the Leyton Urban District Council. It does not purport to bind them; it does not purport to refer to their appeal; it does not purport to refer to their willingness to abide the result of the judgment, and to pay the costs. In my opinion so far as that point is concerned the Divisional Court could not come to any other conclusion than the one at which they have arrived.

But now this appeal is made to us, and the grounds of the appeal are in substance these. The Leyton Urban District Council is a statutory corporation; a corporation, whether statutory or other, cannot enter an appearance in person; a recognizance is a thing which contemplates a personal appearance; it follows, therefore, that an urban district council cannot enter into a recognizance, and it can be no objection that the recognizance is not in the proper form, because in whatever form it may be it would be a nullity; the council cannot enter into any form of recognizance. That is the first step. The second step is that, that being so, the statute must be read as though it had no application to the district council, because the law is alleged to be that district councils are free to appeal without any of the conditions imposed by the statute as conditions precedent to a right to appeal. That is the form in which the appeal is presented to us, and it depends upon the accuracy of the three contentions: first, that a corporation cannot appear personally; secondly, that the recognizance must contemplate a personal appearance; and, thirdly, that if those two propositions are established the statute is to be ignored.

I am quite prepared to admit that by our common law a corporation could not appear personally; I quite accept that. I quite accept that by the common law a recognizance no doubt contemplated a personal appearance of the person entering into the recognizance, but both of those are provisions of the common law, and in those circumstances the Judges appear in old times to have been faced with the difficulty which arose when statutes were introduced under which corporations could become complainants, and could become appellants, and, if appellants, were under the obligation of entering into a recognizance. One knows that it frequently happened in the history of our common law that when the Judges were faced with difficulties of that kind, there being no statutory provision, they got over the difficulties by making some extension, or variation, or way round the common law, and that is how they got out of their difficulties, and the common law was extended.

It seems to me that in the face of those difficulties there were three ways open to the Court. They might have said: "There cannot be any appeal at all because the corporation cannot enter into a recognizance"; they might have taken that line, and, of course, that would have raised great difficulties. Or they might have said: "We will construe the statute as having no application to persons who cannot comply with all its requirements." That method leads apparently to endless difficulties, but in some of the cases that Mr. Montgomery has quoted to us that method seems to have been adopted. They might have adopted, it seems to me, a much simpler method and have said this: "It is quite true that strictly speaking the common law contemplates the personal appearance of the person who enters into the recognizance, yet in face of this difficulty what is there to prevent us from saying that this is one of the cases in which a corporation may appear by attorney? There are many instances of cases where a corporation appears by attorney, in the same way as there are many cases in which a corporation, statutory or other, makes contracts. Why should not we adopt that method?" I think on looking into the cases it is quite plain that that is the practice which has been adopted, and adopted really without question for a great number of years. It was hinted at by Mr. Justice Bayley in the case to which our attention has been called, of Cortis v. Kent Waterworks Company (7 B. and C., 314). Mr. Justice Bayley says, at page 331: "If it were necessary to decide that point, I should pause before I said that a corporation is not competent to enter into a recognizance." Then we have the case of Reg. v. Manchester Corporation (7 E. and B., 453), in which I think Mr. Justice Coleridge had in mind the kind of thing to which I have been referring, when he spoke of the practice that had been adopted which might not be a strict compliance with the law; that means, I understand, the common law, but he said that it was evaded rather than overcome. That means that the Judges in their wisdom found a way round. He says, at page 458: "Moreover, in the correlative case, and on the supposition that the corporate body had been the prosecutors removing the indictment, there would have been a difficulty in strictly complying with the statute, because they could not enter into a recognizance, although we are aware that in practice this is evaded by one or more members of the body entering into one for them; evaded, we say, rather than overcome." That was in 1857, and then in 1895 we come to Southern Counties Deposit Bank, Limited v. Boaler (11 The Times L.R., 568; 59 J.P., 536). There Mr. Boaler, who was very acute in taking points, objected that the recognizance entered into in that case by the appellants, the company, was not in order, and he succeeded. He succeeded, not because the corporation could not enter into a recognizance, but because the director who did so on their behalf was not properly authorized by a resolution. In that case Mr. Levett, whom everyone remembers as a great lawyer, cited the old authorities, and he argued on the authority of Cortis v. Kent Waterworks Company (supra) on very much the same lines as part of Mr. Montgomery's argument in the present case, and that provoked from Mr. Justice Wright this statement of his view, and it is a valuable view because one knows of the familiarity of the late Mr. Justice Wright with the practice on such points as these. When Cortis v. Kent Waterworks Company (supra) was cited, Mr. Justice Wright said (59 J.P., at p. 536): "That depends on an antiquated notion that a corporation cannot enter into a recognizance, and that, therefore, an enactment requiring an appellant to enter into a recognizance cannot apply to a corporation." So firmly is the practice established that without hesitation—I may say without the slightest hesitation—all over the country recognizances are accepted on behalf of corporations if they desire to appeal and therefore must enter into recognizances, and in other cases where recognizances are necessary. So well is it established and accepted, that people have not apparently troubled to sit down and think out what is the right form in which a person should enter into a recognizance as attorney on behalf of a corporation, and unfortunately in this case, as I have no doubt in thousands of others, they took the common form, which is the form applicable not to a person entering into a recognizance on behalf of a corporation, but a form of recognizance by a person entering into a recognizance on his own behalf. They have, therefore, got into this difficulty, which I hope may not occur again because there are no merits in the objection, and it has prevented the hearing of this appeal. Whether the appeal would have been successful I do not know, but it would have been better and more satisfactory to everybody if it could have been heard.

For these reasons this appeal fails, and must be dismissed, with the usual consequences.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—I agree. Whatever may have been the old law at the time when there were no limited companies and not a great many corporations, and the rules of the common law were very rigid, for 60 or 70 years now the practice has been to allow companies or corporations to enter into recognizances by an authorized agent. He must be authorized, and in Boaler's case (11 The Times L.R., 568; 59 J.P., 536) a recognizance was held bad because he was not authorized, but it seems to me that the recognizance that he enters into must be one binding his principal, the appellant. You do not get a satisfactory recognizance that A. as an appellant shall prosecute and make his, A.'s, goods liable by filling in a form that B. enters into a recognizance and makes his, B.'s, goods liable. The difficulty in this case has arisen, and I daresay it has arisen in a number of magistrates clerks' offices all over the country if the truth were known, because the taking of a recognizance has been looked upon as a not very important formality, and the clerk taking the recognizance has not taken the trouble to think what exactly he was doing when somebody who was not an appellant proposed to enter into a recognizance. This recognizance was entered into by the clerk, and the clerk acknowledged himself—not the corporation—"to owe our Sovereign Lord the King . . . £100 to be levied on his" (that is the clerk's) "several goods and chattels," and then it goes on: "if the said principal"—and the clerk is not the principal—"fail in the condition hereon endorsed. . . . The condition of the within written recognizance is" so and so. "And whereas" (the clerk) "being dissatisfied with the said determination"—it does not matter whether the clerk is dissatisfied with the determination; the question is whether the principals are dissatisfied with the determination—". . . hath applied to the said Court . . . to state and sign a case," and he binds himself to prosecute his appeal, to submit to the judgment of the Court, and to pay the costs. That is not what it is desired to attain. It is not desired that the clerk shall prosecute, or that the clerk shall submit to judgment, or that the clerk shall pay the costs. What is desired is that the party, the appellants, the corporation, shall prosecute, shall submit to judgment, and shall pay such costs.

For these reasons, which are, I think, the reasons substantially given in the judgments of the Divisional Court, and without going into the very interesting, but, I think, obsolete authorities with which Mr. Montgomery has favoured us for some time, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Justice Atkin.—There are so many proceedings which take place nowadays in Courts of Summary Jurisdiction to which corporations in one form or another are parties, and where it so happens that, as a condition of something being done in the course of the proceedings, or in the course of an appeal, a recognizance has to be entered into by one or other of the parties, that it is a matter of considerable embarrassment that there should be any doubt as to whether a corporation can or cannot enter into a recognizance, and I think the time has come to declare that, whatever the law may have been, the law at the present moment is that a corporation can enter into a recognizance by its duly authorized agent, and such a recognizance must be a recognizance on behalf of the principal, binding the goods of the principal, and binding the principal by the conditions of the recognizance whatever it may be. In order properly to execute such a recognizance, it is necessary to see that the agent shall be duly authorized, and I need not point out the different kinds of corporations, and the limits under which some of them exist as to giving authority to their agent. Sometimes it has to be done under seal, and sometimes it has not. All that I say is that they now can enter into a recognizance by a duly authorized agent.

In this case it appears to me quite plain that the corporation did not enter into a recognizance by a duly authorized agent, but a person who purported to be authorized to make a recognizance entered into a recognizance by which he bound himself to perform the conditions which were mentioned in the recognizance. That does not seem to me to be a compliance with the statute.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court was correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. Mar. 11.

WALLEMS REDERI AKTIESELSKAB v. WM. H. MULLER AND CO., BATAVIA.*

Ship—Charterparty—Dead freight—Charterers' obligation to load full cargo—Failure—Ship's call at port to load other cargo—Delay—Deviation—Mitigation of damages.

The plaintiffs, who were shipowners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to bring a cargo of sugar from Java to Europe, the defendants binding themselves to load a full and complete cargo. A clause of the charterparty provided: "The steamer has liberty to deviate and proceed to and from one or more ports or places in Java in any order . . . to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property." The defendants were not able to load a full cargo, and the steamer left with the quantity loaded, and, without the defendants' consent, she called at Alexandria on the voyage and took in oilcake to fill up, the loading of the cake occupying about five days. In an action by the shipowners against the charterers for dead freight the defendants pleaded that by loading the cake at Alexandria the steamer had deviated from the course of the voyage and the plaintiffs had broken the charter contract and had lost their right of action against the defendants for not loading a full cargo. The plaintiffs alleged that they had loaded the cake in order to mitigate damages.

Held, that it was an implied term of every charterparty that, if the charterers failed in their duty to load, the shipowners had a right to take in other cargo to fill the vacant space, provided that to do so was reasonable in the circumstances, the test being whether it would diminish the damages for which the charterers would otherwise be liable, and that, as the loading of the cake must be taken to have been in mitigation of the damages, and as there was therefore no delay unauthorized by the implied term, there was no deviation, and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

In this case the plaintiffs claimed dead freight alleged to be due under a charterparty.

Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Somervell for the defendants.

By a charterparty dated July 27, 1922, the plaintiffs, Norwegian shipowners at Bergen, chartered their steamer, the Storviken, to the defendants to bring a cargo of sugar from Java. The charterparty provided that the steamer, then at Hong-kong, should proceed to Batavia for orders to load at not more than four ports on the north coast of Java a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags—not less than 6,460 tons, and not more than 7,140 tons—which the charterers bound themselves to ship. When so loaded the vessel was to proceed to Port Said for orders to discharge (always afloat) at one, two, or three safe ports in the United Kingdom and/or certain ports on the Continent.

Different rates of freight were provided according as the steamer should discharge at one, two, or three ports; 500 tons per weather working day were to be loaded or unloaded, and if that rate was not observed demurrage was to be paid at a specified rate. The cargo was to be sent alongside and taken from alongside at the expense and risk of the charterers.

In the margin of the charterparty was a clause providing for exceptions, and a further clause as follows:—

"The steamer has liberty to deviate and proceed to and from one or more ports or places in Java in any order . . . to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property."

The steamer went to Java as arranged and loaded at Surabaya 5,600 tons of sugar. The charterers were unable to ship more, and the steamer left with that quantity and, by arrangement with the owners, called at Madras and left some of the sugar there. The steamer then proceeded on the voyage to England, and called at Alexandria and took in about 1,000 tons of oilcake, the loading of which occupied five days, to fill up. She then came on to Avonmouth, having been ordered to discharge at Bristol.

The plaintiffs now brought an action for dead freight and failure to load a full and complete cargo according to the charterparty.

The defendants pleaded that a full and complete cargo did not amount to as large a quantity as the plaintiffs contended, and that by loading the oilcake at Alexandria the steamer had deviated from the course of the voyage and had broken the charter contract.

Mr. Clement Davies, in opening, gave particulars of the size and capacity of the steamer. After discussion with experts counsel agreed the capacity at 6,850 tons.

Mr. Somervell submitted that by the charterparty the defendants hired the whole ship, and the plaintiffs undertook that she should proceed without delay to the charter destination. It was true that the defendants were not able to load a full and complete cargo, but the plaintiffs did not treat that inability as a repudiation of the contract since they went on to perform their part of it, subject to their right to claim damages. That being so the plaintiffs had no right to deal with the empty space in the ship without the defendants' consent. In fact they did not even inform the defendants that they were going to load the oilcake. The defendants hired the whole ship and only loaded a part cargo, and that gave the plaintiffs a right to dead freight; but the plaintiffs still could not use the ship for any other purpose unless the defendants agreed.

The loading of the oilcake occasioned a delay of five days, and even a very small delay amounted to deviation. In James Morrison and Co., Limited v. Shaw Savill and Albion Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 712; [1916] 2 K.B., 783) the ship had only gone 107 miles out of her course, and that would only mean a delay of a few hours.

The plaintiffs now contended that they loaded the oilcake in order to mitigate damages, but in fact that was not so. They did not say anything about it, and the defendants only found out about it afterwards when they noticed a stevedore's charge for unloading the cake. And in any event one party to a contract could not mitigate his damages without the consent of the other party when the mitigation interfered with the proprietary or contractual rights of the other party.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs certainly could not obtain dead freight in respect of the space which they had actually used for carrying the oilcake.

He referred to Aitken, Lilburn and Co. v. Ernsthausen and Co. (10 The Times L.R., 256; [1894] 1 Q.B., 773); Caffin v. Aldridge (12 The Times L.R., 27; [1895] 2 Q.B., 648); Joseph Thorley, Limited v. Orchis Steamship Company, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 89, 338; [1907] 1 K.B., 243, 660); Internationale Guano en Superphosphaatwerken v. Macandrew and Co. (25 The Times L.R., 529; [1909] 2 K.B., 360).

The defendants had the right to order the steamer to three other ports in Java, but they loaded only at Surabaya, and by not loading at other ports they saved the plaintiffs from having to pay beaconage at those other ports. They therefore claimed an allowance for beaconage from anything which the plaintiffs might recover.

The charterparty contained a clause expressly providing for deviation in certain events, and as the parties had dealt with deviation specifically no other right of deviation could be implied.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in delivering judgment, stated the facts and said that it was now agreed that the obligation under the charterparty was to load 6,850 tons and the amount loaded in fact was only 5,600 tons. Prima facie, therefore, the defendants had committed a breach of their contract by loading 1,250 tons short. In the events which happened the rate of freight payable was 34s. per ton.

At Alexandria the plaintiffs found that there was an opportunity to load 1,000 tons of oilcake, and they loaded that cake without asking for or obtaining the defendants' consent. The defendants now contended that the action of the plaintiffs in loading the cake and spending the time necessary for loading it was a breach of the plaintiffs' duty to prosecute the voyage with dispatch. They said that such breach of duty deprived the plaintiffs of all benefits under the charterparty, including their right of action against the defendants for failing to load a full cargo.

The action of the plaintiffs in loading the oilcake at Alexandria, whether they did or did not intend it to be so at the time, must be taken to have been in mitigation of the damages to which they were entitled from the defendants. It was sometimes said that in such a case there was a duty on the shipowner to take in other cargo in order to mitigate damages. Whether there was such a duty or not, the charterer who had failed to load a full cargo could, if sued for damages, rely on the fact that the shipowner had not done his best to mitigate them. A shipowner was at least entitled to load other cargo, and ought to do so in his own interests.

Assuming, though without deciding the point, that deviation would destroy the contract and the right of action which the plaintiffs had already acquired under it, the real question here was whether in the circumstances there was any deviation at all. Deviation meant departure from the agreed route of the voyage, and the word had been extended to cover delay in performing the agreed voyage. Deviation by delay was a breach of the contract, express or implied, as to the time within which the voyage was to be performed.

In this charterparty there was liberty to tow vessels in distress, and if that liberty was exercised the time occupied in towage would be part of the agreed time of the voyage. Besides the express terms which might be contained in a charterparty there was always an implied liberty to deviate and to spend time in doing so to save life.

Applying the principle of The Moorcock (5 The Times L.R., 316; 14 P.D., 64), he thought it was an implied term of every charterparty that, if the charterer failed in his duty to load, the shipowner had a right to take in other cargo to fill up the vacant space, provided that his doing so was reasonable in the particular circumstances. If he had the right to take in other cargo he must also have the right to spend the time needed for loading it. The test was whether his taking in other cargo in the circumstances diminished the damages for which the charterer would be liable.

He (his Lordship) thought that there was no deviation in this case—i.e., that in performing the voyage there was no delay which was not authorized by the implied term. It was unnecessary to consider what the position would have been if deviation had been made out. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs. There was nothing, he thought, in the beaconage point.

Counsel agreed that after setting off certain items the damages would be £1,556.

HARPER AND ANOTHER v. ASSOCIATED NEWSPAPERS, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Accident)—Death—Exception—Assured not to be in charge of a vehicle—Dismounted bicyclist holding his bicycle—Whether in "charge" of a "vehicle."

By a newspaper policy of insurance against death by accident the insurers undertook to pay £250 in case of death, "if the reader while a pedestrian . . . in a public thoroughfare be killed by accidental impact with a moving vehicle," provided that "the reader be not at the time of the accident in charge of any vehicle."

An insured person who was riding a bicycle got off at the foot of a hill and having pushed it some way stopped to speak to another man and stood holding his bicycle, and an unattended motor-car came running down the hill and struck the insured person and caused his death. On a claim under the policy by the deceased man's executors, Held, that the word "vehicle" in the policy included a bicycle and as the deceased man was "in charge of" the bicycle within the meaning of those words in the policy the insurers were not liable.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This special case stated by an arbitrator raised a question of the construction of an accident insurance policy issued by the Daily Mail.

Mr. Woodgate appeared for the claimants; Mr. Tristram Beresford for the respondents.

The facts out of which the case arose were as follow:

The claimants, Martha Louise Harper and John James Hermitage, were executors of one Edward Henry Harper, who was killed on August 12, 1925. The respondents had issued an insurance policy insuring the deceased man against death by accident. The policy provided that if any dispute arose under it the matter should be referred to arbitration. Arbitration in fact took place and the arbitrator stated the present case.

It was agreed before the arbitrator (1) that if the respondents were liable at all they were liable for a sum of £250; and (2) that the only questions in dispute were:—

A. Whether the deceased man was at the time when he sustained the injuries which caused his death

(a) a pedestrian in a public thoroughfare within the meaning of clause 6 of the policy; or, (b) "riding in a public thoroughfare a bicycle" within the meaning of clause 9 of the policy.

B. Whether a bicycle was a vehicle within the meaning of that word in clause 7 of the policy.

The arbitrator found the following facts:—

The deceased man was a builder at Margate. On the morning of August 12, 1925, he left his place of business intending to call on a matter of business on one Walton who resided at Margate. He went on his bicycle, and in the course of the journey arrived at the foot of a hill and dismounted. He then started pushing his bicycle up the hill. After going a few yards he saw Walton walking on the footpath down the hill towards him. He then moved close to the footpath and stood in the roadway holding his bicycle so that it was between himself and the footpath. Walton also came to a standstill on the path close to the deceased man. A conversation took place between the two men on the business matter in question. An unattended motor-car then came running down the hill at a high speed. A shout of warning was raised and Walton managed to get out of the way, but the deceased man was struck by the car and was so seriously injured that he died on the same day.

The questions stated for the opinion of the Court were those set out above.

The material clauses of the policy were:—

"Clause 6.—£250 in case of death . . . if the reader while a pedestrian (a disabled ex-service man in a self-propelled vehicle shall be deemed a pedestrian) in a public thoroughfare be killed by accidental impact with a moving vehicle. . . .

"Clause 7.— . . . provided that as regards (6) and (7) the reader be not at the time of the accident in charge of any vehicle, loading, unloading, or attending to any vehicle. . . .

"Clause 9.—£250 in case of death if the reader shall be accidentally killed whilst riding in a public thoroughfare a bicycle, tricycle, or motor-bicycle solely for pleasure, but including journeys to and from the reader's usual place of business. . . ."

Mr. Woodgate submitted that the deceased man was a pedestrian at the time of the accident, and came within clause 6.

Mr. Beresford submitted that the deceased man was on a business journey and so was barred from recovering by clause 9, and also that the deceased was at the time in charge of a "vehicle" within clause 7. He was hampered by his bicycle, and failed to escape; his friend, who was not, did escape. A bicycle came within the dictionary definition of a vehicle.

Mr. Woodgate replied.

Mr. Justice Roche, in delivering judgment, stated the facts, and said that, on the one side, it was contended that though the deceased man had started on a business journey on his bicycle he had at the time of the accident become a pedestrian within the meaning of clause 6; and, on the other side, it was contended that the deceased man had not in fact become a pedestrian, and that, even if he had, he was at the time of the accident in charge of a vehicle.

In the view which he took of the matter it was unnecessary to decide whether the deceased man at the time of the accident was a pedestrian or a bicyclist, because he thought that the position was covered by the clause dealing with the middle case. If it had been necessary to decide the point he should have held that the deceased was still a bicyclist and was not a pedestrian at the time of the accident. A bicyclist was none the less a bicyclist because in the course of his journey he found it convenient or necessary to walk up a hill.

It was really unnecessary to decide the point because if the deceased man was a pedestrian he was still in charge of a vehicle within the meaning of clause 7. The word "vehicle" was wide enough to include a bicycle, and if the parties had wished a bicycle to be excluded they could have used language to say so. Here the language of the policy really supported the view that they had intended a bicycle to count as a vehicle. If the deceased man had been killed by being struck by a bicycle the respondents could not have said that that was not a case of impact with a moving vehicle within Clause 6. There must, therefore, be judgment for the respondents.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)

1927. Mar. 10.

LAYZELL AND ANOTHER v. THOMPSON AND OTHERS.*

Highways — Ferry — Franchise ferry—Grant—Evidence.

The Court held that a franchise ferry between South Benfleet and Canvey Island had been granted to the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs, who were in possession of the ferry.

Decision of Romer, J. (43 The Times L.R., 58), affirmed.

The defendants in this case appealed from a decision of Mr. Justice Romer (43 The Times L.R., 58) granting an injunction to restrain them from disturbing the plaintiffs in the possession or enjoyment of a ferry.

In the action the plaintiffs, Mr. Albert Richard Layzell and Mr. William Henry Theobald claimed a declaration that they were entitled to and were possessed of an ancient ferry across Benfleet Creek between the causeway at South Benfleet, Essex, and the highway opposite on Canvey Island. They also sought an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, and agents, from disturbing the plaintiffs in the possession or enjoyment of the ferry.

The defendants had established and maintained a rival service at the same place.

The population of Canvey Island had in recent years increased from 300 to 5,000. The defence was that the ferry claimed was not, and could not be, an ancient ferry, as it was only at high tide that it was necessary to cross by boat and there was a public highway across the creek at the same point at which the ferry was claimed.

Mr. Justice Romer said, in delivering judgment, that the ferry claimed was unique in one respect, because at low water the tidal creek could be traversed on foot. The question he had to determine was a difficult one, because of the almost total absence of documentary evidence in support of the plaintiffs' claim. On the whole, regarding himself as a jury, he came to the conclusion that in times gone by there had been a grant of a franchise ferry to the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs who were in possession of the ferry and, that being so, he must grant an injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Roland Burrows and Mr. H. S. Palmer appeared for the appellants; Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. Hodge for the respondents.

Mr. Burrows submitted (1) that by reason of certain circumstances, the existence of the public highway between the same points, there could not be a franchise ferry in the place where it was claimed; (2) that on the evidence it was impossible to presume a lost grant of an ancient ferry; and (3) that even if there was an ancient ferry the plaintiffs had not proved their title to it.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that for his part he should be content simply to agree with the careful judgment of Mr. Justice Romer, but in deference to the argument which had been submitted he would say a few words on a case which perhaps deserved a little more consideration than mere acquiescence.

As regards the first point put forward by Mr. Burrows, the unique circumstances, it was true that at low tide it was possible to cross this waterway dry-shod by planks leading to stepping stones. At high tide the water was about 75 yards across; the creek so formed was a waterway and there had been a passage of barges along it for many years. It was said that, as there was a highway of water at high tide and indications of a highway leading to each shore where the ferry crossed at high tide, and as there was a causeway at low tide, it was impossible that there could be a franchise of a ferry—a ferry which would only be needed during part of the day.

He thought that that suggestion was ill founded, because at certain times, when the tide was near the full, there was an interruption of traffic, and it might take place during business hours and be highly inconvenient. It looked as if there might be need of a ferry, and, if that need were not always so pressing as where there was a channel of water at all tides, the need was proved by the fact that for very many years there had been persons plying as ferrymen.

It had been argued that there was no documentary evidence of the existence of the ferry and no evidence from maps, because the ferry was not in fact marked on those produced. But such maps as had been produced did not seem to be evidence, and a dock book which had been produced from the British Museum also seemed to be of no weight. The really important fact was that for very many years persons in a regular chronological sequence had plied for hire from shore to shore, and he could not, therefore, find in those "unique circumstances," as they were called, anything to contradict the possibility of the grant of a ferry.

In alleging that there could be no presumption of a lost grant, Mr. Burrows had said that the user of the ferry did not prove this presumption; that it was inconsistent with it; that the ferry service varied; that the toll charges varied; that the service had not in fact the consistency which should be found in a properly conducted ferry.

Isolated facts, perhaps, supported that view. There was evidence that in 1910 an application was made by John Wright to the Port of London Authority for a licence for the ferry, and that that body wrote back that they could not see their way to grant a licence and that there was nothing to prevent any person from conveying passengers across the river. But that was not conclusive, because the Port of London Authority had no power to decide the question. Further, there was a man named Whitehead who once claimed that "this is a free ferry." Wright, the predecessor of the plaintiffs, then went to consult the harbour-master, whoever he might have been, and the result was that he gave Whitehead £5 upon an undertaking not to ferry while he (Wright) was alive. That might certainly indicate that Wright was afraid of his claim to a franchise being challenged, but it was not conclusive. The payment of the £5 might have been an act of discretion and not necessarily an admission that there was no franchise of a ferry.

As regards the suggestion that there had been inconsistency in the charges made, there was no doubt that during certain hours of the night there had been heavy charges made by Wright. It seemed that on certain occasions he had asked for more than the 6d. per person ordinarily levied during the night hours, and there was evidence of other instances of inconsistent demands. But in considering that matter Mr. Justice Romer had rightly turned to Trotter v. Harris (2 Y. and J., 285), where it was said that in all these cases of ferries there might have been acts done contrary to the duty of the ferryman or the right of the public, but that only meant that ferrymen, like others in this world, were subject to human frailties, and not that there was no ferry. In that case Lord Chief Baron Alexander said (2 Y. and J., at p. 288): "It cannot be contended that a variation in the toll will destroy the right; but that topic is urged as evidence of usurpation. Now, to my mind, that is capable of a very different construction, for no one would court investigation into a right founded upon usurpation by such a measure. The evidence for the defendant is that which ordinarily occurs in every case of this description. Every right of this kind is subject to infringements, which it is, in many instances, impossible to prevent. . . . But the jury must have taken all these circumstances into their consideration, and, having found for the plaintiff, I see no ground to disturb their verdict."

The fact was that even if there had been a certain number of unreasonable and improper demands, yet, when it was found that there was an exercise of this right of ferrying by a long series of watermen, the fact that there had been some irregularities or infringements of the right of the public did not seriously avail to upset the recognition of a right to the ferry so established. Mr. Justice Romer had taken all these facts into consideration in giving his very careful judgment.

A book had been produced by the vicar of Canvey containing an entry that in 1742 a sum of £14 had been expended for a bridge across this creek, but it seemed impossible to say, the width of the creek being 75 yards, that even in the 18th century any bridge could have been built for that sum. The appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT said that the fact that the alleged ferry started from a highway, to link up with a highway, seemed to him to be all in favour of the plaintiffs ; the fact that at certain states of the tide persons could walk across this creek also seemed no answer to the claim, inasmuch as the inconvenience of having perhaps to wait five or six hours until the tide went down would be amply sufficient to account for the establishment of a ferry. Equally futile was the argument that until the present century there were only 300 persons on the island, for the wants of 300 persons must be catered for as well as those of a larger community.

As to the evidence of title, it was clear, as the Judge below had said, that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to establish title in the ordinary way ; they might show, and had shown, that they were in possession of the ferry. In Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XIV., page 559, it was stated that : "A ferry owner is liable to be indicted and fined if he does not keep his ferry in readiness and in good repair, or to an action at the suit of a person who has suffered special damage by neglect of the ferry owner's duties. Another consequence of such neglect may be that the Crown may by proceedings in the nature of scire facis or quo warranto annul the grant of the ferry. and if necessary vest it in some other person. But neglect does not ipso facto destroy the franchise of a ferry." Mr. Roland Burrows said that he did not need to prove actual neglect, or conduct which would render the plaintiffs liable to any penalty ; but that he could show that the plaintiffs had so conducted themselves as to make their conduct inconsistent with the keeping of a proper ferry ; it need not, said counsel, be misconduct, but conduct inconsistent with the existence of a ferry, which the appellants must establish, and they claimed to have done that. Having gone carefully through the evidence, he (Lord Justice Sargant) could find no reason for saying that the Judge below had not arrived at a right conclusion. There had been a continuous conveyance of passengers across this creek at all seasons, wet or fine, between 6 a.m. and 11 p.m. at a uniform charge, and that seemed a strong circumstance to show that there had been the grant of a franchise of a ferry. There seemed to be strong prima facie evidence of the existence of the franchise. There might have been instances of extortion, possibly of neglect, but although that state of things might give rise to a right to take proceedings against the plaintiffs, yet it did not apparently seem incompatible with the continued existence of the franchise.

He (the Lord Justice) did not intend to express any opinion as to whether it was permissible to make a higher charge at night. There might perhaps be a franchise which allowed the charge of 6d. at night, but he would not express any view on the matter.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that he agreed that the appeal failed, and he was quite content to rely upon the very clear judgment of Mr. Justice Romer. He wished, however, to guard himself against expressing any view as to the amount of tolls which the plaintiffs might charge.

IN RE BOOTH AND THE SOUTHEND-ON-SEA ESTATE COMPANY'S CONTRACT.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Receipt for purchase-money—Power to give—Sole trustee of Darkest England Scheme—Surplus revenue—Temporary investment in land—Sale—"Settlement"—"Capital money"—Whether signatures of two trustees required—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 18), ss. 29, 94, 95.

The sole trustee of the Darkest England Scheme, connected with the Salvation Army, is not precluded by anything in the Settled Land Act, 1925, from being able alone to give a valid receipt to the purchasers of land in which surplus revenue of the scheme has been temporarily invested. The deed poll constituting the scheme is not made a "settlement" by the Act, and the purchase-money on such a sale is not "capital money" within the Act and is not thereby required to be paid to at least two trustees.

This was a summons by the Southend-on-Sea Estates Company under section 49 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (which replaced the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874), for the decision of the question whether under the Settled Land Act, 1925, General William Bramwell Booth, the vendor of certain property to the company under a contract of sale dated September 17, 1926, could as General of the Salvation Army and sole director of the Darkest England Scheme, alone give to the company, as purchasers, a valid receipt for the purchase-money.

The Darkest England Scheme was a charity supported partly by voluntary contributions and partly by the funds of the Salvation Army, and the General of the Salvation Army for the time being was ipso facto director of the scheme. The scheme was constituted by a deed poll dated January 30, 1890, and executed by William Booth, the founder, and then the General, of the Salvation Army. Under that deed the funds of the scheme were under the absolute control of the General of the Salvation Army, subject to a proviso that he must publish balance-sheets. He had power to purchase and sell land and to give good receipts and discharges for purchase-money.

The property in question was conveyed on August 25, 1893, to the late General Booth as director of the Darkest England Scheme. The property became vested in General William Bramwell Booth, executor of General William Booth, as the sole trustee of the scheme, and he agreed to sell it to the Southend-on-Sea Estates Company.

The matter arose under section 29 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, which conferred on trustees for charitable purposes the powers of a tenant for life, but not those of statutory owners.

The question raised was whether, since section 94 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, provided that capital money under a settlement must be paid to at least two trustees or to a trust corporation, who alone could give a valid receipt, General Booth could give a valid receipt for the purchase-money. That involved the question whether the deed poll constituted a settlement within the meaning of the Act and whether the purchase-money was capital money.

Mr, Topham, K.C., and Mr. F. G. Underhay appeared for the purchasers ; Mr. J. H. Stamp for the Salvation Army.

Mr. Topham contended that under section 29 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, the trustees being constituted tenants for life, the provision as to payment of capital money to two or more trustees must apply ; and that the proceeds of the present sale, being money arising from the sale of settled property, must be capital money. There was nothing to show that the money was really income, and under the Act the purchaser was not bound to inquire into such a matter.

Mr. Stamp said that all the contributions to the Salvation Army were for purposes of revenue. When there was surplus revenue it was invested in the purchase of land or other things until required, but that did not make what was purchased capital. The trustees were, by section 29, given the powers of a tenant for life only for the purposes of the section and not for all the purposes of the Act. It was inconceivable that the Act was intended to refer to such a body as the Salvation Army. The purchase-money in question was not capital money at all and General Booth was selling not under the Act but under his trust deed.

Mr. Justice Astbury said that the question seemed to be one of considerable importance, because all property of the Salvation Army and its subsidiary trusts was vested in the General alone. It was difficult to suppose that the Settled Land Act, 1925, was intended to interfere with an old-established trust, such as that of the Salvation Army. All moneys given to the Salvation Army were given for the purposes of revenue, and if from time to time they were invested in the purchase of land or other investments they did not cease to be revenue, and they were treated as such by the General.

The purchasers contended that section 29 made all land held for charitable purposes "settled land" and gave the trustees the powers of a tenant for life ; that under section 109 the powers given by the trust deed were additional powers to be exercised by the tenant for life ; that sections 94 and 95 applied ; and that the purchase-money, being capital money, could not be paid to less than two trustees who alone could give a valid receipt.

But the provisions of section 29 were only for "the purposes of this section," and, though it was difficult to see what those words exactly meant, he did not think that they made land held for charitable purposes "settled land," or the trustees persons having the powers of a tenant for life for all the purposes of all the sections of the Act.

He did not think that there was in the Act anything which made the trust deed in question a settlement, or made the purchase-money capital money within the meaning of section 94 or of section 117, the interpretation section. He thought that General Booth had shown a good title and could give a valid receipt for the purchase-money.

Landlord and Tenant — Restrictions—Occupation of premises by tenant's family—Permission by tenant—Whether tenant protected by Rent Restriction Acts.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Abraham Kreitman (the landlord), from a judgment of Judge Cluer, at the Whitechapel County Court, in favour of the defendant, Mr. Morris Vidofsky, the statutory tenant, in an action for possession of premises known as 20, Cambridge-road, E.1. The question at issue was whether a statutory tenant lost the protection afforded by the Rent Restriction Acts by ceasing to reside on the premises himself and by allowing members of his family to reside there instead.

Mr. Phineas Quass appeared for the appellant ; Mr. J. P. Eddy for the respondent.

Mr. Quass said that the tenant rented the premises a considerable number of years ago. He originally occupied the ground floor and first floor as business premises and the two upper floors for residential purposes. Some years ago he left the two upper floors and had not occupied the premises since for residential purposes, but he had brought his father, mother, and brother into the two upper floors, which they occupied rent free. The county court Judge refused the landlord's claim for possession of the premises on the ground that the tenant's not being in actual occupation of the premises as a resident did not deprive him of the protection afforded to tenants by the Rent Restriction Acts.

Counsel submitted that, in order to entitle the tenant to the protection of the Acts, he must "retain possession" either by residing on the premises himself or through the residence of someone protected by the Acts. Here there was nobody residing on the premises who was so protected.

Mr. Eddy was not called on to argue.

Mr. Justice Acton, in giving judgment, said that, speaking for himself, in regard to cases under the Rent Restriction Acts, the less that was said by Judges, consistently with the duty imposed upon them, the better, as decisions were apt to afford scope for ingenuity in raising new and difficult points.

The county court Judge had said that the respondent was a tenant in occupation protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. It appeared that the matter had come before a Divisional Court before, and that some doubt had been felt in regard to what precisely was meant by the phrase used by the county court Judge and, in answer to an inquiry, the Judge had replied that he had only found as an undisputed fact that the father, mother and brother of the tenant occupied the living rooms with the permission of the tenant.

It could not be shown on the facts that the county court Judge had arrived at an erroneous conclusion in law, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Talbot concurred.

LACTEOSOTE, LIMITED v. ALBERMAN.*

Trade Marks—Assignment—Connexion with goodwill—Trade Marks Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 15), s. 22.

The principle that an English trade mark can be assigned only in connexion with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods for which it has been registered is not satisfied where the owner of the trade mark, being a person who manufactures the goods abroad, assigns it to his sole wholesale agents in England together with the goodwill of the business of importing the goods into England and selling them in this country. In such a case the assignment is invalid unless made in connexion with the goodwill of the manufacturing and vending business of the assignor, and the trade mark, unless the assignment is so made, becomes deceptive in the hands of the assignee and is liable to be expunged from the register.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment dismissing this action and ordering the rectification of the Register of Trade Marks by expunging therefrom two trade marks registered in 1907 and 1925.

The plaintiffs, Lacteosote, Limited, the sole wholesale agents for the sale of Sirop Famel in Great Britain, sought to restrain the infringement by the defendant, Mr. A. Alberman, a dealer in proprietary drugs, of the registered trade marks of two labels, one being, in substance, an English translation of the other, which was in French.

The defendant, who was selling in this country a pharmaceutical preparation not emanating from the plaintiffs, and on which appeared a label constituting an infringement, brought a motion to rectify the register by removing from it the two trade marks in question.

It was admitted that if the first mark was to be struck off the register the second mark must also be struck off.

In 1907 M. Pierre Famel was manufacturing in France a pharmaceutical preparation known as Sirop Famel of the nature of a cold cure. He registered in England in 1907 the first of the trade marks, a label in respect of "a pharmaceutical preparation for human use," and which bore prominently the words "Sirop Famel." Since 1907 M. Famel had made the preparation in France, had sold it there under a label corresponding to the 1907 mark, and had imported it into England, where it had been sold on his behalf under M. Famel's 1907 mark.

Of recent years, owing to the operation of the rate of exchange between France and England, the price of the preparation in France had been a good deal less than that at which it had been offered in England, and it had, therefore, paid English druggists to buy the preparation in France at the French price, import it into England, and sell it here at a price below that at which M. Famel's selling agents in England offered it.

* Reported by G. P. Langworthy, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

M. Famel and another Frenchman on April 16, 1923, formed the plaintiff company with a capital of £100, with the object of importing Sirop Famel and other preparations of his from France for sale in Great Britain. On May 31, 1923, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with M. Famel under which they were appointed sole wholesale agents for the sale of Sirop Famel in Great Britain until 1933.

On June 28, 1924, M. Famel executed an assignment to the plaintiffs of the 1907 trade mark in consideration of £5 paid to him by the plaintiffs, "together with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods with respect to which the said trade mark is registered." On September 4, 1924, the plaintiffs were registered as proprietors of the 1907 mark.

On March 13, 1925, the plaintiffs applied for the registration of the second trade mark in question, which was, in substance, a translation of the 1907 mark, and they obtained the registration on April 27, 1926. The goods in respect of which that 1925 mark was to be used were described as "a pharmaceutical preparation for human use made in France."

From the time of the assignment the plaintiffs continued to procure Sirop Famel from M. Famel in France and to sell it in England under, at first, the 1907 mark, and subsequently under the 1925 mark.

Mr. R. Moritz, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Evans-Jackson appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. Kenneth R. Swan for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Clauson, in the course of his considered judgment, said that he was clear that the 1907 trade mark was adapted to distinguish M. Famel's goods without any reference to the importer, and that the 1925 mark distinguished M. Famel's goods and was not adapted to distinguish goods made by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had admittedly never made the goods either in England or France. The question was whether the plaintiffs were the properly registered owners of the 1907 mark.

Apart from statute it was established by the decision in Leather Cloth Company v. American Leather Cloth Company (11 H.L. Cas., 523, at p. 534) that a purchaser of a mark became owner of it only if he became at the same time purchaser of the manufactory or the business concerned, to the goods of which the mark had been affixed. The first clause of section 22 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, merely embodied that principle in statutory form (see Pinto v. Badman Brothers, 7 The Times L.R., 317). The question therefore was whether, when the 1907 mark was assigned to the plaintiffs, they became, at the same time, owners of the business concerned in Sirop Famel.

The plaintiffs only contended that the assignment of June 28, 1924, was an assignment of the business of importing a preparation into Great Britain and selling it here. The first clause of section 22 of the Trade Marks Act, 1905, did not enable a mark distinctive of goods emanating from M. Famel's business (composed of manufacturing and vending departments) to be assigned with a portion of the business, namely, that of vending in Great Britain, which portion was separated from the rest of the business. Otherwise, a mark distinctive of goods produced and sold in the business carried on by M. Famel would become by the assignment distinctive not of goods produced and sold in that business by M. Famel, or his successors, but of goods sold by a newly separated and, therefore, different business by persons who succeeded M. Famel as vendors in Great Britain of the goods but not as producers of them. Such a position was inconsistent with the principle that a trade mark was distinctive of goods with which a particular business was concerned. If the identity of the business was destroyed the mark was destroyed with it.

The plaintiffs' contention that the assignment was effectual to transfer the 1907 trade mark to them therefore failed, because the mark was not assigned in connexion with the goodwill of the business, namely, M. Famel's producing and vending business concerned in Sirop Famel—within the meaning of the Trade Marks Act, 1905.

That conclusion, come to on the construction of section 22, was corroborated by the judgment of Lord Justice Fry in In re Apollinaris Company's Trade Marks ([1891] 2 Ch., 186, at p. 234).

For those reasons the action must be dismissed, and the register rectified by expunging both the 1907 and 1925 trade marks. The plaintiffs must pay the costs of the action and of the motion for rectification.

Revenue — Income-tax — Exemption—"Resident"—"Ordinarily resident"—Meaning of expressions—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 46; Sched. C, Rule 2 (d).

Consideration of the meaning of the expression "ordinarily resident" in Rule 2 (d) of Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and of the expression "resident" in s. 46 of the same Act.

In these two cases, which raised the same question on somewhat different facts and were heard together, the appellants appealed from decisions of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who held, in each case, that they were "resident" in the United Kingdom for the years ending April 5, 1921-1925, for which years the assessments were made under paragraph (d) of Rule 2 of Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that they were also "ordinarily resident" within the United Kingdom within section 46 of the Act.

In the first case the appellant, Mr. Louis N. Levene, was the owner of securities of British possessions and of British War Loan, and he claimed relief from taxation in respect of the income arising therefrom. In the case of the securities, his claim was made under paragraph (d) of Rule 2 of Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, on the ground that he was not resident in the United Kingdom for the years in question; and, in the case of the War Loan, under section 46 of the same Act, on the ground that he was not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during those years.

Mr. Levene was a British subject and had formerly been interested in a financial business in London. He discontinued that business in 1911, and since that date had had no occupation. He lived in Curzon-street, W., until early in 1918, when he decided to break up his establishment and to live abroad. In December, 1919, he went abroad and did not return until July 10, 1920. Since then he had been in this country for 19 weeks in 1920, 21 in 1921, 20 in 1922, 20 in 1923, and 22 in 1924. During the remainder of those five years he was staying at Monaco and at various places in France. He and his wife had been in indifferent health, and had been advised to live in the South of France and to avoid the United Kingdom in the winter months.

One of the reasons for their visits to England was to obtain medical advice, and they also came to visit their relatives. Other reasons were that the appellant might take part in certain Jewish religious observances, visit the graves of his parents at Southampton, and deal with his income-tax affairs.

The Special Commissioners were satisfied that when the appellant left this country in December, 1919, he had formed the intention, which he had consistently carried out ever since, of living abroad for the greater part of the year, and of returning to this country each year, remaining here for considerable periods, but not for a period equal in the whole to six months in any year.

Taking into consideration all the facts in regard to the appellant's past and present habits of life, the regularity and length of his visits here, his ties with this country, and his freedom from attachment abroad, the Special Commissioners came to the conclusion that, at least until January, 1925, when the appellant took the lease of a flat in Monte Carlo, he continued to be resident in the United Kingdom, and they dismissed the appeal.

On appeal, Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners.

The other appellant, Mr. S. R. Lysaght, was born in England of Irish parents, and for many years before 1919 lived at Flax Bourton, near Bristol, being a managing director of John Lysaght, Limited, iron founders and engineers, with works at Bristol and Cardiff.

In 1919 he partially retired, and went to live in Ireland, where he owned property. He remained an advisory director to Lysaght, Limited, at a salary of £1,500 a year, and was in the habit of coming to England about once a month for directors' meetings and other purely business purposes. His wife never came with him. He rarely came to London, and generally made the Spa Hotel, Bath, his headquarters on his English visits. He occasionally went to Scunthorpe, Lincolnshire, where the company had a branch. During the last five years he had made three trips to Australia and South America on behalf of the company.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners, who found that the appellant was "resident" and "ordinarily resident" in the United Kingdom during the years in question.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellant Levene, and Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. S. R. Benson for the appellant Lysaght; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown in each case.

The Court, having taken time for consideration, delivered judgments unanimously affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Levene's case, but, Lord Justice Lawrence dissenting, allowing the appeal in Lysaght's case.

Levene's Case.

The Master of the Rolls.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt dated July 23, 1926, by which he affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners holding the appellant liable to the assessment made upon him.

The questions for decisions are whether he was entitled to exemption from income-tax on War Loan interest under section 46 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as a person not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, and on interest on securities of British possessions under Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C as a person not resident in the United Kingdom; and the years under review are the four financial years 1921-25.

It is unnecessary to repeat the facts found by the Special Commissioners, and set out in the case stated. The first three paragraphs of their careful decision summarize sufficiently those upon which the decision must turn:—"The appellant is a British subject and until March, 1918, he was a householder in London. He then surrendered the lease of his house and sold his furniture, and from March, 1918, until January, 1925, he did not occupy any fixed place of residence, but lived in hotels, whether in this country or abroad. He was admittedly resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom until December, 1919. He then went abroad and in each subsequent year he had spent between seven and eight months abroad and between four and five months in the United Kingdom. We are satisfied upon the evidence that when he left the United Kingdom in December, 1919, he had formed the intention, which he has consistently carried out ever since, of living abroad for the greater part of the year, and of returning to this country each year and remaining here for considerable periods but not for a period equal in the whole to six months in any year."

The terms "resident" and "ordinarily resident" occur many times throughout the Income Tax Act, 1918. Thus in section 46 the words are "persons who are not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom"; in Clause 1 of Schedule D, the word is "residing"; and in Rule 1 applicable to Case IV. of Schedule D the words are "not resident." There are many other places where the words are to be found. I find it difficult to attach any distinction of meaning to the word "ordinarily" as affecting the term "resident," unless it be to prevent facts which would amount to residence from being so estimated, on the ground that they arose from some fortuitous cause, such as illness of the so-called resident or of some other person, which demanded his continuance at a place for a special purpose otherwise than in accordance with his own usual arrangement and shaping of his movements.

I agree with Mr. Justice Rowlatt that to find residence it is not necessary to find a building or "seat" as that word is sometimes used. A resident may pass from place to place, house to house, hotel to hotel, for life at a hotel has become a fixed habit with many owing to the exigencies of modern life, and he may still be a resident. I also agree with Mr. Justice Rowlatt's view as to the meaning and effect of Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules applicable to Schedule C. There are a number of decisions upon the meaning of "residence" in various Acts of Parliament, but none of them assist in deciding the question of its meaning under the Taxing Acts.

Residence must indicate something more than mere presence. In the cases that have been decided on this question some efforts have been made towards definition, but as a rule by way of contrast to the facts of the case under review.

Thus, in Attorney-General v. Coote (4 Price, 183) the subject had become possessed of a house in Connaught-place. The antithesis put by Baron Graham was framed:—"Was his residence occasional or for a temporary purpose?" And the answer given based on the fact of the possession of a house in London was in the negative. Two sailors were held to be resident where their wives and family lived—(In re Young, 1 Tax Cas., 57, and Rogers v. Inland Revenue, 1 Tax Cas., 225)—and where they themselves went when on shore.

In Lloyd v. Sulley Lord Shand (2 Tax Cas., 37, at p. 45) describes the negation of residence as "temporary without any characteristic of settled residence about the occupation of his house at Minard," in Argyllshire. Turnbull v. Foster (6 Tax Cas., 206) was held to be in contrast with Lloyd v. Sulley (supra). The subject was a merchant carrying on business in Madras, and had his usual residence in Madras, and was not in the United Kingdom at all during the year of assessment, though his wife and family were there.

In Cooper v. Cadwalader (5 Tax Cas., 101) an American came to Scotland regularly in the shooting season and could have come whenever he liked. He had a complete establishment, so that his arrival was not for a casual purpose, but in accordance with his intention and habit of life. The above observations or tests, so called, may be of service in order to remind the Court of the points that must not be overlooked, but they afford no concrete definition.

Probably it is not possible to frame one. Residence must be a question of degree and of fact; and I think the Special Commissioners were right in saying that the subject's claim to exemption must be determined on the balance of the facts in each case.

I suggest as a characteristic factor for consideration, even if it does not fulfil the nature of a test—to ascertain whether the suggested alternative place of residence is one which the subject seeks willingly and repeatedly in order to obtain rest or refreshment or recreation suitable to his choice, where for a time he is embedded in the enjoyment of what he desired to attain and has found in the abode of his own option.

Another factor may be found, and an important one—if he returns to and seeks his own fatherland in order to enjoy a sojourn in proximity to his relatives and friends.

The Special Commissioners have acted in accordance with these principles. They had abundant material on which in the application of them to the facts of the case their conclusion could be based.

In my judgment they came to a right decision, and I agree with Mr. Justice Rowlatt. For these reasons this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—The appellant here has been charged with income-tax for the five financial years ending on April 5, 1925, in respect of (a) interest or dividends of securities of British possessions payable in the United Kingdom, and (b) income from British War Loan. He has claimed relief from this income-tax as to (a) under Rule 2 (d) of the General Rules of Schedule C of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and as to (b) under section 46 (1) of the Act itself; and he has been refused relief in both cases, as to (a) on the ground that he has not proved that he was not resident in the United Kingdom, and as to (b) on the ground that he has not shown that he was not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. In each case the appellant had to prove or show the facts necessary to obtain relief to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, since the Treasury have directed that claims under section 46 (1) shall be dealt with by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The facts so proved or shown appear in the case stated by the Special Commissioners ; and we have to decide on those facts whether the Special Commissioners were wrong in law in deciding that the appellant had not proved that he was not resident in the United Kingdom during the years in question. I use the word "resident" only and omit the phrase "ordinarily resident" because, whatever possible distinction between the word and the phrase may be drawn on the facts of some particular case, I cannot see in the facts of the present case anything to warrant the drawing of any such distinction. His habit of life through each of the five years has been in its ordinary course.

In the rule and the section in question "resident" must, I think, be given a meaning corresponding to that of "residing" in the phrase "any person residing in the United Kingdom" in heads (a) (i.) and (ii.) of the first charging section in Schedule D of the Act. The first meaning of the word "reside" in the Concise Oxford Dictionary is "have one's home, dwell permanently" ; and that the word is used in this charging section with this connotation appears to be made reasonably clear by Rule 2 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D, which exempts from the class of persons residing in the United Kingdom any person "who is in the United Kingdom" for a temporary purpose only and not with a view or intent of establishing his residence therein and who has not actually resided in the United Kingdom for a total period of six months in the year of assessment. The language of this Rule draws a marked distinction between mere physical presence, called "actual residence," which by the final words of the Rule makes a person chargeable, if he is actually resident for six months, and that presence which is in the course of being at home and therefore amounts to residence in the ordinary sense. In other words, the residence which makes a person chargeable depends not on mere presence in the United Kingdom (unless that is for six months in all), but on the quality of the presence in relation to the objects and intention of the person sought to be made chargeable.

The appellant lays great stress on the connotation of the word "reside" as implying a home or an establishment, and differentiates his case from those of Lloyd v. Sulley (2 Tax Cas., 37), Cooper v. Cadwalader (5 Tax Cas., 101), Thomson v. Inland Revenue (56 Sc. L.R., 10), and Pickles v. Foulsham (9 Tax Cas., 261) on the ground that in those cases the taxpayer had a home or establishment in the United Kingdom. He points out that not only did he give up the lease of his house in London in the year 1918, but that since then he has lived entirely in hotels, whether in England or abroad, until January, 1925, when he took a lease for nine years of a flat at Monte Carlo. And he contends that, while merely living at various hotels in the United Kingdom for four or five months in the year, he cannot properly be said to be residing in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the statute.

I agree that the cases referred to do not conclude the matter against the appellant, but, on the other hand, I do not think that they assist him. They determine that when the individual has a home here in the ordinary sense he is taxable ; but they do not determine that he cannot have a home here unless he has an establishment here. It seems to me that an individual may so arrange his life as to constitute an hotel his residence in the sense of being his home ; and although, if he stays at a series of hotels in different places in the United Kingdom, he may not be resident in ordinary language at any one of those places, he may yet be resident in the United Kingdom. The very point came up for decision in Reid v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (10 Tax Cas., 673), which was a rather stronger case for the taxpayer than the present and was decided in favour of the Crown ; and, in my judgment, that decision was correct.

The Special Commissioners have treated the question quite properly as one of degree and to be determined on the balance of facts in each case. They have found the facts most carefully and have stated fully the considerations that actuated them. I cannot find that they have omitted any relevant considerations, or have taken into account any that are irrelevant ; and I cannot see any reason for differing from their conclusions or from the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. It seems to me that, during the years in question, the appellant elected in each such year to adopt a regular system of life, in accordance with which he and his wife made their abode and lived in this country for a period of between four and five months in each year, and that they were therefore resident in the United Kingdom not merely in the sense of being present here but in the fuller sense of making their home here.

What practical difference, if any, has been or will be caused in the appellant's position in this respect by the lease of the flat at Monte Carlo from January, 1925, is outside the limits of this case.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in upholding the decision of the Commissioners, has followed the Scotch case of Reid v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (10 Tax Cas., 673). In my opinion, that case was rightly decided and is indistinguishable from the present case.

Lysaght's Case.

The Master of the Rolls.—This is an appeal from Mr. Justice Rowlatt's judgment dated November 17, 1926, confirming the decision of the Special Commissioners that the subject was liable to the assessment made upon him.

The facts are fully stated by the Special Commissioners. The appellant sold a residence which he had near Bristol and went with his family to live at Mallow —that is, not far from a residence in County Cork which he had inherited from his father but which was sold to the tenants after he had become possessed of it. It is clear upon the facts that, so far as he could do so, he changed his home life from England to Ireland. Since then he has come over to England to attend the monthly board meetings of John Lysaght, Limited. The meetings are held at Bath. He also visits the branch business of the company at Scunthorpe, in Lincolnshire. Except for these business visits, he remains in Ireland and looks after his estate there of some 800 acres. The Special Commissioners find that these visits to England are solely for business purposes ; the appellant's wife never accompanies him.

The case appears to be one analogous to that of the merchant who goes to a place to attend a market regularly as often as that market is held ; to that of the barrister who regularly attends the assizes at a particular town. The reason for the visit of the merchant or barrister is that it is paid to the locality where his business requires him. In the present case, if the board of directors determined to hold their meetings at Bristol or Cardiff or Lincoln, the appellant's visits to England would be paid to one of those towns as readily as to Bath and Scunthorpe. In my judgment a man may come repeatedly to this country and yet not acquire a residence, for he may go to a place to which duty or business calls him, and whither he resorts for such space of time only as that duty compels him to remain or the business requires his attendance. That is a place which is fixed not by himself alone but is determined by other considerations than his own desire or volition—a visit to which is necessitated and determined by causes exterior to his mere will, and they might have led him somewhere else, if the path of duty had lain in a different direction.

Such visits may have other characteristics and so justify a finding of a residence in relation to them. But tested by the observations or factors to which I have made reference in Levene's case, the present case appears to me to fall on the other side of the line.

There remains, however, the question that has given me some concern—that is, is the matter so much a question of fact that it is not open to this Court to review the decision of the Special Commissioners ? Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in his judgment, felt unable to differ from the Special Commissioners. They have found the facts, but in paragraph 5 " held " upon those facts that the appellant was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom for each of the years in respect of which the claim to exemption arises. They thus applied the law as they thought it should be interpreted to the facts which they had found.

It is unnecessary to go through the many cases decided on this point, for in Great Western Railway Co. v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448 ; [1922] 2 A.C., 1) Lord Wrenbury states the course to be followed succinctly in a sentence, at p. 30 : " It was for the Special Commissioners to find and state all the facts. . . . It was not for the Court to question those facts in any way. But the question for the Court was whether, upon those facts, Mr. Hall held an office or employment of profit within the meaning of the Act. That is a question of law. What does the Act mean ? What is the true construction ? " Emphasis is added to the decision of the House that the question before it was one of law and not of fact merely because of its divergence from the decision of the Court of Appeal, which had decided otherwise. Lord Sterndale had plainly stated in his judgment that the Court of Appeal could not interfere with the result of the facts found.

Applying the decision in Bater's case (supra) in the House of Lords to the present case, I am satisfied that this Court can review the result which the Special Commissioners held to follow in law upon the facts found. The meaning of " residence " in the Income Tax Act, 1918, must be a question of law ; and upon the facts found by the Special Commissioners the Court must determine whether the subject has brought himself within the terms of the exemption in the Act rightly construed.

In my judgment, therefore, this Court can reconsider the case upon the question of the meaning of " residence " in law, and ought to hold that the facts found do not satisfy that meaning and constitute residence. The result is that the subject is entitled to the exemption claimed. The appeal will be allowed with costs, and the Inland Revenue Commissioners will be directed to allow the exemption.

Lord Justice Sargant.—In this case the appellant is seeking a relief from taxation similar to that in the case of Levene v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue. I need not repeat the remarks that I made in that case as to the meaning of the word " resident " and the phrase " ordinarily resident," but I should add that in this case, as in that, I see no reason for drawing any distinction between the word and the phrase. Everything here, as there, has followed an ordinary course.

So far, this case is analogous to the Levene case, but the facts here are very different. Here there is the very important distinction that, throughout the whole period during which the appellant is alleged to have been in course of becoming resident in the United Kingdom, he has undoubtedly been keeping up a home in Southern Ireland and residing there in the ordinary sense of the word. His visits to England have been for short periods of a week only in each month, have been for strictly business purposes only, and have not been in the society of his wife. They have for the most part been to Bath and Bristol, but have sometimes extended to Scunthorpe when the exigencies of business have rendered this further journey necessary or advisable. There has been no choice by him of England as a desirable abode, and no intention of being present here otherwise than in the course of his duties ; and no one could, I think, predicate of the appellant with accuracy that he ever had the intention of making England his home in the ordinary sense of the word. It is, of course, possible that a man may have two residences during the same period of assessment, but it is far less likely that he should have a second residence here when he, throughout and apart from temporary absences, is continuously residing and keeping a continuous home elsewhere.

I put the case during the argument of a man living in a house or lodgings at some such place as Richmond or Reigate and travelling to the City every week-day to earn his living there. In such a case everyone would say that he resided at the place where he slept, and that he worked or earned his living in the city ; and I think that this would be so, though his tenure of his office in the city might be much more permanent than that of his house or lodgings in the country, or though he might arrange to sleep in town occasionally when he was kept specially late at work. One element in arriving at this conclusion would be that residence would ordinarily be determined by the place where he slept, not where he worked, but another element would, I think, be that the place where he slept and lived would be determined by his own choice, and in view of the social amenities which he might expect to enjoy in that district ; while the place where he worked would be much less dependent on his own volition and independent of social considerations. But be this as it may, he would in ordinary language be said to be resident in Richmond or Reigate and not to be resident in the city, though a greater part of his waking hours were passed in the city than in his suburb.

In the present case, owing to the greater distance between his home and the scene of his work, the appellant is forced to remain in the United Kingdom for several days and nights continuously. But, on the other hand, the periods during which he is at his home in Southern Ireland are far longer, and I think that in this case, at least, as much as in the hypothetical case of the city worker, the appellant would be considered in ordinary parlance to have his residence at his home in Southern Ireland, and not to have a second residence in the United Kingdom by reason of his recurrent occupational presence there. Further, the purpose of the presence of the appellant in the United Kingdom may, in my view, be fairly described as " temporary," notwithstanding its being of a regularly recurrent character, and it certainly has not been with any " view or intent of establishing his residence therein"; and thus he appears to fall within the exemption granted by Rule 2 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D.

Accordingly, with great respect to the learned Judge, I differ in this case from the result at which he and the Special Commissioners have arrived, and think that the appeal to this Court should succeed.

In doing so I do not think that I am differing from the Special Commissioners on any question of fact. As I read their decision they have carefully found the facts, and have segregated them from any question of law; and the facts so found I entirely accept. But they have then gone on to decide a question of law on those facts, and have "held" that on the facts found the appellant resided in the United Kingdom. This is a conclusion of law within the principles of Lord Wrenbury's reasoning in Great Western Railway Company v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448; [1922] 2 A.C., 1); and it is solely as to this conclusion of law that I differ from them and from Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from my colleagues, and I need hardly say that in view of the judgments which have just been delivered I profoundly distrust my own opinion.

The appellant claims exemption from income-tax on British Government securities under section 46 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and repayment of income-tax on foreign and Dominion Government securities under Rule 2 (d) of the general rules applicable to Schedule C of the same Act; both these claims are in respect of the two fiscal years ending April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, respectively.

In order to succeed in these claims the appellant has to prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that during the years in question he was neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

The Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts having held that the appellant was both resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in each of the two years in question, the appellant required them to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

In the case the Special Commissioners, after setting out the facts and the contentions of the parties, state their conclusions as follow: "We held that the appellant was both ordinarily resident and resident in the United Kingdom for each of the two years ending April 5, 1923, and April 5, 1924, respectively."

I have found some difficulty in reconciling the various decisions and judicial dicta (which will be found conveniently catalogued in Dowell's Income Tax Laws, 9th Edition, pp. 231 to 236) on the question how the Court ought to deal with a case stated for its opinion in the form adopted in the present case.

The Solicitor-General contended that as the appellant had not shown that the Special Commissioners had taken an erroneous view of the construction of the Act no question of law had arisen, and further, that as there was evidence upon which the Special Commissioners could have reached their conclusions there was no jurisdiction to review their findings of fact that the appellant was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. This contention finds support in many judicial utterances, including the speech of Earl Loreburn, Lord Chancellor, in Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (31 The Times L.R., 478; [1915] A.C., 922, at p. 930), where it is stated that the Commissioners' determination is conclusive unless erroneous in point of law, and that there is no jurisdiction to review it upon any issue of fact, but that the Court could interfere if it were clear that the Commissioners had proceeded upon a wrong construction of the Act, or if there were no evidence upon which their decision could be supported.

Mr. Latter, on the other hand, contended that the question whether the appellant was resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in any given period within the meaning of the relevant section and rule was a mixed question of fact and law, the question of fact being, moreover, a compound fact (to use the expression of Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in Erichsen v. Last, 8 Q.B.D., 414, 422) depending upon the true effect of a number of instances, and that it is for the Court to decide as a matter of law whether upon a consideration of the facts found in the case the appellant was or was not resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during the periods in question. This contention also finds support in many judicial utterances, including the speech of Lord Parker of Waddington in the same case of Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (supra), where the following passage occurs: "The views from time to time expressed in this House have been far from unanimous, but in my humble judgment where all the material facts are fully found and the only question is whether the facts are such as to bring the case within the provisions properly construed of some statutory enactment the question is one of law only."

In the present case Mr. Justice Rowlatt went into the facts which were stated in the case to have been admitted or proved before the Special Commissioners, and directed his mind to the point whether they were right in law in holding that the appellant was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. The course so taken by the learned Judge is in accordance with that adopted by all the Courts in the case of the American Thread Company v. Joyce (29 The Times L.R., 266) and in other cases, and is, in my opinion, the right method of dealing with the present case, as it is hardly to be supposed that the Special Commissioners intended to state the appellant out of Court, especially as they were careful in stating their conclusion to use the words "we held" and not "we found as a fact."

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the question for this Court is whether upon the facts stated in the case the Special Commissioners and the learned Judge were right in law in holding that the appellant was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom within the true meaning of the section and rule in question, and I propose to confine my judgment to this point.

The words "reside" and "residence" are flexible terms and may have different meanings according to the context in which they are used.

Both in section 46 and in Rule 2 (d) of Schedule C the expression "resident in the United Kingdom" is used in contrast to "resident out of the United Kingdom"—the section and rule are not concerned with residence at any particular place or places within the United Kingdom. When speaking of a person being resident in a certain country at large as distinguished from being resident at some particular spot or in some particular town, the expression does not, in my opinion, necessarily connote that the person has a fixed place of abode in the country in which for the time being he is resident. The expression, in my opinion, bears much the same meaning as in the sentence "during his comparatively short residence in England he was unable to master the English language." That the expression is used in this wide sense is, I think, confirmed by the provisions of Rule 2 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D which exempts a person from the charge to tax under that schedule as a person residing in the United Kingdom in respect of profits or gains received in respect of possessions or securities out of the United Kingdom who is in the United Kingdom for some temporary purpose only, and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence there, and who has not actually resided in the United Kingdom at one time or several times for a period of six months in the whole, but enacts that if any such person resides in the United Kingdom for the aforesaid period he shall be chargeable for that year. This rule (which does not apply to cases under section 46 or under Schedule C) seems to me to show that but for its provisions a person would or might be chargeable to tax under Schedule D as a person residing in the United Kingdom, although such person were only in the United Kingdom for a temporary purpose and although he actually stayed in the United Kingdom for less than six months, and it further shows that a person actually staying in the United Kingdom for six months is resident therein for the purposes of the charge to tax under Schedule D, although he is only staying therein for a temporary purpose and not with any intention of making his home therein.

Whether a person is resident in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the enactments in question in the present case is no doubt a question of degree, and depends on a due consideration of all the facts, but, in my opinion, a person who regularly comes to and stays for a substantial period in the United Kingdom is prima facie resident therein within the meaning of these enactments, although he may not have any fixed place of abode therein, and the onus is upon him to satisfy the Special Commissioners or the Court that he is not so resident.

The expression "ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom" in section 46 necessarily bears a narrower meaning than the expression "resident in the United Kingdom" in Rule 2 (d). It assumes that the person is resident in the United Kingdom but contemplates that he may not be "ordinarily" resident therein. I agree with the opinion expressed by the Lord President in Reid's case (10 Tax Cas., 673) and by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Levene's case as to the meaning of the qualifying adverb "ordinarily," which, in my opinion, is used in its primary and natural sense, "in conformity with rule or established custom or practice" or "as a matter of regular practice or occurrence." In this sense "ordinarily" is in contrast with "casual" or "occasional," and I did not understand Mr. Latter to quarrel with this construction.

I now come to consider whether the facts stated in the case justify the conclusion reached by the Special Commissioners and by Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

The appellant has his home in Ireland, where he resides with his family when in Ireland; he has no dwelling-house in the United Kingdom, and generally stays at the Spa Hotel, Bath, when he comes to England. These facts, although important, are not conclusive. The Act itself contemplates that a person may be resident and ordinarily resident in more places than one (see, e.g., Rule 4 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D). As regards staying at the Spa Hotel I have already expressed my opinion that in order to be resident in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the section and rule it is not essential that a person should have a fixed place of abode or an intention of making his home therein. At the present time, owing to various causes, even persons who admittedly are permanently resident in the United Kingdom frequently live altogether in hotels or boarding houses, and move about from place to place.

On the other hand, the appellant is in the regular employ of John Lysaght, Limited, as advisory director at a fixed salary. The head office and works of John Lysaght, Limited, are in England, and the appellant's employment necessitates his regular presence in England for about one week in every month of the year. Further, the appellant has a banking account at a bank in Bristol, and is a member of the Savile Club in London.

The case is near the line, but, in my opinion, the determining factor is that the post which the appellant holds in John Lysaght, Limited, causes him to come regularly to England and to stay in the United Kingdom for a substantial period in each year. The fact that the appellant stays regularly in England for about three months of the year for the discharge of his duties as the servant of an English company, in my opinion, constitutes him a person who is both resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.

In these circumstances I find myself unable to hold that the Special Commissioners were bound as a matter of law to be satisfied that the appellant was neither resident nor ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom for the years in question.

In my opinion, the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt was right, and the appeal ought to be dismissed, but as my colleagues take the contrary view the appeal will be allowed, with costs.

REX v. GRAIN—EX PARTE WANDSWORTH GUARDIANS.*

Local Government — Gratuity to officer sanctioned by Ministry of Health—Superannuation allowance based on gratuity—Disallowance—Surcharge—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 101), s. 32—Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 72), s. 3—Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 50), ss. 2, 3, 12, 19.

Acting upon a recommendation of the Ministry of Health (made without statutory authority), a board of guardians paid a gratuity to a registrar of births and deaths. That payment, having been sanctioned by the Ministry, could not be disallowed by the district auditor. On the retirement of the registrar the guardians granted him a superannuation allowance based on the average of his remuneration by fees plus gratuity in the preceding five years. The district auditor disallowed so much of the allowance as was based on the gratuity, and surcharged it on certain guardians and ex-guardians.

Held, that the district auditor was wrong in disallowing and surcharging the payment, as he was bound to treat the gratuity as forming part of the registrar's "emoluments" within the meaning of s. 19 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896.

Decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 38 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 540) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 38 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 540) upon a rule nisi for a certiorari which was directed to Mr. H. W. W. Grain, the district auditor of the Wandsworth Union, to bring up and quash a certificate of disallowance and surcharge of a sum of £27 17s. 1d. in the accounts of the Wandsworth Guardians for the half-year ending September 30, 1925.

The question arose out of the payment of gratuities to registrars of births and deaths to meet the increased cost of living. Those gratuities, for which there was no statutory sanction, were authorized and recommended to boards of guardians by circulars of the Local Government Board (now the Ministry of Health), dated May 2, 1918, and May 14, 1920. The circulars pointed out that since registrars were paid by fees and not by salary there was no authority to pay a war bonus, but that great hardship was caused in some cases by the diminution of fees. Boards of guardians were therefore invited to recommend, on lines laid down in the circulars, the payment of gratuities to those officials which the Ministry would be prepared to sanction.

The Wandsworth Board of Guardians, in accordance with those circulars, granted a gratuity to Mr. W. V. Minter, the registrar of births and deaths, and that gratuity was paid for two years, subject to a deduction of 3 per cent. towards superannuation allowance when Mr. Minter should retire. Though there was no statutory sanction for the payments, the district auditor could not disallow them because of the provision of section 3 of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 72) :—

"Expenses paid by any local authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor shall not be disallowed by that auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board."

On Mr. Minter's retirement a superannuation allowance was granted to him in February, 1922, based on fees plus gratuities. The payment of that allowance was not challenged until the half-year ending September 30, 1925, as it was assumed to have been paid on the correct basis. On that occasion, however, a more searching inquiry was made, and the fact that the gratuities were included in arriving at the amount of the basis was disclosed.

The district auditor thereupon disallowed (and surcharged on certain guardians and ex-guardians) the sum of £27 17s. 1d., part of a payment of £137 1s. 10d., in respect of the half-yearly instalment of Mr. Minter's allowance of £274 3s. 8d. That disallowance represented the difference between the amount due on the basis of fees alone and the amount calculated on the basis of fees plus gratuity.

The district auditor took the view that though he was precluded from disallowing the gratuities the authority of the Ministry did not legalize their payment, and that they were not "emoluments" of the officer within the meaning of section 3 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 50), which enacts that the scale for superannuation allowances to an officer or servant under the Act shall be based upon the average amount of salary or wages and emoluments during the five years ending on the quarter-day preceding the day on which he ceases to hold his office or employment. "Emoluments" are defined in section 19 of the Act as including "all fees, poundage, and other payments made to any officer or servant as such for his own use."

The effect of the disallowance and surcharge, if correct, was to reduce Mr. Minter's allowance from £274 3s. 8d. to £218 9s. 6d. per annum.

The rule was obtained at the instance of the guardians upon the grounds that the district auditor had no jurisdiction to disallow and surcharge the payment, that the gratuities were "emoluments" within the meaning of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, that the sanction of the Ministry of Health legalized the payments of the gratuities, and that the payment was allowed by the district auditor at several previous audits.

The Divisional Court held that the district auditor had no power to surcharge the amount. Section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, did not authorize the surcharge of a payment which was illegal unless it was due to the negligence or misconduct of the accounting party.

It was held also by the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Avory (Mr. Justice Salter dissenting) that the district auditor was wrong in disallowing the payment, as the gratuity formed part of the registrar's emoluments within the meaning of section 19 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896.

The district auditor appealed.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Wingate-Saul, K.C., and Mr. Crouch for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes.—The matters which have been discussed in this case are, no doubt, of very considerable importance, and if they all were matters upon which a decision had been arrived at in the Court below it would be necessary, I think, for this Court to express its view upon that decision ; but, as I read the judgment of the learned Judges in the Divisional Court, they only decided one branch of the matters which have been discussed before us, although they did express an opinion upon the other branch, at the same time stating that that particular matter did not strictly arise for their decision.

In those circumstances it seems to me that what was said by the Divisional Court on that point is really obiter, and it is not necessary for us, therefore, to express any definite or decided opinion upon that branch of the arguments which have been addressed to us.

Now, the matter arises in this way. The validity of a disallowance by a district auditor and the consequent surcharge—using that expression in the sense in which I think it is used in these Poor Law Statutes —surcharge of the amount upon individual guardians who had expressly authorized the payments, was challenged, and it was challenged by way of proceeding by certiorari to bring up his order to be quashed on the ground that it was an order that he had no jurisdiction in law in making. The payment was a payment by way of superannuation allowance to a registrar of births and deaths, and it is necessary in this connexion to refer to two separate classes of statutes. There is the class of statutes dealing with the position of the registrar of births and deaths and his remuneration, and there is the class of statutes which deals with the position of the district auditor under the Poor Law Acts and the authority and jurisdiction of the Local Government Board—now the Ministry of Health—to regularize, if I may use that expression, certain payments by boards of guardians which might otherwise be properly objected to on the audit by the auditor.

Now, first of all, with regard to the statute regulating the registrars of births and deaths, there is the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, setting up the office of the registrar and providing for his appointment. I need not refer to the particular provisions of that statute; but when you come to the statute of 1874 it is necessary to refer to that, because it is under that statute, and under section 29 of the principal Act, as the Act of 1836 is called, that the registrar derives his right to payment for the work he does. Under the Act of 1874, section 27 provides that "Every superintendent registrar and registrar respectively shall be entitled to the fees specified in the second schedule to this Act, and every such fee shall be paid to him by the persons and on the occasions pointed out in such schedule, and may be recovered as a debt due to him, and subject to the prescribed rules he may refuse to comply with any application voluntarily made to him until the fee is paid." In section 31 of that statute there is the provision that "the payment to the registrar under section twenty-nine of the principal Act of two shillings and sixpence for each of the first twenty entries of births and deaths in every year which he has registered shall be paid to him for each of the first twenty entries of births and deaths in each quarterly account made out and verified in manner directed by that Act." That is a payment which, under section 29 of the principal Act, is payable by the guardians.

We start, therefore, with this, that the payment to the registrar of births and deaths is a statutory payment, the amount of which is defined and limited by statute. Speaking generally, in my opinion, any payment to the registrar by the guardians, who are themselves the statutory authority with no right to lay out or expend moneys entrusted to their care in any other than the statutory ways, in excess of the statutory fees which are set out and defined by various Acts of Parliament defining their position and duties, constitutes an illegal act; but certain power and authority is given to the Ministry of Health—formerly the Local Government Board—to deal with special cases in a very special way. The first of those statutes is the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848. Before I arrived at this stage of the matter, I ought to have stated that under the Poor Law Acts the appointment of auditors is provided for, and the duties of those auditors are set out, and the payments which boards of guardians may legally make are defined, and there are provisions which indicate the extent of the duty and authority of district auditors in disallowing payments which in their opinion are improperly made, and for surcharging—using that expression in the proper sense—against the accounting person, and also making persons who may not be the actual accounting persons, but persons who are directly responsible for the payments, by requiring them to make those payments good. That being the state of the law, section 4 of the Act of 1848 provides that "where any appeal shall be made to the said commissioners against any allowance, disallowance, or surcharge made by any auditor in the accounts of any guardians, overseers, or their officers, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to decide the same according to the merits of the case; and if they shall find that any disallowance or surcharge shall have been or shall be lawfully made, but that the subject matter thereof was incurred under such circumstances as make it fair and equitable that the disallowance or surcharge should be remitted, they may, by an order under their seal, direct that the same shall be remitted, upon payment of the costs, if any, which may have been incurred by the auditor or other competent authority in the enforcing of such disallowance or surcharge."

Now, it is quite plain that by the provisions of that statute a right of appeal is given to the person who is surcharged, and a right of dispensation is given to the commissioners, because provision is made for cases where the disallowance or surcharge has been lawfully made, which therefore would include a case where a district auditor had properly disallowed an illegal payment made and had surcharged the person responsible for the making of that illegal payment; and although he had acted quite properly and had disallowed only an illegal payment, this section clearly gives the commissioners jurisdiction to remit the disallowance if they consider it fair and equitable.

What the effect of that section is upon the original payment itself has been considered in Attorney-General v. Merthyr Tydfil Union (16 The Times L.R., 251; [1900] 1 Ch., 516), and it was not, in my opinion, a mere dictum of Lord Justice Lindley, because it was material to consider in that case how the matter came, or could come, before the Court at all, and the learned Lord Justice distinctly indicated that in his view the effect of an order under that section was not to turn a payment which was an illegal payment into a legal payment, but it merely was a conferring of an equitable jurisdiction upon the proper authority to remit. An illegal payment having been made, perhaps under mistake or perfectly bona fide, the payment itself was not altered in character; and had the payment been challenged in a law court either when it was intended or threatened to be made, or, indeed, after it had been made, the Court would have expressed the opinion, which it was bound to hold, that there was nothing in this section which altered the character of the payment and made what was on the face of it obviously an illegal payment a legal payment.

So the matter stood when the law in reference to these remissions of payment only applied after the district auditor had completed his audit and made his certificate. Then came the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, which is quite a short Act, and, in my opinion, is clearly intended to extend the jurisdiction created by the Act of 1848 so as to make it apply to a payment before it comes before the district auditor; and the proper authority having exercised its discretionary equitable authority before the matter comes before the auditor, it is only reasonable that provision should be made that the auditor should not, after that authority has been exercised, feel himself compelled to disallow or to treat as an illegal payment for the purpose of his certificate a payment which has been made under statutory authority. So we get to the Act of 1887, which provides by section 3 that "expenses paid by any local authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor shall not be disallowed by that auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board." Speaking for myself, I cannot see that the foundation of Lord Justice Lindley's decision in reference to the Act of 1848 is in any way displaced by this Statute of 1887, and it seems to me to follow from his decision and the decision of the Divisional

Court that the provision of this Statute is no more affected than the provision of the Statute of 1848 in reference to the essential character of the payment which is challenged as being illegal.

So much for the history of the two sets of Statutes with which we have to deal on one branch of this discussion.

The next stage is this, that as a result of the circulars issued by the Local Government Board, boards of guardians were invited to put the registrars of births and deaths on the same footing as their other officers in reference to war gratuities. It was, of course, competent for the Local Government Board to do that because, whatever their opinion might be as to the legality of making these payments, they clearly recognized and knew that they had as between themselves and the district auditors the right to say that the district auditors should not disallow payments which had been made in pursuance of the invitation to treat the registrars on the same footing as other officers of the guardians. In this particular case the effect of the circular was that this gentleman, whose case is now in question, was granted a gratuity of a particular amount. The effect of granting him that gratuity was that, as between the guardians, the Local Government Board, and the auditor, that was an authorized payment in every case in which permission was obtained from the Local Government Board for making the payment, and therefore on every occasion, so long as this gentleman continued in his office, and received these payments, they were payments which were recognized payments, payments which, had they been challenged from the outset, might possibly have had to be disallowed ; but so long as the matter remained as between the officer, the board of guardians, the Local Government Board, and the district auditor, they were authorized and recognized payments. Were they during that time part of the emoluments of his office ? I should be very loth to say or suggest that any payments which were, for all purposes, illegal payments, or improper payments should be held to come within the expression " emoluments of a man's office " ; but here you have a position which I should think is quite unique, and that is this, that although by statute an officer's salary is limited to a particular amount, and by statute the district auditor is appointed to see that the officer is not paid more than that amount, there is at the same time a dispensing authority in a government department which has a right to say to the district auditor, if in the exercise of his duty he declares a certain payment to be an illegal payment and a matter for surcharge, " You cannot disallow or surcharge this particular payment, because we allow it in advance of the audit." When you find a payment of that particular category and class, then I am prepared to say that it does come not only within the ordinary language but is within the meaning of the statute the emolument of the person to whom those payments are made.

The next stage is this : This gentleman having retired a statute comes into force in which provision is made that his retiring pension shall be based upon a certain proportion of his salary and emoluments, and the particular dispute here arises in this way, that although the auditor's hand was tied while these payments were being made and he could not either disallow a payment or surcharge the person authorizing it, yet he claims the right, those payments having been made, to challenge the amount of the pension paid, because it includes a sum arrived at by the inclusion of these payments which, whilst they were made, he was not entitled to challenge.

Now, in my opinion, the true effect of this legislation is that, at any rate, it does not lie in the mouth of the auditor to say that payments which, whilst they were made, he could not be heard to say were not emoluments, yet as soon as the man retires and they are not paid quarterly or half-yearly, or whatever it may be, are emoluments or payments which he is entitled to challenge. If that is so—and I think that is the view which has been adopted by the Divisional Court and really in substance is what their judgment amounts to—in my opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed with the usual consequences.

I only wish to say on the other branch of the case on which opinions are expressed in the Court below, that I do not think those opinions are any part of a decision, and they do not therefore, in my opinion, call for a decision from us ; but I do wish to say that I think there will be a good deal to be said, whenever the matter comes up for decision, for the view that the Poor Law Statutes to which our attention has been called do recognize a jurisdiction in the district auditor for challenging illegal payments, against a party who, in ordinary law, may not himself be the actual accounting party. I express no opinion upon the matter, but I think that when, if ever, this particular question arises which was discussed in the Divisional Court and has been discussed before us, as to whether or not the jurisdiction of a district auditor to disallow and surcharge is confined to a right to surcharge in cases of misconduct or negligence, there is a good deal to be said for the view that there is another class contemplated by these statutes, and that is the person who may, in ordinary language, not be the accounting person, yet is the person who has primarily authorized the payment and who is made responsible not because he or she may be the individually accounting person, but is the person who is the person individually responsible for the making of the payment. I do not give any judgment to that effect or bind myself with regard to what my opinion may be if the matter had been more fully argued ; but I do desire to say that I do not think the decision of the Divisional Court ought to be treated as a judgment on that point, and our decision rests entirely upon the other matter which has been discussed in reference to whether or not the district auditor had any right to challenge this particular payment made under the circumstances in which it comes before us.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—If we had been asked to express a final opinion on a number of matters on which opinions are expressed in the judgment of the Divisional Court and on which arguments have been addressed to us by Mr. Montgomery I should certainly have desired to hear Mr. Wingate-Saul at some length and to consider my judgment ; but in the view I take of the case this appeal can be dismissed on a comparatively narrow ground which is, I think, the ground on which the majority of the Divisional Court decided ; that is a ground relating simply to the position of the district auditor only in regard to the facts of this case.

The case arises in this way. The registrar of births and deaths, who is not a servant of the board of guardians and cannot be dismissed or controlled by them, is remunerated first of all by a scale of fees, depending on the number of births and deaths he registers, fixed by an Act of 1836 and paid by the Guardians, and, secondly, by a scale of fees contained in an Act of 1874 for services rendered in the way of supplying certificates, copies of certificates and extraordinary work to persons who register. As he is not a servant of the board of guardians I see no power in them to pay him a salary or a gratuity. When the Great War changed the face of England and the conditions of England (1) the number of births fell very much; (2) the unfortunate deaths which took place did not take place in the jurisdiction of the English registrars; and (3) the cost of living went up very much. In those circumstances, not unnaturally, it occurred to the Local Government Board that registrars of births and deaths were not sufficiently remunerated, and two circulars were issued in which the Local Government Board suggested to boards of guardians and told them that they might safely grant gratuities to registrars in order to put them in the same position as the salaried servants who were having increases by way of war bonus, and undoubtedly those gratuities which many boards of guardians proceeded to grant and which the Wandsworth Board of Guardians, the parties in this case, granted, were sanctioned by the Local Government Board; and under an Act of 1887 if the Local Government Board had sanctioned them the district auditor was forbidden to disallow them on the ground that they were illegal, even though they were, as this gratuity was, in my opinion, illegal. Accordingly the board of guardians granted to Mr. Minter in this case a gratuity, and the Act of 1887 prevented the district auditor from striking it out as illegal whatever his opinion was. When in that and the following years the board of guardians granted a gratuity, treating it as an emolument under the Acts relating to superannuation they deducted from it in each year the contribution that should be deducted under the Superannuation Acts, and the district auditor, who was forbidden in each year to disallow that item, though he might think it illegal, under the Statute of 1887 did not disallow it or in any way deal with the deduction of the superannuation allowance; and whether he noticed it or not I think he was right in taking the view that if he was bound to treat the thing as legal he could not treat it as illegal for the purpose of superannuation. So for several years from Mr. Minter's gratuity there was deducted in each year 3 per cent., I think it was, or a percentage, at any rate, for superannuation. Then Mr. Minter retired, and the question of his pension for which he had been paying during some years came up. It was assessed on the basis that the gratuity was an emolument which was to be taken into account in calculating his pension according to the statute. Then the district auditor struck. He said in effect:—I have been bound to treat this gratuity as legal under the Act of 1887 because the Local Government Board has sanctioned it; I have, in effect, treated it as legal when each year a percentage was deducted from it for the purpose of paying Mr. Minter's superannuation; but I can, now that the calculation is to be made, treat it as illegal and strike it out from the calculation of the pension, thereby reducing the amount which should be paid to Mr. Minter in respect of his pension, and I disallow it and I shall surcharge those who voted for it.

The question is, can the district auditor do that? The powers of the Local Government Board with respect to these disallowances are derived, first of all, from the fourth section of the Act of 1848, which provides that if an appeal is made to them against the allowance, disallowance, or surcharge by an auditor, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to decide the same according to the merits of the case, and if they find that the allowance was unlawfully made, which would be in a case where the payment was illegal, but that the subject-matter was incurred under such circumstances as made it fair and equitable that the allowance should be remitted, they could remit the disallowance. At a later stage it seems to have occurred to everyone and to Parliament that it was a little farcical if the Local Government Board had power to remit for equitable reasons a surcharge when it had been made, and had approved the original payment which was disallowed, that the district auditor should have to go through the form of disallowing it in order that the Local Government Board should then exercise their power of setting his disallowance aside, so that the Act of 1887, as I read it, provided that if beforehand the Local Government Board had sanctioned the payment and would, therefore, obviously, if the surcharge had been made, disallow the surcharge, the district auditor should not make a disallowance and surcharge on a matter which it was quite obvious the Local Government Board would then proceed to disallow, which may perhaps be described in a legal phrase as avoiding circuity of action. It is quite true that in the Merthyr Tydfil case (16 The Times L.R., 251; [1900] 1 Ch., 516), Lord Justice Lindley expressed his view as to the effect of one of those statutes, the statute of 1848, as to the powers of the Court and said that the power given to the Local Government Board to disallow a surcharge for equitable reasons did not prevent the Court from saying that the payment was illegal. It is quite true that the Court there had only before it the statute of 1848. The Merthyr Tydfil case (supra) related to a topic, which is always with us, that of paying Poor Law relief to strikers. An action was brought by the Attorney-General, suing on the relation of a colliery company, for a declaration that the Board of Guardians could not legally pay relief to strikers. The Local Government Board had not at that time expressed any opinion about the strike; they had not sanctioned the payment; there had been no surcharge of payment and they had not disallowed any surcharge; but what was said in argument was: You, the Court, cannot have any power because Parliament has now remitted this matter to the Local Government Board, who have the power, if there is an illegal payment, to disallow the surcharge if they think it is equitable that it should be disallowed; and, secondly, the power of the Court has gone. It was with respect to such a position that Lord Justice Lindley used the well-known words which were concurred in by the rest of the Court at page 546. It appears to me that that passage applies as much to the statute of 1887 as it does to the statute of 1848 and the Local Government Board or any other public department has not been given a power to dispense with the statutes of the realm; that it is still open to the proper authorities, and I abstain from discussing whether it should be a ratepayer only, or, as in the Merthyr Tydfil case (supra), the Attorney-General on the relation of the ratepayer, to obtain, at any rate, a declaration that a payment is illegal in spite of the fact that the Local Government Board has sanctioned it. I also abstain from discussing a matter which will require considerable argument, I think, whether under any circumstances such a proceeding can result in an order for repayment of a sum paid; but that applies to the action of the Courts, and in my view the district auditor is still bound by the Act of 1887 not to disallow a payment which the Local Government Board have sanctioned and still more, of course, not to surcharge in respect of a payment which the Local Government Board has sanctioned. Neither I do not see how it can be open to the district auditor to say : " I am prevented from saying that this payment is illegal, but I can say in a proceeding consequential on that payment that it is to be treated as illegal in the consequential proceeding, though it cannot be treated as illegal in the main proceedings." That seems to me to be reducing relations between the district auditor, the Local Government Board, and the statute to an absurdity. I think in this case that when the main payment of the gratuity cannot be challenged by the district auditor he cannot indirectly challenge it by saying : " Though I cannot challenge it in the proceedings for payment of emoluments I can challenge it in the proceedings for payment of superannuation based on a calculation of this emolument," and on that ground, which I hope I have stated clearly—and it is a narrow ground and it is, I think, the ground on which the Lord Chief Justice decided the case, though he went on to deal with questions which, in his opinion, did not strictly arise—on that ground I desire to affirm the decision of the Court below.

I am not to be taken as expressing any opinion, and I do not think the decision of the Divisional Court is binding on the point whether there is any difference in construction between section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844 and section 247 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The Lord Chief Justice, in his discussion of the questions which did not, in his opinion, strictly arise, thinks there is such a difference. I do not desire to express any opinion on the matter. I do not think the Lord Chief Justice's view is binding on other Courts and I have considerable doubts whether his view can be sustained if the matter is ultimately discussed. But, as I have said, I am not expressing any final opinion on the point. I do not think there is any binding decision in the Court below, and I myself reserve the question for future discussion, whether it is possible to say that you can only surcharge if there is negligence or misconduct and cannot surcharge in the mere case of an illegal payment. I repeat what I said about the previous matter, and I wish to say as to that that I do not consider that the Court below decided it in a way to bind anyone. I do not myself express any opinion on the matter. When the question is discussed, in my view—this is founded upon my unfortunate experience in the Poplar case, Roberts v. Hopwood and Others (41 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1925] A.C., 578)—it will be necessary to begin much earlier than 1844. I think you must begin with the powers of magistrates, and you will soon be faced with the difficult question of the transition from overseers who passed on to overseers in the next year and strictly accounted to boards of guardians who had no other accounting officers, and while this statute seems to me quite plain about what was the position, the language of the statute on the subject of whether boards of guardians were accounting bodies as distinguished from their officers who accounted seems to me to raise very many difficult questions. Those two matters, I think, are the main matters in the judgment below upon which I wish to guard myself against expressing an opinion, and I wish to say that, in my opinion, having been expressed obiter, as the Lord Chief Justice says, they do not bind future Courts, the matter being open to be argued in a case where it strictly arises.

I desire to dismiss this appeal on the very limited ground which I have stated.

Mr. Justice Romer.—The first question to be determined by this appeal is as to whether for the purpose of ascertaining the superannuation allowance of the registrar the district auditor was or was not bound to treat as an emolument of the registrar the gratuities paid to him by the guardians with the sanction and, indeed, at the instance of the Ministry of Health. If he was so bound then this appeal necessarily fails. Now, emolument for the purpose of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, has been defined by section 19 of that Act, and it is stated that it includes all fees, poundage, and other payments made to any officer or servant as such for his own use. These gratuities were undoubtedly paid to the registrar for his own use and by that same section, section 19, it is provided that for the purpose of the Act the registrars are to be deemed to be in the service of the guardians. So far the matter seems plain sailing, but then it is said that only those payments can be treated as forming part of the emoluments which were legally made. Now, although these payments were sanctioned by the Ministry of Health for the reasons given by Lord Justice Scrutton, I think they were not for all purposes legal payments ; but, in my opinion, having regard to the words of the Act of 1887, the district auditor, for the purposes of his audit, was bound to treat these payments as having been legally made and, therefore, as emoluments for the purposes that I have mentioned. For these reasons, and for these reasons only, I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

The other points arising on the appeal, interesting and difficult points, have not been fully argued, and, therefore, I cannot express any concluded view about them. I will only say this, that as at present advised it seems to me that there is very good ground for the contention that the words " misconduct " and " negligence " in section 32 of the Act of 1844 are referring, and referring only, to cases where an accounting party is surcharged in the strict meaning of that word ; that is to say, where he is being made responsible for sums which he has not in fact received, but which he ought to have received.

NORTHWOOD AND OTHERS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Land — Acquisition — Arbitration — Appeal— Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 57), s. 6 (2).

By s. 6 (2) of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the decision of the High Court upon a case stated by an arbitrator under the Act is final and conclusive.

Held, that the effect of this provision is that where an arbitrator states a case under the Act for the opinion of the Court and afterwards incorporates the decision of the Court in his award, and the claimants then move before a Divisional Court to have the award set aside on the ground that the decision so incorporated is wrong in law, there is no appeal from the rejection of the motion.

This was an appeal from the decision of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot) on an application made on December 10, 1926, to set aside the award of an arbitrator, or, alternatively, a portion of it, on the ground that it was bad in law on the face of it. At the hearing before that Divisional Court the London County Council argued that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the motion to set aside the award, because the decision of the High Court on any case stated by an arbitrator was, by section 6 (2) of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, made final and conclusive.

The decision of the High Court referred to was given on May 21, 1926, by another Divisional Court (Lord Hewart, C.J., and Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Branson) which the arbitrator incorporated in his final award.

The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot) dismissed the application, and the claimants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

An official arbitrator (Sir Anker Simmons, K.B.E.) had stated a case in respect of an improvement scheme made under Part II. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. The main question which had to be dealt with was whether the official arbitrator was entitled to take into account the fact that certain premises were fully licensed and to award compensation accordingly. The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the hearing before the Divisional Court—Lord Hewart, C.J., Mr. Justice Salter, and Mr. Justice Branson—(see 42 The Times L.R., 508 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 411).

Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. H. G. Robertson appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. William Allen for the London County Council.

A preliminary objection having been taken on behalf of the respondents that no appeal lay by reason of the provisions of section 6 (2) of the Act of 1919, counsel for the appellants contended that the decision appealed against was not a decision within the scope and meaning of the section and could, therefore, be appealed against.

Lord Justice Bankes said that it seemed to him to be a plain point which arose upon the construction of section 6 (1) of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919. The appellants were the owners of property which had been scheduled under a housing scheme. A claim was made for compensation, and was referred to arbitration. A special case was stated by the arbitrator in accordance with the provisions of section 6 (1) of the above Act. The matter then came before a Divisional Court, and upon all the points submitted to them by the arbitrator the Court gave answers against the view contended for by the appellants. The arbitrator then proceeded to make a final award in a form which incorporated as part of the award both the special case and the decision of the Divisional Court.

That gave the appellants the opportunity of saying that, although they could not appeal directly because of the provisions of section 6 (2) of the Act, yet it was open to them to contend that, as the award was bad in that form because the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong, an appeal had become possible.

To that an objection had been taken that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal by reason of section 6 (2) of the Act, which provided :— "The decision of the High Court upon any case so stated shall be final and conclusive, and shall not be subject to appeal to any other Court." And the point was therefore taken that the decision of the Divisional Court in the present case upon the special case, whether stated in answer to a question put to the Court in a consultative case or in a case stated under section 6 (1) of the Act of 1919, was final and conclusive.

The question to be decided, then, was whether this case could be brought within the decision of the House of Lords in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited ([1912] A.C., 673). That decision was given in these circumstances. A special case had been stated by an arbitrator under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for the opinion of the Court in its consultative capacity. Although there were no express words referring to an appeal in that section, the question whether there was an appeal had been raised and decided in In re Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society (8 The Times L.R., 783 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 613). The decision there was that no appeal lay because there was no decision or judgment where the opinion of the Court was merely asked. Lord Justice Bowen put the matter thus at page 619 :—

"But there is another way in which an arbitrator may, during the arbitration, take the opinion of the Court. Under section 19 he may voluntarily take, or by Order of the Court or a Judge he may be compelled to take, by means of a special case, the opinion of the Court for his guidance, and as a step for arriving at his own ultimate award in the matter. That is an interlocutory proceeding in the reference, and I do not think that it can have been intended that, whenever a case is stated under this section for the opinion of the Court, such opinion when taken is to be treated as an absolute determination of the rights of the parties with the result that there may be an appeal from it which may be carried to the House of Lords."

In the Westinghouse case (supra), where an award which was expressed to be made as incorporating an opinion of the Court on a question of law, and a motion had been made to set the award aside as containing an error of law on the face of it, it was held that the Court had jurisdiction to set aside the award.

The appellants attempted to apply that principle in this case. They persuaded the arbitrator to embody in his award the decision of the High Court, and then argued that the whole award was bad on the face of it. But the two cases were not in the same category. Viscount Haldane, L.C., however, in giving his opinion, said this : "No doubt an opinion given by the Court under the provisions of the Arbitration Act is not a judgment or order, and is, therefore, not susceptible of being the subject of an appeal. But, in my opinion, that is the only reason why it cannot be appealed." That is to say, because it is not in the nature of a judgment or order. But where there was a provision such as section 6 (2) of the Act of 1919, which, in the plainest terms, made the decision of the Court, in whatever form it might be, upon a special case stated under that section final and conclusive it seemed to him to be impossible to get round the words of that subsection.

The result was that the preliminary objection succeeded and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he was of the same opinion. The matter arose in an arbitration to which the provisions of the Act of 1919 applied and in which the question to be considered was whether compensation should be awarded for site value only or whether the fact that the premises on the land were licensed premises should be taken into account. The arbitrator, having by section 6 power to state a case at any stage of the proceedings, exercised his right and stated a special case, in which he awarded compensation only for the use of the land.

Having regard to the provisions of section 6 (2) of the Act he (the Lord Justice) thought that the words of that subsection were clear and imperative and applied to a decision of the Court, either at an intermediate stage or at the conclusion of the proceedings, so as to make it equally unappealable at whatever stage it was pronounced.

Mr. Justice Avory agreed. The award of the arbitrator incorporated a decision of the High Court, and when the appellant relied on an error on the face of the award he was challenging a decision of the High Court. It did not cease to be a decision of the High Court because it was adopted as part of an award. Being a decision of the High Court it was, by section 6 (2) of the Act, unappealable.

The preliminary objection succeeded and the appeal was dismissed.

Railway and Canal Commission. (Sankey, J., Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C.) 1927. Mar. 17.

IN RE APPLICATION OF TILMANSTONE (KENT) COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Mines—Coal-mine—Working facilities—Ancillary right—Carrying away coal—Conveyance over land outside lease—Jurisdiction to sanction—Aerial ropeway—Refusal of sanction—Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 20), ss. 1 (2), 5 (2).

Under ss. 1 (2) and 5 (2) of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, the Railway and Canal Commission has jurisdiction to grant facilities for the conveyance and carrying away of coal over land other than that contained in the ambit of the mining company's lease. The Commission, however, refused to sanction a scheme for an aerial ropeway for the conveyance of coal from the Tilmanstone colliery to Dover Harbour, on the grounds that, though a scheme for a ropeway could be put forward which would be feasible and in the national interest, the particular scheme for which sanction was asked was incomplete, and the plans were inaccurate and illusory, and on the evidence the Commission was unable to say whether the arrangements at the Dover end were feasible or in the national interest.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman and J. W. Hall, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Court read their reserved judgments dismissing this application, which had occupied the Court for nine days.

The applicants applied under section 5 (2) of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, for the sanction of the Court to a scheme to carry an aerial ropeway or railway from the Tilmanstone Colliery, Kent, to Dover Harbour, a distance of 6½ miles. The ground of the application was that the existing railway rates and charges payable to place the applicants' coal free on board at Dover Harbour amounted to 5s. 9d. a ton. That figure, the applicants alleged, was excessive. It did not enable them to produce coal at a competitive rate and, if continued, would result in the colliery being closed.

Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., Mr. Gordon Bamber, and Mr. Ivor Brace appeared for the applicants. Mr. J. G. Joseph, for the Dover Harbour Board, supported the application. Counsel for the opponents were :—Mr. Arthur Moon, for the East Kent Light Railways Company ; Mr. R. P. Croom-Johnson, for the Misses Zillah and Susannah Gray, of Wigmore Farm, Eythorne, Kent ; Mr. Wrottesley, K.C., for the Channel Steel Company, Limited ; Mr. H. V. Rabagliati, for the Earl of Guildford, of Waldershare Park, near Dover ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. H. M. Giveen, for the Secretary for War ; Mr. Hubert Hull, for the Commissioners of Crown Lands ; and Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Mr. Bruce Thomas, for the Southern Railway Company.

Mr. Justice Sankey read the joint judgment of himself and Sir Lewis Coward.

In the course of his judgment he said :—The applicants' scheme was to erect an aerial ropeway from a terminus at Tilmanstone over a distance of about 6½ miles to a terminus on the property of the Dover Harbour Board. The applicants alleged that the proper and efficient working of their minerals was unduly hampered, and they contended that it was in the national interest that the application should be granted. They also asked for the cancellation under section 13 of the Mining Industry Act, 1926, of an agreement dated October 16, 1926, made with the East Kent Light Railways Company.

As a result of the notices given by order of the Court a large number of persons appeared in opposition to the application. Many of them were landowners who, after the case had proceeded for a short time, were satisfied with the terms which, subject to the Court's approval, the applicants were prepared to offer them. The opposition had narrowed itself down to that put forward by the Southern Railway Company and the East Kent Light Railways Company, and to the suggestions made by the Attorney-General on behalf of the War Department, and by Mr. Joseph on behalf of the Dover Harbour Board.

The Tilmanstone Colliery was one of four collieries operating or about to operate in the Kent coalfield. Owing to the depth to which the shaft had to be sunk—1,500ft. to 3,000ft.—and to the nature of the superincumbent strata, which caused a large amount of water to be discharged into the working, both the development and the maintenance of the colliery presented great financial and practical difficulties. There was evidence that it cost £1,000,000 to develop a colliery in the Kent coalfield, but Tilmanstone was now employing nearly a thousand men.

Although the life of a coalfield depended on output, it was said to be from 50 to 70 years. The difficulties caused by water might be judged from the fact that at Tilmanstone the pressure of water was 20 tons per ton of coal, and pumping machinery, which had to deal with 2,000 gallons per minute, had to be set up at three stations—at the 600ft. level, at the 1,140ft. level, and in the seam at 1,650ft. The estimated cost of pumping per ton of coal raised was 2s. 6d. It was hoped to reduce this to 1s. a ton by pumping in one throw.

The present output of the colliery was about 1,000 tons per day. The pithead price varied greatly, and was sometimes as much as 24s. a ton. But it was hoped that the development of the colliery, if the application to approve the scheme were granted, would result in raising the output to 4,000 tons per day, which would make a pithead cost of 12s. or 13s. a ton, and greatly increase the number of men employed.

Mr. Tilden-Smith, the principal shareholder in the Tilmanstone Colliery, estimated that even on an output of 250,000 tons the cost would still be 12s. or 13s. per ton. The coal was about 75 per cent. small, for which a market was found in neighbouring works, while some was sent to Queenborough to be shipped into barges. In 1923 23,000 tons were shipped at Dover for foreign export, but the vessels available were small, not more than 350 tons, and no coal had been exported since.

Mr. Tilden-Smith was anxious to foster the export trade at Dover, but in view of the character of the coal it was necessary to sell f.o.b. or c.i.f. at very cheap prices. It was said that the applicants would have to quote 21s., c.i.f., to get a trade. It was stated on the application that the cost of placing the coal f.o.b. at Dover Harbour was 5s. 9d. a ton and that the cost by the aerial ropeway would not exceed 1s. 9d. a ton.

Thus, if the expectations of the applicants were realized, the cost of transit to Dover would be greatly lessened. In addition, the colliery would have the carriage of the coal in their own hands from pit to port. It was sought to be said on their behalf that, by an agreement which they alleged they had entered into with the Dover Harbour Board, that Board would assist them in the export operations by erecting a bunker, by means of which the coal could be discharged from the ropeway into the ship's holds. So the scheme as it subsequently developed was to provide not only for a shorter transit but also for the creation of shipping facilities for coal at Dover Harbour itself.

There could be no contradiction of the statement that if matters had remained as they were at the date of the application there never would have been an export trade of Tilmanstone coal at Dover. The rate charged by the Southern Railway made the cost of the coal f.o.b. at Dover prohibitive, and there were no shipping facilities. Unless something could be done either in the nature of an aerial ropeway or of a great reduction in the rate, the export of Kent coal from Dover would never materialize.

Negotiations took place with reference to a reduction of the rate. The Southern Railway could not be expected to carry Kent coal at a loss in order to develop the Kent coalfield. But the Court regretted that the business men on both sides were not able to solve the problem. In those circumstances Mr. Tilden-Smith resolved to invoke the assistance of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, and made the present application.

The matter was a serious one because Mr. Tilden-Smith, if he could not get his coal exported from Dover, would have to close the colliery. That would be a calamity against the national interest. The colliery would rapidly become flooded and a large amount of coal would be permanently lost. Over and above that, a very large number of men would be thrown out of employment in an industry where already a large number were unemployed, and the various trades carried on, and the shops and buildings erected for their accommodation, might become derelict.

A heavy responsibility was cast upon the Court, as it was satisfied that, unless a very great reduction in the rate to Dover Harbour were obtained or an aerial ropeway sanctioned, those results might follow. It had been proved to the Court that such a ropeway as the present had been carried across the lines of other railways without detriment to the working of those railways.

The opposition of the Attorney-General had been withdrawn, subject to the contentions that the Crown could not be bound by the order, that the military requirements of the Crown must be met, and that the Crown must be free to make its own bargain.

The attitude of the Dover Harbour Board was equivocal, and the Court could not help thinking that it was unwise and improper of the applicants to start their application before coming to a definite understanding with the Harbour Board. The application as it first came before the Court was an application for a scheme "with one end in the air," but the applicants had assured the Court that before the case was completed an agreement would be arrived at with the Board.

Sir John Simon, for the Southern Railway, had contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to grant the application. He contended that the words "carrying away" in the phrase "working, carrying away, treating and converting minerals," in s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1923, must be given the same meaning as similar words in mining leases, and that therefore in the present case the Court had no jurisdiction to grant any facilities for the conveyance and carrying away of coal over land other than that contained in the ambit of the lease.

They were unable to agree with that construction of the statute, nor did they think that they ought, by a narrow construction of the words, to whittle down or diminish the provisions of an Act which had already enabled many millions of tons of coal to be worked which otherwise might have been lost to the nation. The Act dealt with minerals, not leases, and among the ancillary rights was the "conveyance" of minerals, not merely the "carrying them away" which was the usual phrase in a mining lease. The plea to the jurisdiction failed.

From the evidence before the Court they were satisfied that a ropeway was: (1) a cheap method of conveying coal over the particular distance in question, the cost being about 6½d. a ton; (2) an efficient way of carrying the coal; and (3) a safe way of carrying the coal. They were told that England was behindhand in this method of conveyance when compared with foreign countries.

The case proceeded to the end of the autumn term, but the scheme was still incomplete because by then no definite agreement had been come to with the Dover Harbour Board, and no proper plans of a complete scheme had been placed before the Court (and, indeed, they had never been placed before the Court). As the Christmas vacation necessitated an adjournment, the Court suggested that the Southern Railway and the applicants should meet and see if an arrangement could be come to with regard to a reduction of the railway rate and the construction of loading facilities.

By a letter dated January 6, 1927, the Southern Railway offered a new rate, which was a very great reduction on the original cost of 5s. 9d. In effect it was, for an output of between 200,000 and 250,000 tons per annum, 2s. 8d. per ton for a longer distance than was covered by the old rate. The letter concluded :—"The rates are subject to any general modification of rates which may take place during their continuance."

The applicants objected that that last clause enabled the railway company to alter the rate at any time, but the company pointed out that they were themselves subject to the control of the Railway Rates Tribunal and had not a free hand. Sir Herbert Walker had assured the Court that it was impossible for the Southern Railway to quote lower rates and they accepted his evidence. Mr. Tilden-Smith had had some very hard things to say about the way in which the Southern Railway had neglected the Kent coalfields—e.g., that he had been trying for 15 years to get them to have a proper rate, and that any investment in the Kent coalfield was not worth a row of pins while the rates remained at their present level.

The Court thought that the Southern Railway did not entirely deserve those strictures. They could not be expected to carry coal at a rate which was uneconomical to themselves. They had not the experience or appliances for dealing with coal which some of the other great railways had. They were not a mineral line. The Court must not be thought to be saying that the Southern had no skilled, competent, and efficient managers and agents, but they did rather think that the Southern Railway might be of opinion, and rightly so, that it was not worth their while to cater for the export of Kent coal. The Court wished to be very careful on this point because they recognized the ability and desire of the general managers to do their best in the national interest.

Turning to the figures, here again the scheme had been put forward without that careful and complete consideration which such an undertaking ought to receive. Mr. Tilden-Smith was a man of great energy, but he was rather like the man who sat down to build a house without counting the cost thereof. When the hearing was resumed on February 16 no agreement had been come to with the Dover Harbour Board and no complete or proper plans were put before the Court. The figures as to the estimated cost of the undertaking were far from complete and were to demonstration inaccurate.

Their Lordships dealt with some of the inaccuracies, but came to the conclusion that coal could be conveyed more cheaply by the ropeway than by rail. Some scheme for the erection of a ropeway from Tilmanstone to Dover Harbour could be substantiated as being in the national interest, but at present they were not in possession of accurate figures or accurate forecasts.

The case went on from day to day, but still no agreement with the Dover Harbour Board was produced, and no proper plans for a complete scheme were forthcoming. It was not till the case for the opponents had been concluded and counsel for the Southern Railway was replying that any agreement or any complete plans were placed before the Court. Then, on March 7, 1927, a set of ten plans was produced which, it was said, referred to the completed scheme, and a sort of agreement which, it was said, the Dover Harbour Board had come to with Mr. Tilden-Smith.

The plans were most unsatisfactory. One was dated 1910, another 1918, and one Saturday, March 5, 1927, months after the case started, and the final plan was subsequently sought to be altered. The Court could not pass judgment upon such plans without evidence, so Mr. Roe, the contractor for the line, was called to give the final plans his blessing. He had only just seen them and had not been down to Dover to verify them. Someone at the back of the Court assured counsel for the applicants that it would be quite safe to have the trestles erected in the water but the Court would be failing in its duty if on such plans it decided to allow the scheme.

They were assured that the Dover Harbour Board had approved, but before dealing with the agreement said to have been concluded with the Board they would sum up their findings as far as they had gone. They thought that (1) a scheme for a ropeway could be put forward which would be feasible and in the national interest ; (2) the present scheme was wholly incomplete, the figures and the plans were inaccurate, wrong, and illusory ; (3) they were quite unable to say whether the arrangements said to be made at the Dover end were feasible or in the national interest. No independent engineer of position or repute able to speak of them had been called.

The agreement said to be come to between Mr. Tilden-Smith and the Dover Harbour Board was a document of a most extraordinary character, and again they thought that they would not be doing their duty in saying that the present proposals came within the category of being in the national interest. To begin with there was no agreement between the applicants and the Dover Harbour Board at all. The only agreement was between Mr. Tilden-Smith, a shareholder, and the Board, and he was not to assign or underlet the benefit in the scheme in any way except with the consent in writing of the Board, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

They were quite at a loss to know when and under what conditions he would be prepared to assign it to the applicants, but, if he refused to assign, the profit was at an end. The matter did not stop there.

It was no doubt quite a small matter that the agreement was not even dated and had not the seal of the applicant company. And there were clauses in it to which the Court could never give its sanction. It was for the Court to approve the plans and specifications of the aerial ropeway, but the agreement provided that it should be erected only in accordance with such plans as the Board approved.

There were many other clauses open to the same objection. A great many people could bring the scheme to an untimely end because the sanctions of a great many people had to be obtained. Mr. Tilden-Smith could determine it at the end of the fifth year, and the benefit of the scheme apparently passed to his executors, so that, should he have the misfortune to die, what would be the position time alone must decide.

It had been pointed out that the Court could make amendments of the agreement in the discussion of the Minutes of Order. It was true that it was the practice of the Court to consider the details of an agreement when drawing up the Minutes of Order, but only when they had found on proper evidence that the proposed scheme and application were in the national interest, or, to put it in the language of private Bill practice, they considered the clauses when they had passed the preamble. At the present moment the question was whether the preamble had been proved. After some further review of the relevant arguments of counsel, their LORDSHIPS found that the preamble was not proved.

It was not necessary for the Court to decide whether the agreement with the East Kent Light Railways Company, by which the colliery company guaranteed a minimum traffic of 1,500 tons a week, was one which the Court had jurisdiction to cancel, and they would require more argument to persuade them that they had such jurisdiction. But on the facts that agreement should not be interfered with.

The East Kent Light Railways depended upon Tilmanstone for their trade, and, at the request of Tilmanstone, had spent some £94,000 in constructing the span of railway to Shepherdswell. It would be the height of injustice to interfere with the agreement. Mr. Tilden-Smith ought not, in order to make the colliery company pay, seek to get a reduction of price from nearly every person who had entered into contracts with the company.

If the anticipations were justified on which alone they would be prepared to allow the scheme he could fulfil the agreement quite easily. He said that he would be able to produce, if the scheme were allowed, 1,000,000 tons a year. Ex hypothesi only half would go over the ropeway and the remainder would more than enable him to perform that agreement.

They had reached their conclusion with real regret, because they thought that some scheme for a ropeway was probably the solution of the question. But they could not sanction that ropeway on the evidence which had been given, and Mr. Tilden-Smith had only himself to blame if he had incurred the costs of the application by putting forward a scheme which was incomplete in its inception, and which still remained incomplete, with estimates inaccurate, illusory, and quite impossible for the Court to act upon.

Sir E. Tindal Atkinson delivered a separate judgment agreeing with the other members of the Court.

On the ground that more time had been occupied than would have been required if the scheme had been in order the Court made a special order as to costs. The Southern Railway Company would have their costs of the seventh, eighth and ninth days of the hearing, the East Kent Light Railways Company would have their costs of the whole, and the other objectors their costs of the first and second days.

A bill of exchange was drawn in France by E. V. upon the defendants in London to the order of M. V., and the defendants accepted it. It was indorsed in France to the plaintiffs by E. V. with the authority of M. V., but the signature was not expressed to be for M. V., and on presentment the defendants declined to pay the bill as it did not bear the indorsement of M. V. In an action by the indorsees against the acceptors evidence was given that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing his own name if he was so authorized by the payee, and the trial Judge held that though by s. 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement "as regards requisites in form" was governed by French law, this provision did not let in the French law so as to dispense with the signature of the payee as required by s. 32 (1), and the plaintiffs could not recover.

Held, that as the trial Judge had accepted the evidence as to the French law, and as by s. 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement as regards requisites in form was governed by French law, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 148), reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Messrs. F. Koechlin et Cie., of 53 Rue de Châteaudun, Paris, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 148) in an action in which they sued the defendants, Messrs. Kestenbaum Brothers, of 21, Manchester-avenue, Aldersgate-street, E.C., to recover £461 10s. 10d. as acceptors of a bill of exchange for 60,000 French francs, dated December 14, 1925, of which the plaintiffs were the indorsees.

The bill of exchange on which the action was brought was drawn in France by E. Vigderhaus on the defendants in London, payable at the end of February, 1926, to the order of M. Vigderhaus. The plaintiffs alleged that the bill was drawn by M. Vigderhaus and indorsed by him to the plaintiffs. It was, in fact, both signed and indorsed by E. Vigderhaus, the son of M. Vigderhaus. The signature was not expressed to be for M. Vigderhaus, but evidence was given that E. Vigderhaus had authority to sign for his father, M. Vigderhaus, and that he frequently did so in his own name without the words "for M. Vigderhaus."

The defendants denied that M. Vigderhaus was the drawer and that he had duly indorsed the bill to the plaintiffs ; and they alleged that the plaintiffs were not holders of the bill in due course.

Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs by a French lawyer who deposed that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing his own name if so authorized by the payee.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that, although by section 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement on the bill "as regards requisites in form" was governed by French law, that provision did not let in the French law so as to dispense with the signature of the payee as required by section 32 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that the plaintiffs could not recover. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. H. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. R. F. Levy appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. N. L. C. Macaskie for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that the case had been very well and very fully argued, and it raised a very interesting question, but the question raised had really been settled by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

The action was brought by indorsees of a French bill of exchange, drawn in France, against the acceptors. The acceptors challenged the right of the indorsees to recover payment of the bill. It was drawn payable to M. Vigderhaus. The defendants' case was that the indorsement was not in order because, the bill being drawn in favour of the father, M. Vigderhaus, the indorsement must also be by the father, but that it was, in fact, by his son, E. Vigderhaus.

The plaintiffs answered that if the son, E. Vigderhaus, had authority to sign on behalf of his father, then, by the law of France, it was quite sufficient to make the indorsement valid by French law for the son to sign the bill in his own name simpliciter ; and that, the indorsement being good by the law of France, the plaintiffs were entitled to sue the acceptors.

The first question was what was the law of France on the matter. That was a question of fact. One witness, a French lawyer, was called before Mr. Justice Rowlatt and he said that the law was that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing in his own name if so authorized by the payee. In cross-examination he said that, although that was the law, everybody did not follow that practice. Banks and other big concerns required persons who signed as agents to use words showing that they were signing on behalf of their principals. But the law was that to make a valid indorsement it was quite sufficient to indorse a bill in the way in which the bill in this case was indorsed. One might criticize the practice in France as being an inconvenient one, but that did not affect the law.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt only heard one witness on that point and his evidence was not contradicted. The father, M. Vigderhaus, in his evidence, said that millions of francs of his money had been dealt with by means of similar indorsements. The Court had refused leave to call further evidence on the question of French law, and, therefore, the only question was whether, on the facts before him, Mr. Justice Rowlatt was wrong in deciding that the indorsement was valid by French law. He (Lord Justice Bankes) was not able to say that he was.

It was decided in Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank (21 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 677) that the rule of international law, that the validity of a transfer of movable chattels must be governed by the law of the country in which the transfer took place, applied to the transfer of bills of exchange or cheques by indorsement. There was thus clear authority, if it were required, that the ordinary rules of international law applied to the indorsement in this case, that French law applied to it, and that the indorsees had a perfectly good title to the bill. Why then should not they recover against the acceptors ?

Section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provided that

"Where a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows :—(1) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue, and the validity as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance supra protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made. . . ."

The bill in this case was, in form, according to the law of France ; and the validity, as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as, inter alia, indorsement, was to be determined according to the law of the place where it was made. When once the position was accepted that the indorsement was good according to the law of France, and therefore good for all purposes, there was nothing else that could be wrong with the bill except requisites in form which, section 72 of the Act of 1882 having been passed in the form in which it was passed after the case of Bradlaugh v. De Rin (L.R., 3 C.P., 538 ; reversed, L.R., 5 C.P., 473), must be governed by French law.

The appeal must be allowed and judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs.

Lord Justice Sargant, in concurring, said that in his view there was ample evidence to justify Mr. Justice Rowlatt in coming to the conclusion that the indorsement in this case was valid according to French law. With regard to the second question—i.e., the right of the plaintiffs to recover on the bill in this country—that was really concluded by the decision in Bradlaugh v. De Rin (L.R., 5 C.P., 473), as adopted by the Legislature in passing section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

The effect of the decision in Bradlaugh v. De Rin (supra) was to draw a distinction between a foreign bill and an inland bill, which had been dealt with in Lebel v. Tucker (L.R., 3 Q.B., 77). The result of the Act of 1882 was that any person dealing with a foreign bill of exchange was in a less certain position than when dealing with an inland bill. It was clear by section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, that the law of the place where the bill was made was to apply.

The present case did not go nearly as far as Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank (21 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 677).

The question whether the bill could be properly indorsed only in the name of the father, or whether it could be indorsed in the name of the son, was purely a question of form and was therefore covered by section 72 (1) of the Act of 1882. Even if that were not so, it was covered by subsection 2 of the same section.

The plaintiffs were entitled to succeed, and the appeal must be allowed.

Mr. Justice Avory said that he had entertained considerable doubt whether the French law was sufficiently proved before Mr. Justice Rowlatt. That Judge had expressed his surprise at the evidence of the expert, and he (Mr. Justice Avory) shared his surprise on that point. But, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt had accepted the evidence of the expert, it appeared to him (Mr. Justice Avory) that the result which had been arrived at by the other members of the Court necessarily followed having regard to section 72 of the Act of 1882. He therefore agreed that the appeal should be allowed.

ASKEW v. GRIMMER.*

Negligence — Practice — Personal injuries—Defendant insured—Statement of that fact to jury.

On the trial by a Judge and jury of an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence, the practice is, where the defendant is insured against liability, not to inform the jury of that fact.

As Mr. STENHAM, counsel for the plaintiff, was opening this claim for damages for personal injuries, arising out of a street accident—the facts of which were of no general interest—he stated to the jury that the defendant had admitted liability, but had referred the plaintiff to his insurance company.

Mr. DOUGHTY, K.C., who appeared with Mr. Walker Carter for the defendant, at once asked his Lordship to discharge the jury. It was, he submitted, the invariable practice that a jury should not be told that an insurance company was concerned.

Mr. STENHAM submitted that he was entitled to put in evidence the whole conversation between the plaintiff and the defendant. He had carefully considered the position with reference to this particular case, and thought that it was fair to mention it.

Mr. DOUGHTY said that he thought that there was nothing in the practice books on the point, and that he had no authority which he could cite as a matter of law. In a large experience of these cases, however, he had never known it done. There was an apocryphal story of a member of the Bar, who should remain nameless, who was said to have told the Divisional Court:—"I have looked very carefully into the matter, and to tell the jury that there is an insurance company is not a cause for granting a new trial, but is merely a gross breach of professional etiquette."

Mr. STENHAM protested. He had considered the matter carefully; he might have committed an error of judgment, but he had thought that it was fair to tell the jury in this case of the insurance company.

Mr. DOUGHTY pointed out that if the defendant had said what was alleged, the insurance policy would probably be invalidated.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON said that he thought that it was the practice not to tell juries that an insurance company was involved, and that it was, perhaps, an error of judgment to have done so now. But, in view of the discussion, he felt sure that the jury would realize that it would be most unfair to the defendant to treat him as being insured, because if he had said what was alleged it might turn out that he was not insured at all. The most convenient course would be that the trial should proceed, and if he (his Lordship) were wrong, the Court of Appeal could then correct the matter.

The hearing then proceeded.

JAMES v. BRITISH GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Accident)—Motor-car—Third-party risks—Assured drunk when driving—Manslaughter through negligence—Right to recover on insurance—Public policy.

A driver of a motor-car who is insured against third-party risks, and who through negligence, consisting in getting drunk and in driving the car while he was in that condition, has collided with another vehicle and thereby committed manslaughter, is not precluded, on grounds of public policy, from recovering on his insurance, inasmuch as in such a case the criminal act is merely negligent and not wilful.

This was an action in which Mr. Frank Courtney James claimed, on an insurance policy issued by the defendant company, to be indemnified in respect of a motor accident in which he was involved on June 3, 1925. A motor-car driven by the plaintiff collided with a motor-bicycle, killing a man named Tait and injuring another named Shadwell. The cost of the repairs to the car and motor-bicycle amounted to over £80.

Shadwell began an action against the plaintiff and recovered £1,500 and costs taxed at £182 7s. 7d. The present plaintiff himself incurred costs in defending the action and in attending the inquest on Tait, the police court proceedings, and the assizes at Devizes, where he was tried and convicted of the manslaughter of Tait and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment.

The defendants contended that they were not liable, as the accident happened while the plaintiff was committing criminal acts, in that he was drunk and driving a motor-car to the danger of the public, which resulted in his conviction for manslaughter. They contended that the plaintiff thereby increased the risk borne by the defendants, and if and so far as the policy constituted an indemnity to the plaintiff against the consequences of his criminal acts it was contrary to public policy and void. The defendants further alleged that in the proposal form the plaintiff falsely stated that he was free from physical defect, and omitted to state that the car was the property of his father. They claimed that the policy was void and denied liability.

Mr. H. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Malcolm Hilbery appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. R. T. Monier-Williams for the defendants.

Mr. DU PARCQ said that if a man had not been killed there would be no question of the plaintiff's right to recover. Mr. Justice Bailhache, in Tinline v. White Cross Insurance Company (37 The Times L.R., 733; [1921] 3 K.B., 327) said that the fact that there was negligence or even gross negligence did not on the ground of public policy or on any grounds prevent an assured person from recovering. In that case the driver was not drunk; in this case he was, but that, he submitted, was immaterial.

The car was, in fact, paid for partly by the plaintiff and partly by his father; exact ownership was immaterial. Counsel also dealt with the alleged physical defect.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD submitted that it was against public policy that the plaintiff should receive any indemnity against the consequences of his criminal acts. It was wilful misconduct for a man to get drunk when about to drive a car.

Counsel on both sides agreed to accept the shorthand note of the proceedings at the Wiltshire Assizes as correctly representing the evidence given there and to admit that the plaintiff was convicted of manslaughter on that evidence.

After evidence of the ownership of the car and the plaintiff's physical condition,

His LORDSHIP asked Mr. Monier-Williams where he suggested that the line was to be drawn between a crime which deprived a man of his right to recover and one which did not. Was it not a question of intention? Otherwise it seemed difficult to find any halfway house between complete indemnity and complete loss of indemnity.

Mr. MONIER-WILLIAMS said that, accepting intention as the test, to get drunk was an intentional act.

His LORDSHIP said that he thought that where a man committed a crime which necessarily involved intention, then it was contrary to public policy that he should be indemnified against the consequences. In the case of other crimes it was a question whether there was intention. Unless he were compelled by decided cases to hold otherwise, he thought that it would be altogether contrary to public policy to hold that a man could not cover by insurance his liability to third persons arising out of dangerous driving. It would be a serious thing if juries, magistrates, and Judges had to know that if a man were convicted of any offence the injured party could not recover any effective damages.

Mr. HILBERY submitted that what was being sought was not indemnity against the results of a criminal act, but against a civil liability arising out of an act which had a double aspect. A man could not enter into a contract to be indemnified against the immediate consequence of his criminal act—that was to say, the punishment which it was the intention of the law that he should suffer; but here the plaintiff was seeking indemnity against a collateral civil liability.

MR. JUSTICE ROCHE, in the course of his judgment, said that the plaintiff was insured with the defendant company against divers matters, such as third-party risks, including accidental bodily injury to any person. The company also undertook to pay for the defence of any proceedings in a police court.

The circumstances leading up to the claim were simple but unfortunate. In June, 1925, the plaintiff, while driving the car in respect of which the policy was issued, collided with a motor bicycle driven by Shadwell, a subaltern in the Army, and carrying as a passenger—whether in a sidecar or on a pillion did not appear—another subaltern named Tait. As a result of the collision Tait was killed and Shadwell was injured.

No civil proceedings ensued in respect of Tait, who probably had no dependants who suffered pecuniarily through his death. But Shadwell brought an action in which he recovered damages and costs, and costs were incurred by the present plaintiff. Shadwell had not yet received those damages because the plaintiff was not in a position to pay them unless he had a right to have recourse to the present defendants. That was not strictly material but was not altogether negligible when one came to consider the question where public policy really lay.

James was charged with the manslaughter of Tait and with unlawfully wounding Shadwell. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff had been at a wedding, and had been foolish enough and wrong enough to have too much to drink. He was convicted of the manslaughter of Tait, and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. The charge in relation to Shadwell was not proceeded with, the indictment remained on the file, and there was no actual conviction in respect of the subject-matter of the present claim.

The important contention of general interest that was raised by the defence was that, inasmuch as the plaintiff was guilty of a crime, it was against public policy that he should be indemnified by his insurers. But he (his Lordship) would first deal with other points raised by the defence.

His LORDSHIP found as facts, after reviewing the evidence—(1) that the plaintiff was the owner of the car; (2) that the plaintiff was free from physical defect at the time of the proposal; and (3) that the item of £252 5s. claimed for the costs of the defence at the assizes was not recoverable under the terms of the policy, and the claim must be reduced accordingly.

It remained to deal with the question of public policy. That was a question of very general importance, because if the contention of the defendants was right it cut at the root of a very large number of motor insurances. He could see no half-way house. The principle, if applicable at all, was applicable to all persons driving to the public danger. It would extend, moreover, beyond motor-car insurance. It would extend to workmen's compensation insurance in cases where workmen were injured by accidents caused by breaches of the Factory Acts.

Fortunately for himself, this matter had been the subject of a decision by a Judge very experienced in insurance matters, Mr. Justice Bailhache, in Tinline v. White Cross Insurance Company (37 The Times L.R., 733; [1921] 3 K.B., 327). In matters of this sort as affecting public policy the rights and duties of Judges were clear. They had to attend to matters of public policy. If there were ever any doubt on that point it had been cleared away in the well known case in 1857 of Brownlow v. Egerton (4 H.L., Cas., 1). But the doctrine of public policy should not be carried a step further than was necessary and Courts were very reluctant to extend it. Rules of law were themselves unchanging, but the applications were infinitely various and might be variable from time to time and from place to place. If any rule could be found it was the duty of the Judge to follow the rule, and he had found a careful judgment of Mr. Justice Bailhache dealing with the very point now in dispute. It had been sought to distinguish the present case from Tinline's case (supra), but he was unable to do so. In Burrows v. Rhodes and Another (15 The Times L.R., 286; [1899] 1 Q.B., 816, at p. 828) Mr. Justice Kennedy said:—

"It has, I think, long been settled law that if an act is manifestly unlawful, or the doer of it knows it to be unlawful, as constituting either a civil wrong or a criminal offence, he cannot maintain an action for contribution or for indemnity against the liability which results to him therefrom. An express promise of indemnity to him for the commission of such an act is void."

Mr. Justice Bailhache, applying the rule, held that the plaintiff could recover an indemnity because, though he might have done what was unlawful he did not do it in circumstances in which it was manifestly unlawful or in which he knew it to be unlawful. So, in the present case, the act which brought about the criminal liability was a negligent one; it was not a wilful doing of the act by which the doer injured or killed the other persons.

He was not prepared to hold that in the case of negligence there was such a degree of criminality as made it contrary to public policy that the plaintiff should recover.

It was sought to distinguish this case from Tinline's case (supra) on the ground that the plaintiff here was drunk. He found it difficult to believe that the plaintiff was any worse morally than a person who in his sober senses drove to the danger of the public. Both were guilty of negligence for which they were liable in a criminal court. In neither case had they intended the injury.

The effect of holding that the plaintiff could not recover would be that in no case in which a person was driving to the public danger would he be able to rely on his insurance. The proposal that had been made that all persons who drove motor-cars should be compelled to insure against third party risks might be mentioned as a reason for caution in extending the rule as to public policy.

On the facts, he did not arrive at the conclusion that the plaintiff deliberately put himself into a condition of drunkenness and in that condition drove a car; he did so through folly. There must be judgment for the plaintiff for £1,857 4s. 11d.

Court of Criminal Appeal. (Avory, Shearman, and Sankey, JJ.) 1927. Mar. 14.

REX v. HAYWARD. REX v. LAWRENCE.*

Criminal Law—Habitual criminal—Leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life—Previous convictions—Proof—Evidence of an admission by the prisoner—Whether evidence of identification required.

These were successive appeals by habitual criminals against sentences of preventive detention. The only point calling for a report in each case was the mode of proof of previous convictions other than the three convictions required to constitute the offence.

Mr. Albert Crew appeared for the appellant Hayward; Mr. Eustace Fulton for the Crown in the first case; and Mr. F .D. Levy for the Crown in the second case.

Mr. Crew submitted that all convictions ought to have been strictly proved by an officer who could identify the accused, and he referred to Rex v. Turner (18 Cr. App. R., 161); Rex v. Seymour (17 Cr. App. R., 128); Rex v. Culliford (6 Cr. App. R., 142); Rex v. Stewart (4 Cr. App. R., 175), which, he submitted, overruled Rex v. Franklin (3 Cr. App. R., 48).

Mr. Justice Avory, in delivering the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal, said that in Rex v. Franklin (3 Cr. App. R., 48) the Court had decided that evidence of previous convictions was properly given without evidence of identification if there was any evidence of an admission by the prisoner. That case had been acted on ever since, and the Court had never decided otherwise, in spite of the headnote to Rex v. Stewart (4 Cr. App. R., 175), which was wrong. Here there was evidence of an admission by the prisoner who said to the officer who was reading his record over to him: "You needn't go through the list. I've had it before." Nor did the prisoner go into the box to deny any of the convictions.

In the second case Mr. Justice Sankey said that the law was well settled and had been reiterated by Mr. Justice Avory in the previous case. The appeal was frivolous.

BOHEMIAN UNION BANK v. ADMINISTRATOR OF AUSTRIAN PROPERTY.*

Treaty of Peace—Enemy property—Retention and liquidation by Allied Powers—Austrian company—Change of nationality—Transfer to that of Czechoslovakia—Exemption of individual citizens—Whether company entitled to same exemption—Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, Arts. 53, 70, 249 (b).

A company which at the date of the dissolution of the Austrian Empire was a national of that Empire, and which by Arts. 53 and 70 of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye became de jure a national of Czechoslovakia, is not liable to have its property rights retained and liquidated by the Allied Powers under Art. 249 (b) of the Treaty, and is in the same position in that respect as an individual citizen similarly circumstanced.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed to be entitled to the possession of certain property belonging to them and now held by the Administrator of Austrian property, and to an injunction to restrain the Administrator from parting or in any way dealing with it. The property in question was of the value of about £54,000.

The plaintiffs, a joint stock company, established in 1872 in Prague, Bohemia, whose head office had continued ever since to be in Prague, alleged that at the time of the coming into force of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye they were a company of Czechoslovakian nationality.

The defendant, purporting to act under the provisions of Article 249 (b) of the Treaty (whereby the Allied Powers reserved the right to retain and liquidate all property within their territories belonging at the date of the coming into force of the Treaty to nationals of the former Austrian Empire), and of paragraph 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920 (whereby the right so reserved was exercised), had retained certain property of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs contended that they were not nationals of the former Austrian Empire within the meaning of Article 249 (b) or of the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920.

They alleged that they became a Czechoslovakian company by virtue of Article 2 of Law No. 11 of 1918, or, in the alternative, that they ceased to be nationals of the former Austrian Empire and acquired Czechoslovakian nationality by virtue of the provisions of section VI. of Part III. of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye.

* Reported by G. P. Langworthy, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant alleged that the property was subject to the charge created by the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920.

Article 249 (b) of the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye was as follows :—

"Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property rights and interests which belong at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or companies controlled by them, and are within the territories . . . of such Powers, including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty or under the control of those Powers. . . .

"Persons who within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty show that they have acquired ipso facto, in accordance with its provisions, the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, including those who under Articles 72 or 76 obtain such nationality with the consent of the competent authorities, or who under Articles 74 or 77 acquire such nationality in virtue of previous rights of citizenship (pertinenza) will not be considered as nationals of the former Austrian Empire within the meaning of this paragraph."

"Article 53.—Austria, in conformity with the action already taken by the Allied and Associated Powers, recognizes the complete independence of the Czechoslovak State which will include the autonomous territory of the Ruthenians to the south of the Carpathians."

"Article 70.—Every person possessing rights of citizenship (pertinenza) in territory which formed part of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall obtain ipso facto to the exclusion of Austrian nationality the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over such territory."

Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. J. W. Scobell Armstrong appeared for the plaintiffs ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip), K.C., and Mr. J. H. Stamp appeared for the defendant.

Sir Patrick Hastings, in opening, said that the bank was originally an Austrian company taking its nationality from its seat at Prague. In 1918 there was a revolution, a new Government was set up, and Czechoslovakia became an independent State. According to the Austrian law, which was adopted as the law of the new State, the company became a Czechoslovakian company because the seat of the bank was in Czechoslovakia. The plaintiffs were in law and in fact a Czechoslovakian company. The Peace Treaty referred to Czechoslovakia as one of the Associated Powers, and it was a signatory to the Treaty. The plaintiffs were Czechoslovakian nationals. Having no right of indemnity, they were put into a worse position than Austrian nationals if this property went into the clearing-house. The Treaty made it plain that the signatories contemplated that the nationality of a company might be changed by the transfer of territory. (See Article 272.)

The plaintiffs were before the date of the Treaty nationals of the former Austrian Empire, but on the change of boundary they became nationals of Czechoslovakia. Within six months from the date of the Treaty they satisfied the Administrator that they were a company situated in Czechoslovakia. On the break-up of the Austrian Empire the plaintiffs were clothed with Czechoslovakian nationality. The plaintiffs had acquired the nationality of an Associated Power within the meaning of the proviso to paragraph 3 of Article 249 (b)—that is to say, the nationality of a Czechoslovakian. The right of citizenship under Article 70 applied to a company.

The Solicitor-General said that he might assist by stating that he agreed that as from October, 1918, the Bohemian Bank was under Czechoslovakian law and, in the law of the Austrian Republic, a Czechoslovakian national within the meaning of the Treaty. Citizenship or pertinenza could, however, only be acquired by an individual. A company which was a national of the Austrian Empire at the date of its dissolution was subject to the charge under Article 249 (b).

Dr. Karplus, a practising advocate and counsel for the French Legation in Vienna, was called by the defendant to give his opinion of the law regulating rights of citizenship and pertinenza, and the meaning and extent of those terms, and said that, according to Austrian law, a company could have neither citizenship nor pertinenza. "Pertinenza" was an Italian word, and certain political rights went with it, such as a right to vote.

The Solicitor-General submitted that primarily the application and interpretation of the Order in Council had to be considered, and if one found a clear meaning in the Order no reference could be made to the Treaty, but if it was ambiguous one could look at the Treaty. The term in Article 249 (b) "nationals of the former Austrian Empire" included corporations. The first question was whether this bank was "a national of the former Austrian Empire," and, secondly, whether it was a person who acquired ipso facto, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty, Czechoslovakian nationality. Taking Article 70 alone, it was clear that no person obtained the nationality of the new State unless he possessed rights of citizenship or pertinenza in that territory, and a corporation could not possess those rights within the meaning of Article 70. The policy of this Treaty ought not to be considered in attempting to give an interpretation to its meaning. There was here only one interpretation which a Court could put on Article 70 and the following articles, and there was not sufficient ambiguity to make it look elsewhere for the meaning.

Sir Patrick Hastings, in reply, submitted that the plaintiffs were within Article 70, and that Articles 53 and 89 were also sufficient to enable them to succeed.

Mr. Justice Clauson, in giving judgment, said that the action must succeed, and a declaration as asked for would be made, or such declaration as should be agreed upon by counsel. He based his judgment on Article 70 and Article 53, on the ground that there was an express provision in the Treaty that Czechoslovakian corporations were entitled to the benefit of the exemption from the power to retain and liquidate all property within the territories of the Allied Powers belonging at the date of the coming into force of the Treaty to nationals of the former Austrian Empire. In Article 70 citizenship included civil rights, and the effect of Article 53 was to make Czechoslovakian de facto nationals Czechoslovakian nationals de jure. The Treaty meant to include corporations among those persons who had acquired ipso facto, in accordance with its provisions, Czecho-slovakian nationality within the meaning of the proviso to Article 249 (b). The defendant must pay the costs of the action.

HEYN AND OTHERS v. OCEAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract—Carriage of goods by sea—Theft from steamer at discharge wharf—Absence of fault or privity of carrier—Discharge by stevedores—Responsibility of carrier for his "agents or servants"—Whether stevedores within that expression—Burden of proof—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. III., r. 2, Art. IV., r. 2.

The plaintiffs shipped at Liverpool on the defendants' steamer a quantity of cloth for carriage to Shanghai. By the bill of lading the defendants were to have the protection given by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. After discharge was begun at Shanghai by stevedores, who were independent contractors, some of the cloth was stolen from the steamer. It was admitted that the loss had occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants themselves. In an action for damages for breach of contract,

Held, that the stevedores must be treated as "agents or servants" of the defendants within Rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act, and, as on the facts the defendants had failed to establish that the theft had not been committed by the stevedores' men, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed a sum of £82 as damages for breach of contract in relation to the carriage of certain rolls of cloth from Liverpool to Shanghai.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. H. Atkins appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Miller, K.C., and Mr. J. Dickinson for the defendants.

The amount of the damages was agreed at £82, but though the sum was small other claims depended on the result of this case, and the action by the present plaintiffs was regarded as a test action.

It appeared that in December, 1925, the plaintiffs shipped at Liverpool on the defendants' steamer Eumæus 72 cases of cloth for carriage to Shanghai. By the bill of lading the defendants were to have the protection given by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

The Eumæus arrived at Shanghai on January 11, 1926, and moored at a wharf with her starboard side to the wharf. Discharge was begun on January 12 by stevedores who were independent contractors and not servants of the defendants. Discharge only took place during the day, and ceased at 5 p.m.

On the night of January 12 a barge was left alongside the port side of the Eumæus and about 3 a.m. on January 13 a quartermaster who was on duty on the Eumæus saw some Chinese coolies dragging bales of cloth across the barge to a junk which had drawn up on the other side of it. The alarm was given, and it was found that a bunker door in the side of the steamer, giving access to the barge, had been opened; that six cases of the cloth were missing; and that the remaining 66 had been removed from the hold in which they were stowed and placed in the bunker ready for taking through the opened door.

The police arrested certain Chinese and recovered three of the missing cases, the cloth in which was badly damaged. The remaining three cases had not been traced.

The plaintiffs made a claim for damages, but the defendants refused payment and relied on the provisions of Article IV., Rule 2, subsection (q), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22).

Rule 2 of Article III. of the Schedule to the Act provides as follows:—

"Subject to the provisions of Article IV. the carrier shall properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for and discharge the goods carried."

Rule 2 of Article IV. provides:—

"Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from [a number of enumerated causes, such as perils of the sea, strikes, insufficiency of packing and latent defects not discoverable by due diligence, and]

"(q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage."

It was supposed that the theft must have been carried out by Chinese labourers who had concealed themselves in the hold during the daytime, but the defendants had not been able to discover how or by whom it had been effected.

Evidence having been given,

Mr. Raeburn submitted that the defendants had failed to discharge the burden of proof which was expressly laid upon them by subsection (q); that they had not proved either that the robbery was not committed by their own servants or agents, or, if it was committed by outside persons, that they had exercised due care to keep them out. The duty of the ship under Article III. was not only to carry the goods, but also to "discharge" them. All the goods must be handed over safely unless the shipowner could show affirmatively that he was relieved from liability under Article IV.

Mr. Miller submitted that the evidence showed that the defendants had exercised due care.

Reference was made to Owners of the Cargo of the City of Baroda v. Hall Line (42 The Times L.R., 717).

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in the course of his judgment, stated the facts, and said that he was satisfied on the evidence that the defendants took proper precautions to guard against theft during the night: the ship was brilliantly lighted and a watch was kept on deck. It was admitted that the loss occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants themselves. The case depended on the interpretation of subsection (q) and on whether that subsection when correctly interpreted relieved the defendants from liability.

The subsection said "fault or privity of the carrier or the default or neglect of the servants or agents of the carrier." In the latest edition of Scrutton on Charterparties the editors suggested that the word "or" [in italics] must mean "and," which was really a suggestion that the word "or" in the Act of Parliament had been used by mistake and that the Act should be amended by replacing the word "or" by the word "and."

He was not satisfied that it was the duty of any Judge to alter the words of an Act of Parliament, particularly when the suggested alteration was required not for the purpose of making sense of something which was unintelligible, but for the purpose of carrying out what was supposed to be the policy of the Act.

The point, however, had not been argued or relied on by the defendants, and the case had proceeded on the basis that the word "and" should be read in place of "or." He would therefore deal with the case on that footing, but in doing so he was not deciding that "or" should be read as "and," and if the point was raised before him hereafter he should feel free to deal with it as he thought fit. He would only say that in his view the disjunctive word "or" could never mean the conjunctive "and."

Mr. Raeburn relied on the use of the word "nor" in the latter part of subsection (q), but he did not think that that made any difference. Prima facie the loss in this case was one which, if unexplained, must make the defendants liable, and the defendants could only escape liability by bringing themselves within some exception. The burden of proof would be on the defendants by common law and the Act did not add anything to it.

Had the defendants established that the robbery took place without the default or neglect of their servants or agents? So far as the ship's officers and crew were concerned, they had taken every precaution to guard against the extreme pertinacity and ingenuity of native thieves. But whoever the thieves were they must obviously have had considerable knowledge of the nature of the cargo and of the internal structure of the steamer, and he thought that the persons most likely to have that knowledge were the stevedores' men. They also were the persons who would have most opportunity of concealing themselves in the hold or passages, and he drew the inference that the theft was committed by the stevedores' men. At all events the defendants had not succeeded in establishing that it was not.

A further point arose on the fact that the stevedores were independent contractors and not the servants of the defendants. Must they be treated as "agents or servants" of the defendants within the meaning of subsection (q)? It was an arguable question, but in his view they must. Both by common law and by Rule 2 of Article III. the carrier's duty was to "discharge" the goods which he had carried, and if he chose to employ an independent contractor to carry out that duty for him the independent contractor became his agent or servant within the meaning of the subsection.

The defendants had therefore failed to discharge the burden of proving that the loss had not occurred through the fault or neglect of their agents or servants, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum claimed, with costs. As the action was a test action there would be High Court costs.

Mr. DICKINSON said that the defendants had pleaded on the basis that "or" did not mean "and," and he wished to keep the point open if the case went elsewhere.

ROBERTS v. ANGLO-SAXON INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Accident)—Motor-car "to be used only for commercial travelling"—Statement incorporated and made basis of contract—Warranty or description of risk—Arbitration—Award bad on its face—Award set aside.

The respondent had insured his motor-car with the appellants by a policy which incorporated and was based on a proposal and declaration by the respondent which warranted that the motor-car was to be used only for commercial travelling. During the period covered by the insurance, the respondent's motor-car was being used to carry passengers, when it caught fire and was destroyed.

Held, that the statement that the motor-car was to be used only for commercial travelling was descriptive of the risk and that the motor-car was not covered by the policy when it was being used to carry passengers. The award of the arbitrator in favour of the respondent was set aside, because it was bad on its face.

This was an appeal by the insurance company from a decision of the Divisional Court dismissing a motion to set aside the award of an arbitrator given against the insurance company.

The award was made in an arbitration on a claim by the respondent under a policy of insurance on his motor-car. The motor-car was insured for £225. On October 4, 1925, while the motor-car was being used to carry passengers, it caught fire and was destroyed. The insurance company resisted the claim on the ground that the motor-car was warranted to be used only for commercial travelling. The arbitrator made his award in favour of the insured for the sum of £150. The insurance company moved to set aside the award on the ground that it was bad in law.

The insurance policy incorporated a proposal, the material parts of which were as follows:—"Question.—State clearly the purposes for which the vehicles are to be used. Answer.—Commercial. Question.—State nature of goods to be carried. Answer.—Textile goods. . . . I warrant the above statement and particulars are true, and I agree that this declaration shall be held promissory and shall form the basis of the contract between me and the Anglo-Saxon Insurance Association, Limited, and I am willing to accept a policy subject to the terms, exceptions and conditions prescribed by the Association therein."

The policy contained, in the schedule, particulars of the motor-car which was insured, followed by these words in print, "Warranted used only for the following purposes," and then written in in type were the following words : "Commercial travelling."

The Divisional Court dismissed the motion and the insurance company appealed.

Mr. H. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. Fox-Andrews appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Wallington (Mr. Ansley with him) for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal from the Divisional Court which raises the question whether an award made by a commercial arbitrator is bad upon the face of it. The matter referred to the arbitrator was whether or not the insurance company were liable on a policy with the assured in the events which happened, and in reference to one of Mr. Wallington's arguments I start by saying that I think, on the face of these materials and having regard to what the arbitrator has stated, we must take it that the contract between these parties is expressed in the policy, because the arbitrator makes no reference to any point such as was raised by Mr. Wallington, or any indication that he thought the contract must be rectified or anything of the kind. He starts off by saying what the contract between the parties is, namely, the policy, and then he sets out the material clause in the policy upon which the whole question turns. It was an insurance of a motor-car, and in the schedule inserted in the policy there are particulars of the insured vehicle followed by these words in print, "Warranted used only for the following purposes," and then written in in type to apply that to this particular case there are the words "Commercial travelling." So the contract between the parties contained a clause that this vehicle, for the purpose of the insurance, was "Warranted used only for the following purposes : commercial travelling."

If this matter had come before me either as an arbitrator or as a Judge of first instance, or as a Judge sitting to decide the question on a special case stated for the opinion of the Court, I should have had no hesitation whatever in saying that in my opinion the true construction of this clause is the construction which was put upon the language of the insurance policy in the case of Farr v. Motor Traders' Mutual Insurance Society (36 The Times L.R., 711 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 669), namely, that in this class of policy when persons insert clauses, whether described as warranties or whether stated to be part of the description of the vehicle, indicating that the vehicle is to be used in some restricted way, my opinion in that case, and in this case and in similar cases, is and would be that the parties had used that language as words descriptive of the risk, and that, as a result, when the vehicle is not being used in accordance with the description it is not covered ; but it does not follow at all that because it is used on some one occasion, or on more than one occasion, for other than the described use, the policy is avoided. It does not follow at all. If the proper construction, on its language, is a description of the limitation of the liability, then the effect would be that the vehicle would be off cover during the period during which it was not being used for the warranted purpose, but it would come again on the cover when it was again used for the warranted purpose. I am quite clear about that, and I have no difficulty in expressing my opinion in reference to that matter. But that is not the point that we have to decide in this case. What we have to decide in this case is whether or not the arbitrator's award is bad on the face of it. Now this is what the arbitrator has found ; it is in paragraph 4. He finds that, although the motor vehicle was at the time of its destruction by fire being used for the carriage of passengers, that was in no way either a contributory cause of the fire or the actual cause of the loss of the motor vehicle by the fire, and that the words on the policy, "Warranted used only for the purpose of commercial travelling," were in no sense either a warranty or a promise going to the root of the transaction between the parties which ought to avoid or relieve the Association from their liability under the said policy. I cannot help saying that the arbitrator expressed himself in most unfortunate language in that clause, because I am quite uncertain as to what he means. First of all, he does not negative the idea that the car was not being used for commercial travelling ; he said it was used for the carriage of passengers. The passengers may all have been commercial travellers, or they may have been persons who had been taken for a ride as prospective customers. One does not know, but one would assume that what the arbitrator meant, although he did not state it, is that the car was not being used for commercial travelling ; and it was, and I think very properly, admitted by Mr. Wallington that this case has to be decided on the footing that that is what the arbitrator did mean. I assume, therefore, that the arbitrator commenced by stating that at the time of the fire the car was not being used for commercial travelling. Then he goes on to say that that fact "was in no way either a contributory cause of the fire or the actual cause of the loss of the motor vehicle by the fire." Now, if he puts that in because that was to him a sufficient reason for holding that the warranty clause had no application to the case at all, it is perfectly obvious that this is an error on the face of the award, because it is quite immaterial whether the fact that the car was being used in this way was or was not "a contributory cause of the fire or the actual cause of the loss of the motor vehicle by the fire."

Now what happened in the Court below was this. They took a charitable view of the arbitrator's language and they proceeded to inquire whether, apart from the language which he used, the clause was capable of a construction the effect of which would be that the insurance company would still be liable. Mr. Justice Salter took one view of the language and Mr. Justice MacKinnon took another view of the language, and they both of them seemed to think that they could find a construction of this language which did not relieve the insurance company from liability. Mr. Justice MacKinnon directed his attention, as it seems to me, entirely to the question whether a construction ought to be put upon this language the effect of which would be to avoid the policy altogether. In that connexion he came to the conclusion that it was possible to put a construction upon the language as being language of description of the character of the user of the vehicle. Mr. Justice Salter, on the other hand, after going through the cases to which our attention has been called—cases where learned Judges put constructions upon the particular language applicable to description of the premises or other subject-matter—came to the conclusion that these words were capable of a construction (to use his language) referring to the habitual use of the vehicle. This is what he says. After expressing his own opinion first of all, and then dealing with the cases, he says : "I think this is not so plain a case as that"—that is, referring to one of the cases that had been cited to him—"Then comes the question, if that is the true meaning of this promise, that the car shall be used as a matter of business in a general way, and the regular user is to be only commercial, is there evidence of any breach ? "

I start with this, that if you take the language of the award literally there is no other possible conclusion except that there is an error of law on the face of it, because the arbitrator apparently gives an entirely wrong reason for coming to the conclusion to which he did come ; and he, secondly, expresses the view in reference to the obligation of the parties as set out in the policy that he thought that the case was one in which the insurance company ought not to be relieved from their liability. It is impossible to say that an arbitrator who expresses himself in that way does not show on the face of the award an error of law ; but, treating the matter from the point of view of the Divisional Court, it seems to me that they went beyond the language and sought for themselves to decide whether the view taken by the arbitrator was possible having regard to the language used. Of course, if that is the question that comes before us, it comes really more in the nature of a special case, and we have to decide whether the view taken by the Divisional Court and expressed by them was the right view of the language used in the policy ; in other words, it comes back to the question : What is the true construction of this clause ? And I agree that when once you get to that point there is only one true construction, because the true construction is the one which the Court which is called upon to construe the language gives. I do not think, strictly speaking, we are called upon to put a construction upon the language having regard to the form of the award, but assuming that we are, I with respect am unable to agree with the view expressed by those learned Judges. In the first place, I do not think we can get away from the words " warranted only." I do not attach undue importance to " warranted," but when I find " warranted " used in conjunction with " only " it seems to me impossible to get away from the conclusion that it is there definitely stated by the parties as a condition that the user of this vehicle shall be only for the purpose indicated. If that is so, it excludes the construction put upon the language by either learned Judge ; and when one has to say for oneself what the true construction is, I only repeat what I began by saying, that I think the true construction is a construction similar to the one which was put upon similar language in Farr's case (supra).

For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed and the award must be set aside on the ground that it is bad on the face of it.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is a case of some little difficulty, as is shown by the different opinions held by the different people who have considered this policy, and it is made more difficult by the fact that it arises in such a way that we have to consider whether there is an error of law on the face of the award—itself not an easy question.

There are really two questions, I suppose, that we have to consider : (1) What does the policy mean on the facts so far as they are found by the arbitrator or agreed ; and (2) Does the award show an error of law on the face of it, so that we can set it aside ? I deal with the policy first. The plaintiff accepted the policy and sued on it, and he must take the policy, therefore, with its terms ; he has not applied to rectify it, and the policy purports to insure a motor vehicle, an Overland de Luxe, of a certain horse-power and with a certain registered letter and number " warranted used only for the following purposes : commercial travelling." But the policy also recites that the assured has made a proposal and declaration which it is agreed shall be the basis of the contract, and we, therefore, have to look at the proposal and declaration. The proposal and declaration, which are applicable to commercial motor vehicles or trade vehicles, have two questions and answers : " State clearly the purposes for which vehicle will be used " —it is " will be "—" Commercial. State nature of goods to be carried "—" to be "—" Textile goods." Reading those two answers together with " warranted used only for the following purposes," I think that " used " in the policy means " to be used." It is " will be used " in question 4 and " to be carried " in question 5, and " used " is quite capable of being interpreted as " to be used." But it is " to be used only." What is the effect of that ? Looking myself at the policy and the declaration, with such knowledge of insurance law as I possess after spending a good deal of time—with great advantage to myself—in unravelling policies, it seems to me that that is a promissory declaration as to the risk. " I will insure you in certain circumstances, but only in certain circumstances." It is the same as the well-known warranty or promise in marine insurance, " warranted no St. Lawrence between the 1st October and the 31st March," which means that if the ship goes into the St. Lawrence and is lost between those dates you do not recover under the policy because that is not the risk that the insurance company have undertaken. There are very similar clauses in life policies, under which if you die outside the United Kingdom or within certain dangerous latitudes or longitudes in certain dangerous countries you are not insured because that is not the risk which the insurance company have undertaken. I read this clause by itself, that is to say, before I look at the award and before I look at the discussion which has taken place in the Divisional Court, as being a promise as to the future use of the car, limiting the risk which the insurance company undertake, and, at any rate, meaning this, that if a loss occurs when it is not being used for the purpose of commercial travelling, the insurance company is not liable.

Now, three other persons, before it came into this Court, have stated what they think is the meaning of it ; first of all, the arbitrator. I have some difficulty in making out what the arbitrator did mean. I think he probably meant, and I think Mr. Wallington was quite right in agreeing that it should be taken as if he had stated that he meant, that he agreed that the car at the time of the loss was not being used for commercial purposes. Then he says : " I find that, although the said motor vehicle was at the time of its destruction by fire being used for the carriage of passengers, this was in no way either a contributory cause of the fire or the actual cause of the loss of the motor vehicle by the fire, and that the words on the policy ' warranted used only for the purpose of commercial travelling ' were in no sense either a warranty or a promise going to the root of the transaction between the parties which ought to avoid or relieve the Association from their liability under the said policy." Now, I take that to be a finding of fact and to mean : " This car at the time of the loss was not being used only for the purpose of commercial travelling ; it was being used for a purpose which was not commercial travelling at all, but that use did not cause the fire either actually or as a contributory cause, and I find as a matter of law on the construction of the policy that those facts do not in any way excuse the insurance company under the clause 'warranted used only for the purpose of commercial travelling.'" The language, of course, is curious because he finds that it is not a clause which ought to avoid the policy or relieve the Association from liability. What would avoid the policy or relieve the Association would be facts which would amount to breach of the clause, and I read the award as construing the policy in this way, that the fact that the car was used for non-commercial purposes, the user not causing or contributing to the fire, is not a breach of the clause "warranted used only for the purpose of commercial travelling," which clause is not a promise going to the root of the transaction between the parties so as to relieve the Association from their liability for the fire. I think, for the reasons I have given, that is a wrong construction of the clause.

In the Divisional Court Mr. Justice Salter says expressly that he does not agree with the language in which the learned arbitrator states his finding, and he proceeds in this way: "It has been urged upon us that these words: 'Warranted used only for the following purposes: commercial travelling' are merely description, or are a mere honest intention of the insurer at the time when he effected the insurance. I do not think, looking at the policy as a whole, and including in it the promissory statements in the proposal, that it is possible to say that this is a mere description or a mere statement of present intention. I think it is a promise for the future, and I think it is a promise which is fundamental." That, of course, differs from the view that the arbitrator took. Then in discussing the cases the learned Judge comes to the conclusion that the true meaning of the clause is that the car may be used as a matter of business in a general way, and that the regular user is only commercial. That seems to me to give no effect to the word "only" in the policy. It strikes the word "only" out, because "only" excludes user other than commercial, in my view, and it seems to leave it possible that a gentleman who generally uses a car commercially may take it down to Pendine Sands to run it in a speed trial and yet recover when a fire happens in the course of the trial. Mr. Justice MacKinnon does not take that view. He takes an earlier view in this sense, that he does not think it is a fundamental clause; he thinks the language is such that it is ambiguous and one of the equally possible meanings may be that it only relates to user of the car at the time when the policy is taken out and is a description of the car at the time when the policy is taken out. That seems to me to give no effect, first of all, to the answers to the questions "Purpose for which vehicle will be used" and "Nature of goods to be carried," or to the word "only" in the policy.

Now comes the question, assuming that what I have said is the right construction of the policy, Can we deal with the arbitrator's award? This is not a special case; it is an award made by an arbitrator, and the general rule is that if you go to an arbitrator you take him for better or for worse, and if he makes a mistake of fact that is your fault for going to a tribunal which makes a mistake of fact. Generally, if he makes a mistake in law that is your look-out, because you choose your tribunal and if the tribunal makes a mistake in law you take the tribunal for better or for worse; but there is an exception clearly decided by the cases, first of all by Hodgkinson v. Fernie (3 C.B. (N.S.), 189), and then by the decision of the House of Lords in British Westinghouse, &c., Company v. Underground, &c., Company of London ([1912] A.C., 673), that if upon the face of the award it shows that he has made an error in law then you may set the award aside. It is not for me to discuss the desirability of that exception; it is clearly established, and it is carried so far that where the arbitrator has asked the Court to assist him in law by stating a consultative case and the Divisional Court has told him what in their view the law is, and under the statute there is no appeal from the Court which has told him what the law is, if the arbitrator then is desirous of showing how correct he is and states on the face of his award that he has been told by the Court that the proper construction of the document before him is so and so and he has acted upon it, there is an appeal which may go to the House of Lords; and if the House of Lords or the Court of Appeal should think that the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong, there is an error of law appearing on the face of the award, although the arbitrator was bound to act under the consultative opinion that he got from the Court and although at the time there was no appeal from that opinion. That has been decided by the House of Lords, and, again, it cannot be questioned.

Now, if that is so, is there in this award an error of law appearing on the face of the award? In my view the arbitrator does show on the face of the award that he has put a construction on the language of the contract that he has to interpret which is not the right construction. In my view there is only one right construction. There may be other constructions contended for, but there is in my view only one right construction—that determined by the highest tribunal which has dealt with the matter for the time being. This decision of this Court will be the right construction unless some higher tribunal says it is the wrong construction, but it does not seem to me possible to say there were several views that the arbitrator might have taken, and that he has taken one of them, and, therefore, we cannot interfere, because it is one which he has taken and one which he might take; it is not like the finding of a jury where there are two possible findings on the evidence, and the Court will not interfere because there was evidence on which the jury might find one way or the other. The question is, What is the true interpretation of the words used? And in my view, if you can come to a decision there is only one true interpretation. The case where you cannot come to a decision is where there are two meanings equally probable and you cannot say which is right and you cannot say which is the true construction.

In my view, therefore, there is an error of law appearing on the face of the award in that the arbitrator has stated a construction of the policy, under which he had to interpret the rights of the parties, and it is a wrong construction, and, if so, the award must be set aside.

Mr. Justice Romer.—I agree. The dispute between the parties turns upon the true construction to be put upon these words, "Warranted used only for the following purposes: commercial travelling." If it appears on the face of the award that the arbitrator has put a wrong construction upon those words, then in my opinion the award is bad in law upon the face of it, none the less that the question of construction may be doubtful and difficult. I understand from the decision of this Court in Farr v. Motor Traders' Mutual Insurance Society (36 The Times L.R., 711; [1920] 3 K.B., 669), a case which I gather was not drawn to the attention of the Divisional Court, that those words are capable of three constructions, that is to say, they must bear one of three constructions : either they are pure words of description—words of description only—or they constitute a definition of the risk, or the words amount to a warranty or promise that the motor-car will be used in a particular way only. That the solution of that question is not an easy one is apparent from the fact that Mr. Justice Salter thought that the words constituted a warranty when he came to the conclusion on the facts, on the construction of the warranty, that there had been no breach of it, and Mr. Justice MacKinnon thought that the words were description only. But the question is not an insoluble one. If it were, then I suppose the policy would be void for uncertainty. There can be, if the question is soluble, only one real answer to it, and, therefore, there can be in law only one construction of the words in question.

For the reasons that have been given by my Lords, I have come to the conclusion that the true construction of these words is that they are a description or a definition of the risk. That being so, then so far as this Court is concerned it must be taken that as a question of law that is the only construction, and that the arbitrator's award on the face of it is bad in point of law.

Lord Justice Bankes.—Our decision will be that the award is set aside with costs here and below.

KRISHNAMURTHI AYYAR v. KRISHNAMURTHI AYYAR AND ANOTHER.*

India — Hindu law — Adoption — Minor — Ancestral property of adoptive father—Rights of inheritance — Consent by natural father to infringement—Whether binding on son.

By Hindu law, where a natural father during his son's minority consents to the adoption of the son by another upon the terms of an arrangement whereby the adoptive father by his will limits the rights which the adoptive son, if he had been a natural son of the adoptive father, would have had in the ancestral property, the provisions of the adoptive father's will which limit the son's rights, even if the arrangement as a whole was beneficial to the adoptive son, are not binding upon him on his attaining his majority, if these provisions go beyond a mere postponement of the son's interest to a life interest of the testator's widow.

This was an appeal by special leave from a decree of the High Court of Madras of February 8, 1924, affirming a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Mayavaram.

Mr. De Gruyther, K.C., and Mr. K. V. L. Narasimham appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Kenworthy Brown for the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—Ramakrishna Ayyar was a Hindu gentleman in possession of ancestral lands extending to some 135 acres. He was not living joint with any relative, and he was childless. On March 23, 1910, he made a will by which he disposed of his property roughly as follows :—12 acres in charity ; 44 acres to his wife for her life ; 45 acres to the son of a distant connexion, whom he designated as being his adopted son, the appellant in the present suit, and the rest to persons who were connexions, but were in no case within the degrees entitled to maintenance, and who are the respondents in the present suit. After the death of the widow, part of the land which she held for life was to go to the appellant, and part to the respondents. On the same day the natural father of the appellant executed a deed in the following terms :—

"The deed of consent for adoption executed on the 23rd March, 1910, in favour of Ramakrishna Ayyar, son of Venkatachala Ayyar, Brahman, Saivite and Mirasidar, residing in Kunnam, Shiyali taluk by Natesa Ayyar, son of A. Ramaswami Ayyar, Brahman, Saivite and Mirasidar, residing in Kunnam village of the said taluk :—

"You have this day executed a will and have alienated your own properties. When you asked me to give you my son Krishnamurthi in adoption subject to the condition that he should take only such properties as were given him by the said will and be bound by the alienations made thereunder, I consented to it and admitted the alienations made in the said will, and, in pursuance of the arrangement that Krishnamurthi should take only such of the properties as were left to him thereunder, I have executed this deed of consent for adoption in support of my having this day given the said Krishnamurthi my son in adoption."

Immediately thereafter the adoption took place with all due ceremony.

Ramakrishna Ayyar died in April, 1911, and his wife in June, 1911. The present suit was raised in 1918 by the respondents to obtain possession of the properties left them by the will. It was directed against certain parties who were in possession and were alleged to be holding benami for the appellant and also against the appellant.

The persons who were holding as alleged eventually renounced all claim to the property. The appellant, through his guardian, alleged that the adoption had taken place before the date of the will, but it was found in fact, and is not now contested, that the will was executed unico contextu with the deed of consent by the natural father, and that both were executed in view of the adoption which took place subsequently with all due ceremony. It is also admitted that the natural father was a poor man and had two other sons at that time, and has had two subsequently. The sole question in the case is, therefore, whether the will, taken along with the deed of consent, is binding on the appellant so as to cut down what would have been his rights had he been a natural instead of an adopted son.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that the deed was binding in respect of the consent of the natural father ; he considered that an adoption, even on such terms, was obviously a beneficial arrangement for the appellant, and that the validity, as he phrases it, of such conditional adoption was settled for Madras by the cases in 12 Mad. 490 and 21 Mad. 10 and 27 Mad. 577. He accordingly decreed in favour of the respondents. His view was confirmed by the learned Judges of the High Court. They also considered that so soon as it was shown that the arrangement as a whole was beneficial to the adopted son, and that but for the arrangement the adoption would not have taken place, the natural father could give a consent which validated the arrangement as against the adopted son if, when he came to be of age, he sought not to acquiesce therein.

This is most clearly explained by one of the learned Judges :—

"I am of opinion that where an adoption is made by a Hindu who at the time of adoption had absolute power of disposal over the property, an agreement between the natural father and the adoptive father as regards alienations which the adoptive father wants to make either by a document inter vivos or by will binds the adopted son in all cases where such an agreement would be for his benefit, and that the only question which Courts ought to consider is whether the transaction is for the benefit of the boy to be adopted.

"If the adopting father would not make the adoption but for the conditions agreed to by the natural father, and if in spite of these conditions the adopted son would be benefited, there is no reason why the transaction should not be tested like any other agreement entered into by the natural father as guardian of his own son. In the present case the agreement is clearly for the benefit of the appellant, as he gets properties of large value which he would not have got but for the adoption, and there can be little doubt that he would have remained a poor man if the natural father had not agreed to the adopting father making the will and the adoption being conditional on the said disposition."

This view is really based on the case of Visalakshi Ammal v. Sivaramien (I.L.R. 27 Mad. 577), which will be presently examined. The appellant has appealed to the King in Council.

The question is a very important one of general interest. There is a very large body of authority in decided cases which touches it, but it is not concluded by any judgment of this Board. The argument for the appellant is simple enough. An adopted son, from the moment of adoption, occupies the place of a natural son. A natural son, in the case of ancestral property, becomes a co-sharer with his father, with the rights of survivorship and of partition as to the whole ancestral property. This is an incident of Hindu law arising from status. No consent by his natural father could affect that position. His power is limited to the giving or withholding of giving his son in adoption, but, if he gives, his power ends.

The present will purports to infringe the son's rights in three particulars :—(1) The gift to charity ; (2) the gift to persons outside the family ; and (3) the postponement of the son's own right in certain lands till his father's death, and in others till his mother's death.

The argument for the respondents is that, in any view, the law has by custom been relaxed, and that the general proposition which is stated in the view of the High Court is based on authoritative decision and is now the law.

As in several of the decisions to be examined there has been the suggestion that the matter has been decided by this Board, it may be well at once to mention cases where the question has been approached.

The case of Ramasawmi Aiyan v. Vencataramaiyan (L.R. 6 Ind. Ap., 196) was as follows :—There was a widow, and there was a son who had been adopted by the husband in his lifetime. During the lifetime of that son two-thirds of the ancestral property was alienated ; the son then died, and the widow, who had been given power to adopt by the deceased husband, then adopted another son. At the time of the adoption the natural father entered into an agreement that the adopted son should not challenge the alienation which had been made. When that son came of age he entered into an agreement which the Board held was a ratification of the agreement made by his natural father. The general question is dealt with at page 208 :—

"How far the natural father can by agreement before the adoption renounce all or part of his son's rights so as to bind that son when he becomes of age is also a question not altogether unattended with difficulty, although the case of Chitko Raghunath Rajadiksh v. Janaki (11 Bombay H.C.R., 199) certainly decides that an agreement on the part of the father that his son's interest shall be postponed to the life interest of the widow is valid and binding. In this case their Lordships think it enough to decide that the agreement of the natural father which has been set out was not void, but was, at the least, capable of ratification when his son became of age."

It seems impossible to hold, as some seem to have held, that this is inferentially a judgment on the general question. The whole point there was that, however the general question stood, there was an agreement which was not void in the sense of being an agreement that was funditus null, e.g., an agreement that marriage should be for a limited period, and that therefore, as there was ratification, there was no need to decide the general question.

The other case was that of Bhaiya Rabidat Singh v. Maharani Indar Kunwar (L.R. 16 Ind. Ap., 53). The facts were that a widow, with power to adopt, adopted a son and at the same time she obtained a document from the natural father consenting to her being in possession of the whole property during her lifetime. The suit was raised by the nearest relatives to declare the adoption invalid. The Board held that the adoption was duly performed and was recorded in a deed of adoption which made no mention of any condition. No other deed could, therefore, affect the adoption, but Lord Macnaghten, in the course of his judgment, said :—

"It is difficult to understand how a declaration by [the natural father], or an agreement by him, if it was an agreement, could prejudice or affect the rights of his son, which could only arise when his parental control and authority determined."

It is clear that there is here no judgment on the point, for the judgment merely declared the adoption valid and did not determine any case between the widow and son, but Lord Macnaghten's dictum shows an obvious leaning to the view that an agreement by the natural father should not prejudice the right of the adopted son. It follows, as already said, that the question is not absolutely decided by any judgment of this Board.

Their Lordships will therefore turn to the numerous decisions in India. It will be convenient to take the Madras and Bombay decisions separately. But first it will be well to point out that there are distinctions to be drawn between the various cases that arise, though whether these distinctions create any difference in principle is another question. The distinctions to be drawn are these : First, whether the agreement, which is ex hypothesi always made by the natural father, and is also ex hypothesi an agreement but for which the adoption of the son would not have taken place, is made with the adoptive father, who is the unfettered owner of the whole property (the fact in the present case), or whether it is made with the widow, who has got from her deceased husband a power of adoption, but who only herself possesses a widow's estate. Second, whether diminutions of the right of the adopted son go only to protect and define in quality the widow's estate, which ordinarily by adoption would be swept away, or whether they go farther and give part of the ancestral property to persons outside the family altogether.

It will be convenient to deal with the Bombay cases first, as they begin at the earlier date. Vinayak Narayan Jog v. Govindra Chintaman Jog (6 Bombay H.C., 224). In this case, by a will, the testator, who was a separated person, divided his property practically into two parts, and gave one to his widow absolutely and the other to his adopted son. The son was a nephew, and it was found that the whole arrangement was known to all members of the family. It was acquiesced in by the natural father of the boy. The High Court held that the provision for the adopted son was adequate and that the will could not be challenged by the adopted son. The judgment went on two grounds : First, that although an alienation of the whole estate would be bad and inconsistent with the duties cast upon an adopted son, still, if the provision was adequate, there was no reason why it should not stand. Second, that as the adopted son proposed to take what he could under the will, he could not, on the principle of approbate and reprobate, refuse to acknowledge its validity. It is to be observed that this second view scarcely does justice to the opposing argument. The son did not propose to take his half under the will ; he proposed to take the whole in right of his position as a son. There is, however, one other sentence which would seem to point to the right of the testator to make an adequate provision for the widow instead of allowing her life interest to be entirely destroyed by the adoption.

Chitko Raghunath Rajadiksh v. Janaki (11 Bombay H.C., 199). This was an adoption by a widow, subject to a stipulation that the widow should enjoy the whole property during her life, giving the boy maintenance. Held a good stipulation. Mr. Justice Haridas puts it partly on what may be called conditional adoption, a view which it is hard to agree to, and partly on approbate and reprobate. To the argument that it was a condition repugnant to Hindu law, he says that there is no text to that effect. Chief Justice Westropp, in Radhabai v. Ganesh Tatya Gholap (I.L.R. 3 Bombay, 7), obiter, takes these two cases as deciding the general point.

After this case in date comes the case before this Board in L.R. 6 Ind. Ap.

Accordingly, in Ravji Vinayakrav Jaggannath Shankarsett v. Lakshmibai (I.L.R. 11 Bombay, 381), it was sought to urge that this Board's decision had overturned the authority of the former cases, because their Lordships held that the general question was still open. The facts were practically the same as in the first case—i.e., adoption by a widow and a contemporaneous agreement with the natural father that the widow should have full enjoyment for her life. There is a long and very careful judgment by Mr. Justice Farran. It is too long to quote in full, but may be summarized thus :—The early Bombay Shastris or Pundits were logical in holding the strict view. But custom and practice may modify the strict view. The possibility of such an agreement is in no way negatived by a direct text. Fair arrangements for protection of the widow's interests are commonly made and supported. He then prays in aid the judgment of this Board in L.R. 6 Ind. Ap., but here their Lordships think he is somewhat misled as to the sense in which the word "void" was used. Then, after saying that it is the general law that the guardian of an infant can bind the infant when the contract is made bona fide for his interest, he sums up the matter thus :—

"I cannot but think that this principle ought to guide the Court in considering whether agreements like the one under consideration can be upheld or not. If the stipulations are unreasonable, such as giving to the widow an absolute power of disposition over the property, they should be rejected as ultra vires of the father ; if reasonable, such as only to define and limit the son's enjoyment of the property, they should be upheld. The reasoning in the judgment of the Court in the Chitko case (supra) goes far beyond this view, but the actual decision upon the facts is in accord with it."

Basava v. Lingangauda (I.L.R. 19 Bombay, 428). This was a case where the man who adopted a son conveyed by a deed of gift, which was referred to in the deed of adoption, part of the ancestral property to his daughters, and the natural father was a party to the deed of adoption. Held that the deed of gift was good and binding on the adopted son. The case is taken as plain, and not argued.

The next case is Vyasacharya v. Venkubai (I.L.R. 37 Bombay, 251). The facts were : Adoption by a widow and a gift of part of the property to her own daughters. Assented to by the natural father at the time of the adoption. Justices Beaman and Heaton referred to a Full Bench the general question : "Whether the terms of an agreement entered into between the natural and adoptive parent as conditions of the adoption are binding upon and can be enforced against the adopted son ?" but they added that, if that question was too wide, it ought to be considered in the light of the facts of the case. This was the view taken by the Full Bench, Chief Justice Scott and Justices Chandravarkar, Batchelor, and Rao. They held that "an agreement by which the adopting widow is to be allowed to retain her life estate, notwithstanding the adoption, differs in fact and in principle from an agreement under which a power is conferred on her which, as a widow enjoying the life estate, she could by no other means obtain." On the facts, therefore, they held the agreement not binding, holding, first, that the condition was unreasonable, taking the test proposed by Mr. Justice Farran, and, second, that it was covered by a case of Venkappa v. Fakirgowda, only reported in 8 Bombay L.R., 346, where a widow was given power to give the property to her own brother, and the condition was held to be bad.

Then came the case of Balkrishna Motiram Gujar v. Shri Uttar Narayan Dev (I.L.R. 43 Bombay, 542). This was a gift of an annual sum as a charge on the ancestral property for a charity, made by the adopting father and agreed to by the natural father at the time of the adoption. The gift was held bad. Mr. Justice Hayward, delivering the judgment, examined the cases and sums up thus :—

"It would appear to have been established by these decisions that agreements for reasonable provision for widows ought to be upheld as valid according to general custom modifying the strict terms of Hindu law. But no authorities have been quoted before us in favour of any other persons in such connexion or in support of a general extension of the modification so as to include, as here claimed, reservations in favour of charities and religious endowments."

To sum up the Bombay cases. As a question of actual decision, the Courts have always upheld the grant to the widow of her interest for life, and that whether the stipulation had been made by the husband while still alive, or by herself, it being always the case that the agreement was anterior to or contemporaneous with the adoption itself, and that the natural father concurred. But when the gift is to outsiders it has been held invalid, and that whether made by the widow or by the adopting father himself. The reasons given have varied. Some have put the deviation from strict principle on custom, some on the view of approbate and reprobate, and in one case upon the view that the father as guardian can bind an infant by any contract which is for his benefit.

To turn now to Madras.

Lakshmana Rau v. Lakshmi Ammal (I.L.R. 4 Mad., 160). There is at page 163 a general remark by Chief Justice Turner against the validity of conditions imposed by agreement with the natural father, but the remark is based on an erroneous view of the judgment of this Board in L.R. 6 Ind. Ap., and is really of no authority. The case itself turns on a speciality.

Lakshmi v. Subramanya (I.L.R. 12 Mad., 490). This was a case where the adoptive father stipulated that certain lands should be enjoyed by the widow for life. This was agreed to by the natural father. It was held binding. The reasons given by the learned Judges were dissimilar. Mr. Justice Muthusami Ayya held that this was just an arrangement for fixing maintenance. Mr. Justice Shephard held that the father, being at the moment undisputed owner of the property, could do what he liked with it, and that the effect of what he did was really to withdraw that portion of the ancestral property. He repudiated the idea of reasonableness being a test.

Narayanasami v. Ramasami (I.L.R. 14 Mad., 172). This was precisely the same case as the last and the same Judge, Mr. Justice Shephard, followed the last case, the other Judge simply following the decision and not going into the reasons.

Jagannadha v. Papamma (I.L.R. 16 Mad., 400). This was a case of adoption by a widow. The agreement was that the widow was to have half the property. Chief Justice Collins and Mr. Justice Handley held the agreement not binding. They rested on Lord Macnaghten's dictum in L.R. 16 Ap. and distinguished this from the case in 12 Mad. in their own Court, by which they were bound, on two grounds, that in that case the arrangement was by the father himself, whereas here it was by the widow.

Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (I.L.R. 21 Mad., 10). This was a disposition in charity by the adoptive father, who at the same time gave his widow power to adopt. She adopted ; the natural father acquiesced. Held binding. Mr. Justice Shephard held that it had been settled by 12 and 14 Madras. Mr. Justice Subramania Ayyar agreed.

Visalakshi Ammal v. Sivaramien (I.L.R. 27 Mad., 577). Adoption by a widow. Agreement come to by natural father that, in the event of disagreement between widow and adopted son, widow should enjoy half the property until her death. Referred to Full Bench. The order of reference drawn by Mr. Justice Subramania Ayyar contains a weighty argument in favour of what may be called the strict view. He argues :—

1. There is no reason against an adoptive father doing anything in a question with an adopted son which he could have done with a natural son.

2. If the adoption by a widow takes place after the death of the adoptive father, all the provisions of the adoptive father's will stand, because the will speaks at his death and takes out of the property whatever is dealt with before the adoption takes place.

3. But further than that the arrangement cannot go, because it is allowing the adoptive father, or the widow, to do something which is incompatible with the proper position of an adopted son.

4. It is just as impossible for the natural father to do, on behalf of the son to be adopted, anything as regards what is to happen after the adoption as it is for the adoptive father to have acted as to his rights before adoption.

5. Approbate and reprobate cannot apply, for that implies election, and there is no election open to the adopted son. If, on the contrary, it is looked on as a condition, this condition is repugnant and must be disregarded.

The result must be to hold the present case not binding.

But, before the Full Bench, Justices Benson, Davies, and Russell all concurred in thinking that L.R. 6 Ind. Ap. indicated that the natural father was not incapable of giving a consent. If that is the position, the only question that remains is, Is it fair and reasonable ?—that is to say, Is it for the minor's benefit ? Then take Mr. Justice Farran's test as to the power of the father. They point out that there is no authoritative text forbidding such an arrangement. They consider a fair and reasonable disposition not inconsistent with Hindu law, and therefore they upheld the arrangement.

To sum up the Madras cases. As regards decision, the general result has been to validate the arrangements so far as provision is made for the widow, just as in Bombay, but one case, Jagannadha v. Papamma (supra), is the other way, and the referring judgment of Mr. Justice Subramania Ayyar is also of that way of thinking. As regards reasons, again they vary, some going on the power of the adoptive father to do what he likes, some on fair and reasonable arrangements, and some on approbate and reprobate.

It will be apparent from this examination that it is not possible to reconcile all the decisions, and still less the reasons on which they have been based. Their Lordships will, therefore, examine the matter on principle. When a disposition is made intra vivos by one who has full power over property under which a portion of that property is carried away, it is clear that no rights of a son who is subsequently adopted can affect that portion which is disposed of. The same is true when the disposition is by will and the adoption is subsequently made by a widow who has been given power to adopt. For the will speaks as at the death of the testator, and the property is carried away before the adoption takes place. It is also obvious that the consent or non-consent of the natural father cannot in such cases affect the question. But it is quite different when the adoption is antecedent to the date at which the disposition is meant to take effect. The rights which flow from adoption are immediate, and the disposition, if given effect to, is inconsistent with these rights and cannot of itself vi propria affect them. There are two propositions so well settled that no authority need be cited. They are, first, that the natural father loses all power over the son from the moment when he is adopted, and, second, that the adopted son has in his new family precisely the same rights as a natural son, save only when the question is one that raises a competition between the natural and the adopted son. Can, then, the consent of the natural father who judges, and, ex hypothesi, rightly judges, that it is more expedient for the boy to be adopted, even though his rights are limited, than not to be adopted at all, make any difference? The doubt expressed by Lord Macnaghten in L.R. 16 Ind. Ap. seems unanswerable. How can the consent of the natural father take any effect on the rights of the boy which only arise when his rights as a natural father are non-existent? But if the father cannot do it by virtue of any power in himself, can he do it as guardian of the infant so as to bind him? Mr. Justice Farran, who is an exponent of this view in the case in I.L.R. 11 Bombay, 381, was curiously misled by an undue veneration for Mr. Mayne. He quotes a sentence from Mr. Mayne's work on Hindu Law as follows:—

"He (the minor) will be bound by the act of his guardian when bona fide and for his interest and when it is such as the infant might reasonably and prudently have done for himself if he had been of full age."

This quotation is from the third edition of Mayne's work, and as a universal proposition is obviously unsound. Accordingly, in the fourth edition, which was published soon after the date of the judgment in question, and in all subsequent editions, Mr. Mayne inserted between the words "guardian" and "when bona fide" the words "in the management of the estate," which turns an inaccurate proposition into an accurate one. But it is no longer of service to Mr. Justice Farran in the matter in hand, for assuredly the natural father is not managing the estate of his child when the estate referred to is the estate which he will only get after adoption by another person. Therefore, reverting again to Lord Macnaghten's dictum, it seems impossible to ascribe any value to the guardianship power of the natural father to bind the son as to property in which he cannot have an interest until the time when the guardianship has ceased.

Next, can the case be solved by the doctrine of approbate and reprobate? Their Lordships think clearly not, for the doctrine of approbate and reprobate assumes election, and the adopted son has no election. He cannot undo the adoption and be as he was. The same fact destroys the idea of conditional adoption. The adoption cannot be undone; it cannot, therefore, be conditional.

It will be seen from these views that in their Lordships' opinion the only ground on which such arrangement can be sanctioned is custom. They are of opinion that there is such a consensus of decision in the cases, with the exception of the case of Jagannadha v. Papamma (supra), that they are fairly entitled to come to the conclusion that custom has sanctioned such arrangements in so far as they regulate the right of the widow as against the adopted son. It seems part of the custom that one sine qua non of such an arrangement should be the consent of the natural father. But if this is looked at narrowly, it is only because it is a part of the custom that it is either here or there. This leads to the remark that there is a good deal of looseness in the discussions in the judgments as to reasonableness. Some look at it from the point of view whether, in view of the adoption only being granted on condition of the arrangement, this is, in the circumstances, reasonable for the boy. It would seem that it might well be assumed that, if a natural father consented to give his son in adoption, he would only do it if it were reasonable, i.e., for the boy's benefit in the circumstances. Others look at it from the point of view whether the adoption will put the boy in a reasonable position, i.e., not subject him to the duties of a son to do worship for his adoptive father without giving him sufficient advantages to enable him to do so. But the consensus of judgments seems to solve these two questions in this way, namely, that the consent of the natural father shows that it is for the advantage of the boy, and that the mere postponement of his interest to the widow's interest, even though it should be one extending to a life interest in the whole property, is not incompatible with his position as a son. Their Lordships are, therefore, prepared to hold that custom sanctions such arrangements.

As soon, however, as the arrangements go beyond that, i.e., either give the widow property absolutely or give the property to strangers, they think no custom as to this has been proved to exist and that such arrangements are against the radical view of the Hindu law. Their Lordships are, therefore, against the idea of a general proposition that all arrangements consented to by a natural father, and of benefit to the boy in the sense that, half a loaf being better than no bread, he is better with an adoption with truncated rights than with no adoption at all, are valid. They would further say that the remark made by some learned Judges that there is no text prohibiting such arrangements seems to them to go exactly to the opposite effect. Inasmuch as what is sought to be done is admittedly contrary to the strict and natural view of the Hindu law as to the true position of the adopted son in his new family, it would seem more to the point to say that there is no text which sanctions any contrary arrangement.

Applying these views to the present case, it follows that their Lordships consider that the will here can have no effect, and that the appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed. The appellant must have his costs before this Board and in the Courts below.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)

1927. Mar. 25.

BUSBY v. AVGHERINO.*

Tithes—City of London—Rate prescribed by statute—Exemption from prescribed rate—Premises for which less paid before Act—Onus of proof—37 Henry VIII., c. 12.

By the Act 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and a decree made pursuant to it and having the force of a statute, the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments (with certain immaterial exceptions), situated in the City of London, are liable to pay a tithe of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year . . . by the rate aforesaid." The decree contained a proviso that in the case of premises in respect of which less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes before 1545, the date of the Act, the premises should be exempted from the prescribed rate. In an action by the owners of tithes against the occupiers of premises in the City for tithe at the rate prescribed by the statute,

Held, that the onus was on the defendants to prove that the tithe paid before 1545 in respect of the premises was less than the sum prescribed by the statute, but that they had discharged that onus, and the action failed.

Appeal from decision of Tomlin, J. (43 The Times L.R., 91) allowed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin (43 The Times L.R., 91).

The plaintiffs in the action were the executors of the will of Mary Busby, who died on December 7, 1918, and, as such, they were the owners of all the rectorial or freehold tithes issuing out of or payable for or in respect of such parts of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, as were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The defendants had for various periods since March 25, 1921, held and occupied portions of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, all of which were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The tithes were payable under and by virtue of the statute 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, "An Act for tithes in London," and a decree made thereunder. By that decree the tithes were to be computed at the rate of 2s. 9d. upon every 20s., and at 1s. 4½d. upon every 10s. of the rent of the premises in respect of which the tithes were payable, but by clause 18 of the decree it was stated that, where less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes, those tithes should only be paid at the accustomed rate.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover as from March 25, 1921, tithes at the rate of 2s. 9d. for every 20s., or 1s. 4½d. for every 10s. of rent. The defendants alleged that the sum of 4s. 9d. a quarter, or 19s. per annum, was accustomed to be paid for tithes in respect of No. 15, Great St. Helen's at and before the date of the decree, and they admitted liability to that extent only and paid into Court the sum of £3 6s. 6d. to answer the tithes at that rate from March 25, 1921, to the commencement of the action.

Mr. Justice Tomlin held that the amount of tithe payable had been in doubt over a long period, arrangements having been made from time to time between the tithe owner and tithe payer; and that it was not possible to infer that, during periods when there was no evidence of payment, 19s. per annum was paid rather than some other sums, and still less possible to infer that the 19s. represented some sums, or apportioned parts of other sums aggregating 19s., which were themselves certain sums of less than 2s. 9d. in the pound accustomed to be paid in 1545.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Preston, K.C., and Mr. Lionel L. Cohen appeared for the appellants; Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. C. A. Collingwood for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of a considered judgment, said that the question to be determined was whether the defendants had proved that there was a customary payment of 19s. per annum within the meaning of the statute 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, so as to afford them the protection of the exemption under clause 18 of the decree.

It was clear that the onus of proof of the custom lay upon the appellants, who were the defendants in the action, and it was so held by Lord Eldon, Lord Chancellor, in Warden and Minor Canons of St. Paul's v. Kettle (2 V. and B. 1). If they failed to discharge it they were liable for the full 2s. 9d. in the pound.

It was necessary to examine the Act of 1545 carefully. It was passed for the purpose of putting an end to the controversies and quarrels which had been frequent between the "parsons, vicars, and curates" in the City of London and its citizens and inhabitants, and which an Act passed in 1535 had failed to appease. By the terms of the Act of 1545 the decree to be made by Archbishop Cranmer and six of the Privy Councillors and Judges named was to have the force of an Act of Parliament. The state and division of the properties was stabilized as it had been eight years before the decree. Clause 18 was as follows:—

"Provided also and it is decreed. That where less sum than after sixteen pence half-penny in the ten shillings rent, or less sum than two shillings ninepence in the twenty shillings rent hath been accustomed to be paid for tithes, then in such places the said citizens and inhabitants shall pay but only after such rate as hath been accustomed."

The presence of that proviso for exemption in the decree made it plain that it was contemplated that there were cases to which it would apply. Indeed, it was stated in Bennet v. Tespass (2 Gwillim's Tithe Cases, 633) that less sums than at the standard rate of 2s. 9d. in the pound had been paid by almost every parishioner to the parson, "and therewith they (the parsons) have been content." The Court in that case further held that, if there had been an agreement to pay tithes for eight years past before 1545 on a particular scale, such payments were to be treated as "accustomed" payments within the statute. From that it seemed that proof of an accustomed payment was not a matter of extreme difficulty.

There was in this case no evidence as to what was paid before or near the time when the Act was passed. The first record was an entry in an old parish account-book, dated 1632. On folio 124 there was a list of parishioners "who have paide five years Tythe beforehand beginning at Christmas Anno 1632," and among them was Thomas Jeninges, who paid tithe at the rate of 35s. a year—total £8 15s.—in respect of his house in Great St. Helens. In 1654 it appeared from an entry in the same book that Thomas Jeninges was paying 35s. a year. The entry was made from an exhibit in proceedings by Sir John Langham, the then owner of the tithes, against the parishioners of Great St. Helen's to compel them to set forth and discover the true rents of their houses, shops, &c.

A settlement of the proceedings was reached in 1662 upon the required information being forthcoming from each of the defendants. The tenement in respect of which this 35s. a year was paid was one of five houses which had subsequently been altered into six houses. It was accepted that upon that division being made the quota payable by Henry Durley, the successor of Jeninges and the undisputed predecessor of the defendants, was 19s.,—part of the 35s. The entry in the parish book brought the evidence of payment of the 19s. down to 1705.

There was proof from a record or table made in 1714 for the general use of the parish that the customary payment for the house was 4s. 9d. a quarter or 19s. per annum, and this record was treated as authoritative in 1795, when 100 copies of the original were printed by order of the vestry. The quarterly payment was then misprinted as 4s., which explained the discrepancy between the 19s. and the 16s. said to be payable at that time, but in 1822 the true figure of 19s. once more reappeared.

It was unnecessary to consider in detail the evidence submitted as to the period subsequent to 1822, because there was relevant evidence of great weight over a long period of years before that date. The question was whether there was a customary payment in 1545, so as to bring the defendants within the protection of clause 18 of the decree.

There was, in his opinion, convincing proof that for 190 years, from 1632 to 1822, tithe was paid on the basis of a customary payment, and not on the basis of the rack rent. The right inference was that the customary payment had a true legal origin (per Lord Chief Baron Pollock in Gibson v. Doeg, 2 H. and N., 615). Such payment was made "as of right and not in wrong."

The Court was asked to accept the evidence of land tax assessments as incidentally proving the rental value of the premises out of which the tax was payable. As at present advised he (the Master of the Rolls) could not accept them as evidence of rental value. Such evidence, however, was not required.

He agreed with Mr. Justice Tomlin that there was no satisfactory evidence of the rental of No. 15, Great St. Helen's during those centuries, but he differed from him on the point that there was nothing against which to measure the rate of the annual payments actually proved and so test the nature of the payments made. If there were no customary payment, or none which answered the test, the full amount of 2s. 9d. in the pound was payable. There was no evidence that a demand for 2s. 9d. in the pound had ever been made successfully, but there was evidence of a customary payment of less amount over a period of 190 years.

The basis of the settlement and the decree of the Court of Exchequer in 1662, made by consent of all parties, was that the customary payment was less than what was due and payable by the decree of 1545 and satisfied clause 18 of that decree.

There was evidence, therefore, which afforded exemption to the defendants from the payment of 2s. 9d. in the pound and a defence to the plaintiffs' claim. The appeal must be allowed, and the order of Mr. Justice Tomlin must be discharged and the action dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he agreed with Mr. Justice Tomlin that the onus was cast on the defendants of establishing that in the year 1545 there was a customary payment for tithe in respect of their premises No. 15, Great St. Helens, of a certain sum less than 2s. 9d. in the pound, and that, unless they discharged that onus, the plaintiffs must succeed. It was admitted there was no direct evidence of any customary sum having been paid in that or any preceding years, but the defendants alleged there was evidence that during a series of subsequent periods between 1632 and 1822, payments for tithe had been made of a small invariable amount, and that such payments were consistent only with the premises having been liable only to a customary payment of less than 2s. 9d. in the pound. A question was raised at the hearing as to the admissibility of the parish tithe books as evidence to show the amounts paid for tithes and the premises in respect of which they were paid. But the learned Judge held they were admissible, and it was conceded in that Court that they were admissible.

His Lordship then referred to the evidence from the payment by Thomas Jeninges in 1632 down to the year 1822, the reduction to 4s. a quarter between 1796 and 1807 being explained by a printer's error. Down to that point the evidence was overwhelmingly in favour of the defendants, who had established a series of constant payments, consistent only with the supposition that the property was within the proviso in the 18th section of the decree made under the Act of Henry VIII. The facts were considerably stronger in favour of the defendants than they were in the somewhat similar case of Foster v. Plumbers' Company (44 S.J., 211). The inference from the subsequent constant payments was that in the year 1545 both conditions of the proviso were satisfied, and not only was there a customary payment in respect of the property which included No. 15, but also that the customary payment was less than 2s. 9d. in the pound.

As to the payments from the year 1822 onwards, to which the learned Judge attached considerable weight, he (his Lordship), with respect to the Judge, was unable to take the same view, and considered that no real importance was to be attached to them. The larger payments made from 1871 to 1918 were not payments by occupier to tithe-owner, but payments made by way of interest on the sum expended by the tithe-owners in the purchase of the tithe on No. 15 and another house No. 10, Great St. Helens, which appeared to have been made without any such investigation as had now taken place of the history of the matter. He agreed that the appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Lord Justice Lawrence's judgment (read by Lord Justice Sargant) was to the same effect and reviewed the evidence from the year 1632 down to the present time. He thought that Mr. Justice Tomlin had attached too much weight to the fluctuations in the amounts paid for tithe from time to time and had not taken sufficient account of the reasons which led to those fluctuations. In his (his Lordship's) opinion the alterations in the amounts paid had been satisfactorily explained. The payment of £2 between 1834 and 1871 was apparently the result of a compromise agreement between the tithe-owners and the then occupying tenant named Chapman. Probably the tithe-owner made a claim to 2s. 9d. in the pound, which was resisted by the tenant who, however, was unwilling to embark on what might prove to be heavy and costly litigation, and therefore agreed to pay £2 rather than go to law. What really happened in 1871 was left in doubt, but the payment made to the tithe-owners after that date could not help to solve the problem as to whether there was a customary payment for tithes in 1545.

The result of the evidence was that for nearly two centuries a fixed sum of 19s. per annum was paid for tithes by the occupiers of what was now No. 15, Great St. Helens. That fact took the defendant's case out of the region of conjecture, and led irresistibly to the inference that the 19s. was a customary payment within the meaning of the proviso in section 18 of the decree made under the statute of Henry VIII. For those reasons he thought the appeal ought to be allowed with costs, and the action dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1927. Mar. 10.

JEBARA v. OTTOMAN BANK.*

Sale of Goods—Goods sold to Turkish customers—Contracts still executory at outbreak of war—Delivery of goods to customers after outbreak of war—Payment received in piastres by seller's agents—Claim by seller against his agents for sterling—Agency of necessity—

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Conversion—Damages—Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, Art. 84—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Act, 1924 (14 Geo. V., c. 7)—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Order, 1924.

The defendant bank, a Turkish subject, was at the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey holder of sight bills drawn in sterling for the purchase price of goods consigned by the plaintiff from Manchester to his customers in Beyrout which had arrived in Beyrout before the outbreak of war and were subsequently delivered to the purchasers against payment to the bank in piastres. At the conclusion of the war the defendant bank claimed to be entitled to pay to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which represented the then value of the piastres which they had received in payment for the goods. The plaintiff, on the other hand, claimed to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills at sight. Alternatively he claimed damages for conversion.

Held, (1) that the effect of the outbreak of war was to dissolve both the mandate to deliver the goods which were in the custody of the defendant's branch at Beyrout to the plaintiff's customers in Turkey and to collect the face value of the sight bills; (2) that under the conditions in which they found themselves the Beyrout branch had not become agents of necessity; and (3) that as that branch had taken for a former principal's goods moneys which they had no right either to demand or to receive the defendant bank was liable to the plaintiff for damages for conversion.

This was an appeal by the defendant bank from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in an action brought against them by the plaintiff, a British subject, who carried on business in Manchester. For many years he had been in the habit of purchasing Manchester goods and consigning them to customers in Turkey. His practice was to draw a bill at sight for the amount in sterling representing the cost of the goods, plus his commission, and to hand the bill, with the bills of lading and invoices attached, to the Manchester branch of the defendant bank, which made him an advance on the goods and then sent the documents to their branch in Turkey, which collected the price from the customer in exchange for the goods. When the Manchester branch received advice that the price had been paid, they drew a cheque in favour of the plaintiff for the amount indicated on the face of the bill in sterling as being the price of the goods. At the date of the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey on November 5, 1914, the defendant bank held a number of bills at sight and the documents representing goods which had been entrusted by the plaintiff to the bank, and which had arrived at Beyrout before the outbreak of war, but had not been delivered to the customers. The bills were drawn in this form: "Please pay to our order value cheque on London the sum of £ . . . sterling, shipping documents attached to be given up upon payment." After the outbreak of war the Beyrout branch delivered the goods from their warehouses to the customers, taking payment in piastres. At the conclusion of the war the defendant bank claimed the right to pay to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which at the then current rate of exchange represented the value of the piastres which they had received in payment for the goods. Owing to the depreciation in the Turkish currency this represented a serious loss to the plaintiff, and he instituted the present action claiming to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills. Alternatively he claimed damages for the conversion of the goods. Mr. Justice Rowlatt gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sterling value of the bills.

The defendant bank appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., and Mr. D. B. Somervell appeared for the appellants; Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Cassie Holden for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal by the bank from a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in favour of the plaintiff for a sum of £4,366 10s. 5d.

The plaintiff carries on business in Manchester. For many years he has been in the habit of purchasing Manchester goods and consigning them to customers in Turkey. There was no evidence indicating what the exact relations between himself and his Turkish customers were, and it is not possible to say whether as between himself and them he was a mere agent with a lien on the goods for his outlay, or whether he was a purchaser re-selling the goods to them. It was proved that he paid for the goods, and the course of business as between himself and the bank was that he drew a bill at sight for the amount in sterling representing the cost of the goods, plus his commission. He then entrusted the bill, with the bills of lading and invoices attached, to the Manchester branch of the defendant bank, which made the plaintiff an advance on the goods and then sent the documents to their branch in Turkey, which collected the price from the customer in exchange for the goods. The bank in Manchester having received from their Turkish branch advice that the price had been paid, and that they had been credited in account by their Turkish branch for the full face value of the bill, drew their cheque in favour of the plaintiff for the amount indicated on the face of the bill in sterling as being the price of the goods. The way in which the branch of the bank in Turkey carried through their part of the business was to calculate the number of piastres necessary to make up the sterling price of the goods, and to demand and receive from the customer that number of piastres when he took delivery of the goods. So long as the business followed its usual course the risk of exchange, such as it was, fell upon the bank, and what the plaintiff expected to receive, and did receive, was the cheque of the Manchester branch of the defendant bank for the full amount in sterling appearing upon the face of the sight bill. It was the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey which caused the trouble. War was declared on November 5, 1914. At that date the bank held a number of bills at sight and the documents representing a quantity of goods entrusted by the plaintiff to the bank over the first seven months of that year. These goods had arrived at Beyrout before the outbreak of war and had not been delivered to the customers, but were in the warehouses of the branch at Beyrout ready for delivery. What the branch at Beyrout did with the goods was to deliver them to the customers as and when they demanded delivery, taking payment in piastres, either gold or paper, whichever was legal tender at the time. The rate of exchange adopted in order to arrive at the number of piastres payable by the customer was necessarily a purely arbitrary one. At the conclusion of the war the bank claimed the right to pay over to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which at the then current rate of exchange represented the value of the gold and paper piastres which they had received in payment for the goods. Owing to the depreciation in the Turkish currency this represented a serious loss to the plaintiff, and he commenced this action claiming to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills at sight which he had entrusted to the bank under the circumstances hereinbefore mentioned. His claim was formulated as a claim for a liquidated amount, or, alternatively, as a claim for damages for conversion.

In the Court below the arguments appear to have proceeded mainly upon the first head of claim, and the case presented was founded upon the peculiar form in which the bills at sight were drawn, namely : "Please pay to our order value cheque on London the sum of £ sterling, shipping documents attached to be given up upon payment."

An elaborate argument was addressed to this Court, and doubtless to the Court below, as to the meaning to be given to the words "value cheque on London," and as to the obligations attaching to the person presenting such a bill. It was urged that nothing short of the receipt of a cheque on London in exchange for the goods or the shipping documents would discharge that obligation. The cheque, it was said, might be that of the customer himself, or of someone having an account in London whose cheque the customer could procure, or the cheque of the branch of the defendant bank purchased by the customer for the purpose. It is not necessary, in my opinion, to decide what in strictness the obligation is ; but having regard to the long course of business between the plaintiff and the bank, in which the only cheque ever tendered to the plaintiff was the cheque of the Manchester branch, I question very much whether the plaintiff would have been satisfied with the cheque of anyone else.

The argument for the plaintiff then proceeded to suggest that the course of business between the Beyrout branch and the plaintiff's customers amounted in substance, though perhaps not in form, to a purchase by the customer from the Beyrout branch of a cheque on London ; and that as the bank had thus received a cheque on London they must account for it at its face value. I cannot draw the suggested inference from the facts. There is nothing, in my opinion, which warrants a conclusion that the dealings between the Beyrout branch and the plaintiff's customers were anything other than what, on the face of them, they appear to be, namely, a release of the goods by the Beyrout branch to the customers on payment by them to the branch of the amount of piastres which the bank demanded as the price of the goods.

Much reliance was placed by the respondent's counsel on the fact that in accordance with pre-war practice the Beyrout branch after receipt of the customers' piastres credited the Manchester branch in their books in currency with the face value of the sight bills. I fail to see the importance of this fact. It was a matter of internal arrangement between the two branches of the bank. In normal times, when communicated by the Beyrout branch to the Manchester branch it was an intimation by Beyrout to Manchester that Manchester could send their cheque to the plaintiff for the face value of the sight bills. The plaintiff knew nothing of the course of business between the two branches. In war time, when the one branch could not communicate with the other, the entries in the books of the Beyrout branch are, in my opinion, for the purposes of this case, of no value whatever. Had the result of this appeal depended upon whether I agreed with the reasons for his judgment given by the learned Judge, I should have felt bound to allow the appeal. There is, however, one aspect of the case which does not seem to have impressed the learned Judge, but which appears to me to be decisive, and that is the effect of the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey upon the contractual relations between the plaintiff and his customers in Turkey, and between the plaintiff and the Ottoman Bank. The contracts in each case were executory. As between the plaintiff and his customers the goods were undelivered, and unpaid for. As between the plaintiff and the bank the goods were in the custody of the bank at Beyrout, and the mandate to deliver them to the plaintiff's customers in Turkey and to collect the face value of the sight bills was unperformed. Under these circumstances I cannot doubt that the effect of the outbreak of war upon both sets of contracts was to dissolve them. From that moment the plaintiff's customers ceased to have any right to demand delivery of the goods, and the Beyrout branch could no longer claim to act under the mandate. What is the result of this state of things in the events which happened ? Simply this, that unless the bank can justify the action of their Beyrout branch in parting with the goods on some ground other than that they were acting upon a mandate which had ceased to exist, the bank have, by the action of their Beyrout branch, been guilty of a conversion of the plaintiff's goods for which they must be held liable in damages.

A case was made upon the pleadings, and was apparently relied upon in the Court below, as it was in this Court, that the Beyrout branch became under the conditions in which they found themselves agents of necessity, and that what they did in reference to the goods was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable.

It does not seem necessary to discuss the somewhat difficult question what circumstances create an agency of necessity. The matter was considered by Mr. Justice Greer in 1923 in his judgment in Ananiadi v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (unreported), to which reference has been made. It was considered also by Mr. Justice McCardie in Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp and Heacock, Limited (40 The Times L.R., 287 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 566).

I am content to dispose of this part of the bank's case on one or both of two grounds. In the first place, the Beyrout branch never purported to act as agents of necessity. The branch treated the bills at sight as representing subsisting contracts. They received payment of them. They parted with the goods to the plaintiff's customers because, apparently, they considered that they were entitled to them. The question whether they could do better by keeping the goods or whether they could get a better price for them does not appear to have been considered by the bank officials at the time when the goods were handed over or at any other time. In the second place, I think that the evidence given at the trial wholly fails to establish the alleged necessity.

There remains yet one question to be considered to which the appellants attached great importance, and that is as to the construction and effect of Article 84 of the Treaty of Peace with Turkey, which is in these terms : "The high contracting parties are in agreement in recognizing that debts which were payable before the war, or which became payable during the war under contracts entered into before the war, and which remain unpaid owing to the war, must be settled and paid in accordance with the provisions of the contracts, in the currency agreed upon, at the rate current in its country of origin. Without prejudice to the provisions of the annexe to section II. of this part, it is agreed that where payments to be made under a pre-war contract are represented by sums collected during the war in whole or in part in a currency other than that mentioned in the said contract, such payments can be made by handing over the sums actually collected in the currency in which they were collected. This provision shall not affect settlements inconsistent with the foregoing provisions arrived at by voluntary agreement between the parties before the coming into force of the present Treaty." Whatever the framers of that article may have intended to cover by the second clause, I do not consider that the language is comprehensive enough to cover a case like the present, where the Turkish subject has, without either contractual obligation or right, parted with the English subject's goods in exchange for a sum in piastres which the Turkish subject expressed himself willing to take for them. The clause would no doubt apply in the case of a sterling contract where a Turkish subject, acting as agent for a British subject, had parted with the latter's goods in Turkey on an agreed and authorized credit, and the period of credit had not expired at the outbreak of war. In such a case the Turkish subject could claim that he could only collect the contract price as and when he did.

In my opinion, it does not lie in the mouth of a Turkish subject who converts the British subject's goods and receives money for them to speak of collecting that money. "Collecting" appears to me to be an appropriate expression to use of an agent who is acting under a mandate, but wholly inappropriate where the agent takes moneys for a former principal's goods which he has no right either to demand or to receive.

For these reasons the appeal, in my opinion, fails. As the plaintiff's remedy in the view which I take sounds in damages, if the parties are not prepared to agree the amount for which the judgment shall be entered, judgment must be entered for the plaintiff, with costs, for damages to be assessed by an official referee unless the parties agree on a special referee. The respondent must have the costs of the appeal, and the costs of any inquiry as to damages will be in the discretion of the person taking the inquiry.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal raises questions of some difficulty as to the effects of war on a valid pre-war contract, questions not made easier by the scarcity of information on some questions of fact.

Mr. Jebara, a British subject resident in Manchester, was in the habit of procuring, to use a neutral word, Manchester goods for certain Turkish firms residing in Beyrout, then part of the Turkish Empire. There is no evidence to show whether he bought the goods so that the property passed to him, or whether the property passed at once to the Turkish firms. He certainly paid for the goods to the Manchester merchants; drew at sight for the price on the Turkish merchants; attached to the bill, the bills of lading for the goods—as to which we are not told who were described as shippers, or what endorsements were on them; and financed himself by obtaining an advance on the documentary bill from the Imperial Ottoman Bank, whose headquarters were in Turkey, through its branch in Manchester. The Manchester branch would then forward the bill to their Beyrout branch, who would surrender the documents against payment by the Beyrout merchants. It is not clear whether Jebara bought so that the property passed to him, and passed the property to the Beyrout merchants against payment, or whether he secured himself for his commission and advances by exercising a lien on the documents and the goods represented by them for his advances. The bank certainly had a lien on the documents and goods for their advances.

The action is by Jebara against the Ottoman Bank, amongst other things, for wrongful dealing after the war broke out between England and Turkey on November 5, 1914, with goods and bills which they received before the war.

The first question is, what was the original obligation of the Ottoman Bank to Jebara in respect of the bills which they undertook to collect for him. The bills are in an unusual home-made form, though they had been used in a course of business for some time. The bank paid so little attention to the wording that during nearly the whole of the action they were under the impression that the wording was quite different from the reality. The material words were "Please pay to our order value cheque on London the sum of" (say) "£160 sterling. Shipping documents attached to be given up upon payment to Candour Frères, Beyrout." What always happened in Manchester was that the Manchester bank having collected gave Jebara, who did not bank with them, a cheque in sterling for the amount of the bill less advances and commission. He had nothing to do with the exchange, and did not suffer from the risks; his cheque was in sterling, derived from the sterling amount of the bill. What happened in Beyrout was that the Beyrout branch of the bank received from the consignee Turkish money in coin, enough at the rate of exchange of the day to provide the necessary amount in sterling in London. Whether the legal effect of this was that the consignee bought, from the bank, exchange on London, representing a cheque on London in sterling, which he then gave to the bank in order to get the goods, or whether it was that the bank on account of Jebara was receiving piastres enough to produce the necessary cheque on London, it is not necessary to determine. I am satisfied from the course of business that the odd words on the bill were interpreted by the parties to mean that Jebara was to receive a cheque in sterling based on the sterling amount of the bill, and that he took no risk of exchange. It was the bank's business not to part with the documents unless they were prepared to pay such a sterling cheque; they took the risk of exchange. The letter of instructions to the bank appears on page 1 of the correspondence.

The series of bills in question in the action are dated between January 30, 1914, and July 27, 1914, all before the outbreak of the European War, one in January, two in February, four in March, two in April, three in May, two in June, and five in July. The goods represented all seem to have arrived in Beyrout before the outbreak of war with Turkey. For some reason not explained in the evidence the consignees did not purport to pay for them to the bank till very much later, two in November, 1914, seven in 1915, of which four were in November and December, seven in 1916, and three in 1917, the last date being June 27, 1917. During the later years the price of Manchester goods had gone up enormously, but the consignees only paid the price in the bills, at first in Turkish coin, but when the paper currency was introduced in Turkish paper. Of course, the bank could not remit to England after the war broke out, and the dispute in this action started when at the end of the war the bank proposed to pay Jebara sterling for the paper piastres at the then rate of exchange, which would mean a very heavy loss to him.

The original contract before the war being between an English subject resident in England and a Turkish subject resident in Turkey, involving the transfer of goods to the Turkish subject and the payment of money to the English subject, was at the outbreak of war between England and Turkey still executory; neither goods nor money had passed. In my view, in the language of Mr. Justice Willes in Esposito v. Bowden (7 E. and B., 763), "the effect of the outbreak of war is to dissolve the contract and to absolve both parties from further performance of it," both by English and Turkish law. I need not refer to the numerous authorities in the House of Lords on the effect of war on a contract for sale of goods even where it contained suspensory clauses. It is enough to cite Lord Dunedin in Ertel Bieber and Co. and Others v. Rio Tinto Company, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 208; [1918] A.C., 260), where he says: "The proposition of law on which the judgment of the Courts is based is that a state of war between this kingdom and another country abrogates and puts an end to all executory contracts which for their further performance require, as it is often phrased, commercial intercourse between the one contracting party, subject of the King, and the other contracting party, an alien enemy, or anyone voluntarily residing in the enemy country. I use the expression 'often phrased commercial intercourse' because I think the word 'intercourse' is sufficient without the epithet 'commercial.' As to this I agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Robson v. Premier Oil and Pipe Line Company (31 The Times L.R., 420; [1915] 2 Ch., 124), where Lord Justice Pickford, delivering the judgment of the Court, Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., and himself and Lord Justice Warrington, said: 'The prohibition of intercourse with alien enemies rests upon public policy, and we can see no ground either on principle or authority for holding that a transaction between an alien enemy and a British subject which might result in detriment to this country or advantage to the enemy is permissible because it cannot be brought within the definition of a commercial transaction.' That so expressed it is an incontrovertible proposition, admits, I think, upon the authorities, of no doubt."

The Englishman could not deliver goods to the enemy of England, nor could the Turk pay money to the enemy of Turkey. There could be no commercial intercourse between them. And with the contract of sale went the subsidiary contract of agency. The Ottoman Bank, a Turkish subject, could not remain in contractual relations with a British subject in carrying out a void contract of sale. It was illegal for it to benefit the Turk, or to remit to the Englishman. The proclamation of January 7, 1915, superseding an earlier proclamation, and the licence to the Ottoman Bank of November 30, 1914, fully support this view. The latter runs: "I hereby permit the Imperial Ottoman Bank to carry on banking business at all their establishments situated within the United Kingdom, subject to the following limitations. conditions and supervision: (1) No transactions shall take place, directly or indirectly, with the establishments of the said banks situated in enemy territory, or with any persons resident in enemy territory." The result in my view was, that on November 4, 1914, the contract of Jebara with the Turkish consignees, and his contract with the Ottoman Bank as to action by them in Syria, became null and void as involving intercourse with the enemy. The bank, however, did not take this view, and for some years after the outbreak of war continued to hand the goods to the consignees, and receive payment in piastres which they could not remit to England. I do not understand how, after two or three years' delay, the consignees were entitled to claim the goods. But, at any rate, I am satisfied that so far as the original contracts of sale and employment were concerned, they were made invalid by the outbreak of war and the bank could not rely on them as justification for their action; unless, therefore, they could justify handing over the goods in some other way they were liable for such handing over as a conversion.

It was argued that if the original contracts were void on the outbreak of war, the bank became agents of necessity and could justify their action in that way. I am not sure that it is not an answer to say that they never thought of themselves in that light, or considered whether it was necessary to act; they thought they were carrying out their contracts. But considerable difficulties arise on the question of agency of necessity in English law. Until recently it was treated as limited to certain classes of agents, of whom masters of ships were the most prominent. High authorities had doubted whether it could be extended. I refer to Lord Esher in Gwilliam v. Twist and Another (11 The Times L.R., 415; [1895] 2 Q.B., 84, at p. 87) and Baron Parke in Hawtayne v. Bourne (7 M. and W., 595), but especially to the careful judgment of Chief Justice Eyre in Nicholson v. Chapman (2 Hy. Bl., 254). Many of the authorities are collected in a recent judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie in Prager's case (40 The Times L.R., 287; [1924] 1 K.B., 566). He there finds the facts so as not to raise any question of action by an agent of necessity, but discusses what the law would be if he had found the facts differently. He takes the view that Judges should expand the common law to meet the needs of expanding society, and proceeds to expand the doctrine of agency of necessity without clearly defining the limits of any of its expansion. The difficulty may be seen by considering the case of the finder of perishable goods or chattels which need expenditure to preserve them. If the finder incurs such expenditure, can he recover it from the true owner, as his "agent of necessity"? Chief Justice Eyre raises this difficulty in the case above cited, and cites "The case of the Pointing Dog" (Binstead v. Buck, 2 Bl., 1117). The pointing dog was lost, and his finder fed him for 20 weeks and claimed the cost from his owner when he appeared, but the claim was treated as unarguable. The expansion desired by Mr. Justice McCardie becomes less difficult when the agency of necessity develops from an original and subsisting agency, and only applies itself to unforeseen events not provided for in the original contract, as is usually the case where a shipmaster is agent of necessity. But the position seems quite different when there is no pre-existing agency, as in the case of a finder of perishable chattels or animals, and still more different when there is a pre-existing agency but it has become illegal and void by reason of war, and the same reason will apply to invalidate any implied agency of necessity. How can one imply a duty in an enemy to protect the property of his enemy? Will he not be violating his duty to his own country if he takes active steps to preserve an enemy's property? I do not feel strong enough to expand the common law to this extent, and I do not see that Mr. Justice McCardie has considered the effect of illegality and invalidity by reason of war in his doctrine. The principal in Prager's case (supra) was a Rumanian, and Rumania was an ally of England, though it may be that the principal was in a part of Rumania occupied by the Germans, and was therefore to be treated as an enemy. Compare Société Anonyme Belge des Mines d'Aljustrel (Portugal) v. Anglo-Belgian Agency (Limited) (31 The Times L.R., 624; [1915] 2 Ch., 409). The decision of Mr. Justice Greer to which we were referred gives more trouble. It is not very clear how the goods in question in that case got to Turkey, but apparently before the war they had got into the hands of the Ottoman Bank at Constantinople as bailees for reward, though the bank there did not know for whom they were acting, and the question who put the goods in bailment with the Ottoman Bank is left in doubt. Then came the war, and the first part of the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer, with which I agree, is that the war invalidated all obligations of the Turkish bank to the English enemy. The bank had not advanced any money on the security of the documents or goods. But having held that the bank were under no obligation as to the goods the learned Judge says: "Now they (the bank) were in a position in which they were bound to do something, otherwise the goods would be entirely lost . . . and therefore they were in a position of agents of necessity." I do not follow the reasoning: if all prior obligations were invalidated by the outbreak of war, how could an implied obligation arise between enemies? How could the bank be "bound" to an enemy to do anything? How is an enemy bound to take steps to preserve the property of his enemy? So far as I understand the facts in that case, I doubt whether the latter part of the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer can be supported.

There remains a point raised under Article 84 of the Treaty of Lausanne, which is made part of English law by an Order in Council under an Act. The first part of the article seems to apply between vendor and purchaser, and speaks of debts which became payable during the war under contracts entered into before the war. The debts in the present case did not apparently become payable before the war, and they were certainly not payable during the war, for the war invalidated the contracts under which they might arise, and prevented any such sums from being payable. The second part of the article is difficult to understand; but I read it to relate to the same subject matter as in the first part, "debts payable before the war or which became payable during the war under pre-war contracts." If so, in the present case no such sums were payable before the war, or became payable during the war, for the war invalidated the contracts under which they would have been payable. If the article was intended to deal with cases like the present, the contracting parties seem to me to have failed completely to use language to express their intention.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt gave judgment for the sterling amount of the bills on considerations of contract, and did not apparently deal with the effects of war, or the construction of the Treaty. In my view, the true legal effect of what has happened is that the bank during the war converted the goods of the plaintiff, and when the plaintiff sues after the war must pay damages for conversion, to be ascertained by an inquiry unless the parties agree. The measure of damages was not argued before us, and I express no opinion on it.

The judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in favour of the plaintiff should be varied in the way indicated, but as the defendants have substantially failed they must pay the costs of the appeal. The costs of the inquiry should be in the discretion of the tribunal taking the inquiry.

Lord Justice Atkin concurred.

BEDE STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED v. BUNGE Y BORN, LIMITADA, S.A.*

Ship — Charterparty — Arbitration clause — Balance of freight — Short delivery — Charterers' admission of balance due for freight —Counterclaim for short delivery—Right of shipowners to recover admitted balance — Counterclaim barred by arbitration clause.

The plaintiffs chartered their ship to the defendants to carry grain, the charterparty providing that all disputes should be referred to arbitration and that the claimant's arbitrator must be "appointed within three months of final discharge, and where this provision is not complied with the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred." Before completion of discharge the defendants made various payments to the plaintiffs on account of freight, and on final discharge the plaintiffs claimed that £568 was still owing for freight. The defendants admitted that £416 was still owing for freight, but they set up a counterclaim for £581 for short delivery and refused to pay the £416 until their counterclaim was met. Neither party referred the matter to arbitration, and more than three months after final discharge the plaintiffs brought an action for £568 balance of freight and the defendants counterclaimed £581 for short delivery.

Held, that though the plaintiffs could not recover the £568 as the claim for it ought to have been taken to arbitration, yet they could recover the £416 about which there had never been any dispute, but that the counterclaim, as it was always in dispute, was barred by the arbitration clause.

The plaintiffs in this case claimed a sum of £568 odd as balance of freight on a cargo of grain carried under a charterparty from Buenos Aires to Spanish ports.

Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. McNair appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Somervell for the defendants.

The defendants counterclaimed for short delivery; and they also said that the claim was barred because it had not been brought within the time limited by an arbitration clause in the charterparty. The plaintiffs replied that if the arbitration clause applied it barred the counterclaim also.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Clause 39, the arbitration clause of the charter-party, was as follows :—

"All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract shall, unless the parties agree forthwith on a single arbitrator, be referred to the final arbitrament of two arbitrators carrying on business in London who shall be members of the Baltic and engaged in the shipping and/or grain trades, one to be appointed by each of the parties, with power to such arbitrators to appoint an umpire. Any claim must be made in writing and claimant's arbitrator appointed within three months of final discharge, and where this provision is not complied with the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred. . . ."

The defendants had admitted that £416 10s. 7d. was due from them in respect of freight, but they refused to pay that over until their counterclaim was met. It was ordered that the question whether the claim was barred by the arbitration clause should be tried as a preliminary point.

Mr. PORTER, in opening, submitted that so far as the £416 10s. 7d. was concerned there was no "dispute" within the meaning of clause 39, and no question of arbitration could arise. A counterclaim for short delivery did not affect a shipowner's right to sue for freight ; it was not a defence to the claim but was the subject of a cross-action (Sheels v. Davies, 4 Camp., 119). The counterclaim here, therefore, was an independent claim which the plaintiffs disputed, and as it was disputed it should have been referred to arbitration and it was now barred by the arbitration clause. On the other hand, a simple refusal to pay a sum which was admittedly due was not a "dispute" ; and an action to recover such a sum was not barred by this arbitration clause. This case was really covered by Atlantic Shipping and Trading Company, Limited v. Dreyfus (38 The Times L.R., 534 ; [1922] 2 A.C., 250).

On the facts, the defendants had actually waived any right which they might have had to rely on the arbitration clause (Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 2 App. Cas., 439, at p. 448).

Mr. LE QUESNE submitted that the plaintiffs were barred by the later words in clause 39 "any claim must be made . . . within three months." Also, there was a "dispute" between the parties as to the balance owing to the defendants ; the dispute was about freight due and about damages for short delivery. Sheels v. Davies (supra), relied on by Mr. Porter, had really been overruled by Bankes v. Jarvis (19 The Times L.R., 190 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 549) under the modern procedure.

On the facts, he submitted that the act of the defendants did not amount to waiver.

This arbitration clause had been considered in Williams and Mordey v. W. H. Muller and Co. (London), Limited (18 Lloyd's List, 50, at p. 52). If the defendants here had waived anything they had only waived the question of the time within which arbitration must be brought ; they had not waived the whole right to arbitration.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON, in the course of his judgment, read Clause 39, and said that the date of final discharge of the cargo was March 11, 1925. Before the discharge was completed various payments on account had been made to the plaintiffs, and they said that there was a balance of £568 odd due to them on final discharge. The defendants admitted that they owed a sum of £416 odd for freight, but counterclaimed £581 for short delivery.

The plaintiffs brought this action more than three months after the final discharge, and the defendants pleaded the arbitration clause. The plaintiffs contended that on the facts the defendants had waived the clause, but though the correspondence might have led the plaintiffs, if they ever thought of the matter, to suppose that the arbitration clause would not be insisted on, the defendants never said anything definite, and in his view they never, in fact, abandoned the point. So the point of waiver failed.

The other aspect of the case was more important and more difficult. The plaintiffs' claim for £568 was in dispute from the first, and in his view it was a dispute within Clause 39. The plaintiffs therefore should have had it settled by arbitration, and their claim to recover the £568 in this action was barred. But then the plaintiffs said that at least £416, part of the £568, was admitted by the defendants to be due, and that as there never had been any dispute about that the clause did not affect it.

Mr. Le Quesne contended broadly that whenever a creditor was claiming money which was due and the debtor would not pay there was a "dispute" between them. That was a proposition with which he could not possibly agree. A mere failure or refusal to pay money which was admittedly due was not a dispute within the meaning of the clause. The position was similar to that dealt with in the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in London and North-Western Railway Company v. Jones ([1915] 2 K.B., 35, at p. 40).

The plaintiffs now contended that though they could not enforce their claim for £568 because they ought to have taken it to arbitration they could at least recover the £416 about which there never had been any dispute, and that the result was that they were only barred from recovering the difference between those two sums.

The question was a difficult one, but on the whole he thought that the plaintiffs were right. The position as to the counterclaim was quite different. That sum was always in dispute, and the defendants should have gone to arbitration about it, and in this Court their claim was barred by clause 39.

There would, therefore, be a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover £416 and no more ; and that the counterclaim was dismissed, with costs.

Contract—Agent of friendly society—Alteration of rules — Amendment providing for compulsory retirement — Whether binding on agent appointed before amendment.

The plaintiff was appointed an agent of the defendants, a friendly society, whose rules, though subject to alteration, provided at that time for the retention of agents in office so long as their conduct was satisfactory. After the plaintiff reached the age of 65 the defendants altered their rules by providing that agents should be compulsorily retired at the age of 65, and in accordance with the amended rules the defendants terminated the plaintiff's employment. In an action for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to do so,

Held, that as the rules, on the face of them, were alterable, the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaration claimed, and the action failed.

This was an action by Mr. Walter Wright Page, of Nicholl-road, Harlesden, against the Liverpool Victoria Friendly Society and the trustees thereof for a declaration that the defendant society was not entitled by virtue of its rules or otherwise to dismiss him from his position as one of its managers.

The plaintiff, who was now 69 years old, had been employed as the society's agent or manager for Willesden since December, 1896, until he was compulsorily retired in October, 1925, solely in consequence of a new rule of the society that officers should be so retired with pension at the age of 65. His reputation with the society stood very high and, although according to the computations of the society he was entitled to a pension of only £8 per week, the society had increased it to £8 10s.

At the time of the plaintiff's appointment the rules stated that agents should remain in office so long as their conduct was satisfactory to the managing committee. The rules had been altered from time to time, but on the occasion of each alteration provision was made that "the existing . . . officers . . . shall hold their offices as of their appointment under any former rules."

On March 31, 1925, the society amended its rules by adding a clause that all the servants, excepting the collecting staff, should be compulsorily retired at the age of 65 as and from October 1, 1925, subject to the grant of what, in the opinion of the committee of management, was an adequate pension. The plaintiff was 65 on February 2, 1923.

By a letter dated May 30, 1925, the society terminated the employment of the plaintiff and dismissed him from October 1, 1925. The plaintiff claimed that he was not bound by the new and amended rules, and that the terms of his engagement were not and could not be altered by the making of the amendments by the society, and did not on their true construction enable the society compulsorily to retire him.

The defendants contended that the employment was governed by the rules of the society which were from time to time in force; that it was an implied term of the agreement that the rules could and might be amended, altered, or rescinded at any time; and that the plaintiff's employment terminated in accordance with the provisions of the rules. The defendants further pleaded that the plaintiff never questioned the rule or in any way contended or suggested that the society had wrongfully terminated his employment until shortly before the issue of the writ. On the contrary, they said that the plaintiff voluntarily relinquished his office.

Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. James Wylie appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Maugham, K.C., Mr. Artemus Jones, K.C., and Mr. B. Long appeared for the defendants.

His Lordship, in giving judgment, said that the action was misconceived. As the case had been put to him it was intended to assert that the plaintiff had a freehold, or what was equivalent to a freehold, for the term of his natural life, although possibly by illness or other cause he might have to allow the work to be done by a deputy. It was very unusual to declare the creation of an office of freehold by contract. But the plaintiff based his case upon the rules of the society. He said that he could show a contract by the rule under which managers held their appointments. But that rule formed part of a series of rules, and from time to time those rules were amended.

It had been argued that the rules could not be altered to the prejudice of the plaintiff. That was an old fallacy. If one took an office under a rule one had to allow for the rule being altered in any way that was lawful for the alteration of the rule. In this case, the rules, on the face of them, were subject to alteration, and therefore the rule under which the plaintiff claimed this tenure was alterable.

The plaintiff had been an extremely successful officer and no one questioned his ability. A rather fine point was raised—namely, that the rule relating to compulsory retirement at the age of 65 could not relate to the plaintiff because he was 65 before the new rule was made. Such an interpretation of the rule was one he could not accept. The action failed and must be dismissed, with costs.

Upon the application of Mr. Goddard a stay of execution on payment of costs was granted.

COHEN v. GOLD.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol—Landlord coming into possession—Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

By s. 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923, "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

Held, that in order that a dwelling-house may become decontrolled under the above provision it must have been let separately up to the time when the landlord comes into possession, and the landlord must come into possession of it as landlord.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a judgment given at the Shoreditch County Court in favour of the defendant, who was the tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restriction Acts. The plaintiff had contended that he was the landlord in actual possession at the time of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923. The case involved the interpretation of section 2 (1) of that Act, which provided:—

"Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Increase of Rent and Mortgage

* Reported by T. R. F. Butler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

Mr. L. Green appeared for the appellant. The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

Mr. GREEN stated that the premises in question, 114, King Edward-road, South Hackney, had been let in 1871 for a term of 68 years. In June, 1913, the appellant, Mr. Abraham Cohen, had bought the remainder of the term and for the purposes of this action he was the landlord of the entire house. He had personally lived there and had occupied the whole house, with the exception of the top floor, which had some years ago been let to the respondent, Mr. Harry Gold. That tenancy was not material to the present case.

In May, 1925, however, Mr. Cohen let three rooms on the ground floor to the respondent, and he subsequently brought the action for possession of those rooms on the ground that they were decontrolled. The county court Judge gave judgment in favour of the defendant, and it appeared that his reason for so doing was that he was not satisfied that the appellant was a landlord in actual possession of those three rooms at the time of the letting to Mr. Gold.

Counsel submitted that the rooms in question were decontrolled under section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. The appellant was in actual possession of the three rooms at the time of the letting, which was subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1923. The Act did not require that he should be in possession as landlord or in possession of them as a separate dwelling-house. He referred to Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 360).

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the learned Judge of the Shoreditch County Court in favour of the defendant in an action in which the plaintiff claimed possession of three rooms on the ground floor of No. 114, King Edward-road, South Hackney. The learned county court Judge in his note tells us that he held that the plaintiff was not at the time of the letting in actual possession as landlord of the three rooms now occupied by the defendant, and that therefore the dwelling-house was not decontrolled.

A letting of the top floor of the house to the defendant about four and a half years ago may be excluded as not material to the present case. The material facts were that until about May, 1925, the plaintiff, who is now in the position of landlord of these rooms, had occupied the whole of the house (excluding the top floor) together with other members of his family. About May, 1925, he let the three rooms on the ground floor to the defendant as a separate dwelling-house on a weekly tenancy. The argument which was apparently relied on in the County Court and which was addressed to us here was that inasmuch as the plaintiff, who is now in the position of landlord to the defendant of the three rooms in question, was in fact in personal occupation of a dwelling-house which included these three rooms at the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923, he is entitled to rely on section 2, subsection 1, of that Act. [His Lordship read the subsection, and continued] : When Mr. Cohen, who is now the landlord of the dwelling-house consisting of these three rooms, was in actual occupation, the three rooms did not constitute a dwelling-house, but only part of one, in that they had not been let separately and there was no landlord or tenant of them. The county court Judge held that the plaintiff was not as landlord in actual possession of the three rooms, and that therefore the dwelling-house was not decontrolled. It is for the appellant to show that he was wrong in law. The question is whether the physical occupation of the house that included these three rooms was the possession of the dwelling-house constituted by these three rooms within section 2, subsection 1, of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923.

Not only has the argument on behalf of the appellant failed to convince me that the learned county court Judge was wrong in law, but I am definitely of opinion that he was right. I think it clear that the Act does not apply to a case such as this, in which the possession by the person who is now in fact the landlord was not at the material time the possession of a dwelling-house let separately or possession by a landlord. The plaintiff was not, in my opinion, in possession of the whole of this dwelling-house at the passing of the Act of 1923 ; and, that being so, he has not established his claim to the decontrol of this dwelling-house.

I will add a reference to the case of Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 360), which perhaps on a first glance might appear to have some bearing on this case. When closely examined, however, I think it has none, because the point of this case did not and could not arise there. In Dunbar v. Smith (supra) there were three floors of a house, using the word "house" in the sense of an entire structure, each of which had been separately let for several years before the Rent Restrictions Act came into force. The landlord came into possession of one floor after the passing of the Act of 1923. The county court Judge held that that was not a coming into possession within section 2, subsection 1, of that Act, on the ground that although the possession was that of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts, it was not the possession of the whole of a house, using the word in the sense of an entire structure. The Divisional Court held that that view was wrong, and that the word "dwelling-house" in section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923 has the same meaning as elsewhere in the Acts ; that is to say, that a house let as a separate dwelling, whether the whole or part of an entire structure, is a dwelling-house for the purpose of the Acts, and that the landlord having come into possession of a dwelling-house in that sense was entitled to rely on section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923. The point which arose there, and which does not arise in this case, was that the landlord, after the passing of the Act of 1923, came into possession of that which was already a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Acts and of which he was already landlord when he came into possession.

For the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that the county court Judge came to a right conclusion in law, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—I am of the same opinion. Section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923, relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from the application of the principal Act in certain cases. I think it was made abundantly clear in the course of the argument that the facts of this particular case could not be brought within any of the cases in which dwelling-houses are excluded,

If the words of the subsection and the proviso thereto are carefully considered line by line, it seems to me that the county court Judge really could not have arrived at any conclusion other than that at which he did arrive. I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PAINE.*

Insurance (Unemployment) — Contributions—Employer's failure to pay—Jurisdiction of justices—Limitation of 12 months' arrears—Claim to recover previous arrears—Effect of justices' order—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 22 (3) (6).

Though under s. 22 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, the jurisdiction of the justices, on a conviction for failure to pay contributions under the Act, is limited to 12 months' arrears, yet, if the jurisdiction of the justices is evoked under that section and they make an order for payment of the 12 months' arrears, the sum paid under the order is to be treated as a payment in satisfaction of all arrears in respect of the same employee, and no further proceedings can be taken in any Court to recover the arrears for any period preceding the 12 months.

This was an information by which the Attorney-General claimed from Mr. Ernest James Paine, of Market-place, Wisbech, Cambridge, the sum of £5 0s. 2d., being the balance of arrears of contributions alleged to be payable under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920 to 1926, in respect of G. Denmark and A. G. Leahy, persons employed by Mr. Paine for various periods between April 14, 1924, and February 6, 1926.

The full amount of unpaid contributions in respect of those two men was £10 15s. 11d., but on April 22, 1926, the respondent was convicted on two informations for non-payment of contributions in respect of them and was ordered, after due notice, to pay, and had paid, the sum of £5 3s. 1d., being a sum equal to the amount of the contributions unpaid for 12 months preceding the informations. Credit was also given for stamps irregularly affixed to the value of 12s. 8d.

The respondent contended that the payment of the amount ordered by the justices was a satisfaction of his liability by virtue of section 22 (3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, which provides :—

"Where an employer has been convicted under the foregoing provisions of this section of the offence of failing or neglecting to pay any contribution under this Act, he shall be liable to pay to the unemployment fund a sum equal to the amount which he has so failed or neglected to pay, and on such a conviction, if notice of the intention to do so has been served with the summons or warrant, evidence may be given of the failure or neglect on the part of the employer to pay other contributions in respect of the same person during the year preceding the date when the information was so laid, and on proof of such failure or neglect the employer shall be liable to pay to the unemployment fund a sum equal to the total of all the contributions which he is so proved to have failed or neglected to pay.

"Any sum paid by an employer under the foregoing provision shall be treated as a payment in satisfaction of the unpaid contributions. . . .

"Sub-section (6) :—Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the Minister from recovering any sums due to the unemployment fund by means of civil proceedings, and all such sums shall be recoverable as debts due to the Crown, and without prejudice to any other remedy may be recovered by the Minister summarily as a civil debt."

Mr. C. W. Lilley appeared for the informant ; Mr. Linton Thorp for the respondent.

Mr. Lilley contended that the payment under sub-section (3) was merely a satisfaction of the contributions for the 12 months which the Court of Summary Jurisdiction had power to deal with, and that sub-section (6) left the Minister's remedy in respect of earlier unpaid contributions by ordinary civil proceedings untouched.

Mr. Thorp submitted that sub-section (3) was clearly intended to afford complete satisfaction of the liability. The words were "the unpaid contributions," not "the said unpaid contributions." It was a penal statute and must be strictly construed. The Court would incline against a construction imposing a liability to repeated proceedings.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether the respondent could be sued in respect of further unpaid contributions which could not be recovered before the magistrates. The only contributions which could be recovered before the magistrates were contributions in respect of the same employed person. He did not think the case touched contributions in respect of other employed persons. There was no question of "the unpaid contributions" mentioned in section 22 (3) referring to other persons.

The scheme of the Act was that where there had been a conviction there could be a fine ; the amount of the unpaid contribution could be ordered to be paid also ; and, by giving notice, other unpaid contributions up to a year could be included in the order. The question was whether, when that procedure had been followed, any other proceedings in debt could be taken. He did not know whether it was said that before the magistrates notice could be given as to six months' contributions and then civil proceedings be taken for the rest, or whether Mr. Lilley would admit that any proceedings before the magistrates would conclude the matter so far as the twelve months were concerned and would confine his contention to the right to sue for previous arrears.

In his view the respondent was entitled to succeed. If the civil jurisdiction of the magistrates was invoked, then that was the only civil remedy and the Minister must be content with the fact that he was limited to 12 months' arrears. He thought that that would be the result even without the last paragraph of sub-section (3).

The Court did not favour an interpretation which would divide the debt up so that the respondent could be harassed with two proceedings for the same debt. If the magistrates were not asked to exercise their civil jurisdiction, then the whole could be sued for ; if they were, then the civil jurisdiction was exhausted.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Subsection (6) did not touch the matter. It merely meant that no words in that section were to be construed as preventing the Minister from taking a civil remedy, and was directed to excluding the well-known doctrine that, where a liability was created and a special remedy was given for its enforcement, the ordinary remedies were ousted.

Subsection (6) was inserted merely to say that, though the Minister might go before the magistrates, he might refrain from doing so and proceed in the ordinary civil courts. It did not say that he could go to a criminal court and collect as much as he could get there and then collect some more of the same debt in a civil court.

For those reasons there must be judgment for the respondent, with costs.

LAWRENCE v. HAYES.*

Practice—Assignment of chose in action—Set-off available against assignor—Judgment obtained against assignor—Action by assignee—Whether set-off still available to defendant—Merger.

In an action by a plaintiff who sued as assignee of the vendor of a business to recover instalments of the purchase money owing by the defendant as purchaser, the defendant claimed the right to set off the amount to which he was entitled as against the vendor for damages for certain breaches of warranty by the vendor under the same contract of sale. After the assignment, but before notice of it had been given to the defendant, the defendant had proceeded to obtain first an interlocutory, and subsequently a final judgment against the assignor (the vendor). The plaintiff contended that the defendant could no longer rely on the set-off, on the ground that there had been a merger of the original liability of the assignor in the judgment.

Held, that the doctrine of merger did not apply, as neither were the parties to this action the same as the parties to the judgment, nor was the remedy of the same kind, since what had been a weapon of offence in the hand of the defendant against the assignor was merely a weapon of defence as regards the plaintiff's claim. The defendant, therefore, was entitled to avail himself of the set-off as against the assignee in the same manner in which he could have used it against the assignor.

Price v. Moulton (10 C.B., 561) and Young v. Kitchin (3 Ex.D., 127) applied.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Judge of the Bishop's Stortford County Court, who had held that, in an action by the plaintiff, as assignee of the vendor of a business, for instalments of purchase money owing, the defendant could avail himself of the right to set off the amount in which the vendor (the assignor) was liable to him for damages for breaches of warranty under the same contract of sale.

The plaintiff appealed.

The facts appear in detail in the judgments.

Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. J. N. Gray appeared for the appellant; Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Mr. F. S. Laskey for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Acton.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the Bishop's Stortford County Court, who gave judgment for the defendant, with costs. The facts were lengthy and somewhat complicated, but they ultimately resolved themselves into these material facts. The plaintiff sued as assignee of one Launder to recover a sum of £78 13s. 8d., being instalments admittedly due to Launder as instalments on the sale of a business by Launder to the defendant in February, 1923, and of that debt the plaintiff took an assignment dated October 3, 1923. In the action which was brought by the plaintiff claiming those instalments in arrear the question arose whether the defendant was entitled to set off against or deduct from the amounts, which would otherwise be due and owing from him to the plaintiff, an amount representing the amount of unliquidated damages to which he was entitled for breaches of warranty contained in the same contract out of which there arose his indebtedness to Launder. The business which Launder sold to the defendant was the business of a tobacconist, and was sold for an agreed price of £750—£350 in cash and the balance of £400 to be paid by monthly instalments, with 6 per cent. interest thereupon. It appears that on the same day that this transaction was entered into between the parties the plaintiff, Lawrence, sold to Launder a bungalow for £650, of which £250 was paid by Launder to the plaintiff, and the balance was to be paid at £10 a month. On October 3, 1923, a deed was executed by Launder assigning all his remaining benefit under the agreement of sale with the defendant Hayes to the plaintiff, but although that assignment was executed then, no notice, or at all events no effective notice, was given until two letters were written, the first on February 27, 1924, from the agent of the plaintiff to the defendant, and the second on May 22, 1924, from the plaintiff's solicitors to the defendant. The defendant's set-off arose in this way. Soon after the business had been assigned to him the defendant claimed that Launder had not fulfilled or performed his agreement of sale, but was in breach in respect of two matters—namely, that, firstly, certain chattels which had been sold subject to a charge had not been relieved of that charge by Launder, and, secondly, that a cash register assigned to the defendant by the agreement was in fact not paid for and was not Launder's property, but the property of other persons and in Launder's possession under an agreement pursuant to which he was liable to pay instalments, of which there were a number in arrear. Before, therefore, the property in the cash register could be acquired by the defendant, if it was ever to be acquired by him, he would be under a liability to pay still further instalments.

There was then a discussion as to whether the register should be returned to the suppliers and an allowance made upon it, or whether the defendant should acquire the property in the cash register by satisfying the owners and completing payment of the instalments. Launder offered an allowance to the defendant at a valuation, and it appears that the defendant was prepared to accept some such terms, but disputes arose as to whether the sum was to be fixed by valuation or otherwise, and on October 17, 1923, the proprietors of the cash register, the National Cash Register Company, obtained judgment against Launder for a sum of £45 due for arrears on this cash register. In January, 1924, the National Cash Register Company issued a plaint against Hayes (the defendant) for the return of the register. This matter, however, was disposed of ultimately by agreement. In January, 1924, in these circumstances, an action was launched by the defendant against Launder for unliquidated damages, for breach of warranty in that, in addition to the claims arising in regard to the chattels that had not been freed from the charge, Launder had no title to the cash register and accordingly had committed a breach of the implied warranty by him as seller.

On February 4, 1924, the defendant obtained an interlocutory judgment against Launder by default, and on February 26 a Master in Chambers assessed the damages at the sum of £116 odd, and for that amount judgment was given against Launder at the suit of the present defendant, with costs.

Up to that date, as I have already stated, no effective notice had been given of this assignment, but on the very next day—namely, February 27, the first of the notices to which our attention has been drawn in this case was given. That notice, and the subsequent notice in May, having been given to the defendant, the plaintiff then launched an action in the High Court for the sum with which we are concerned now, £78 13s. 8d., being seven monthly instalments of £10 due to the plaintiff as assignee under the agreement of February 15, 1923, and interest upon those instalments at 6 per cent. As an answer to that claim, in the first instance, an affidavit was sworn in opposition to judgment, but in the result the matter was remitted to the Bishop's Stortford County Court. The substantial question which arose was whether in the circumstances which I have detailed the defendant had or had not the right to set off against or deduct from the claim of the plaintiff as assignee in the present action the amount of the liability of Launder to the defendant for damages for breach of warranty contained in the same agreement out of which the indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff arose.

The point which was relied upon in argument in this Court was that the defendant could not rely upon any such set-off because, the defendant having recovered an interlocutory judgment and subsequently a final judgment against Launder, there was a merger of the original liability of Launder for damages in the judgment which the defendant had obtained against him. It was admitted that, if the defendant had not in fact pursued his remedy against Launder but had for the first time formulated and insisted upon his claim to unliquidated damages in the present action, he would have been entitled to do so, and subject to his proof of the appropriate facts there could have been no answer in law to the claim which he sought to set up as a set-off against or as a deduction from the claim raised by the plaintiff.

It is not surprising that that admission should be made, because apart from any cases which have been referred to before us in the course of the argument the case of Young v. Kitchin (3 Ex.D., 127) quite clearly establishes that that is an incontrovertible proposition of law. The head note to that case is as follows: "The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff sued as assignee by deed of a debt due from the defendant to the assignor on a building contract. The defendant pleaded, by way of set-off and counterclaim, that he was entitled to damages for breaches of contract by the assignor to complete and deliver the buildings at the specified time, whereby the defendant lost the use of them. On demurrer to so much of the defence as alleged breaches of contract by the assignor: Held, that the defendant was not entitled to recover any damages against the plaintiff, but was entitled by way of set-off or deduction from the plaintiff's claim to the damages which he had sustained by the non-performance of the contract by the assignor; and that the form of the defence must be amended accordingly."

That case was referred to, and referred to with approval, in the case of Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Company (4 The Times L.R., 292; 13 App. Cas., 199) in the Privy Council, to which reference was made in the argument. There remains therefore upon the argument as addressed to us the sole question, whether that which would indisputably have been the right of the defendant in the present action is barred by the mere fact that before he had any notice of this assignment he had obtained a judgment crystallizing the liability of Launder to him in respect of these damages for breach of warranty arising as I have stated. If that were the result it would appear, at all events, to be a somewhat startling result, but still the argument has to be considered. To my mind the argument that a merger can operate in these circumstances as against the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff is based upon an entirely erroneous hypothesis. As was said with regard to merger by Mr. Justice Maule in Price v. Moulton (10 C.B., 561, at p. 574): "The policy of the law is that there shall not be two subsisting remedies, one upon the covenant and another upon the simple contract by the same person against the same person for the same demand." The words to be emphasized or italicized are the concluding words, but if for the word "covenant" in that sentence the word "judgment" be substituted, and for the words "debt upon the simple contract" be substituted the words "liability in unliquidated damages," the sentence is made to fit the facts in this particular case, and the policy of the law was quite clearly enunciated by Mr. Justice Maule. In the present case it is apparent that in the first place the persons concerned are not the same as the persons concerned in the judgment; the plaintiff in this action had nothing whatever to do with the judgment. In the second place, the remedy is not of the same kind. As against Launder one might say that it was a weapon of offence; as against the plaintiff it could only be made, as Young v. Kitchin (supra) shows, a weapon of defence, and the only relevant inquiry into the amount of unliquidated damages in which Launder is liable to the defendant is in regard to the question of the plaintiff's claim, and no further; for if upon investigation it is proved that the amount recovered in damages overtops the amount of the plaintiff's claim, all that surplus is of no matter whatever. It is perhaps always likely to make matters clear if one puts questions of this kind as a pleader would put them when pleading. I suppose a pleader would put them in some such way as this: The statement of claim would be that the plaintiff claims as assignee of one Launder instalments of a debt accrued due and payable by the defendant to Launder, which was by Launder assigned by an absolute assignment in writing to the plaintiff, of which assignment notice was duly given by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defence would be that, subject to set-off and counterclaim, the defendant admits the debt, but he says that he has a claim against Launder for unliquidated damages arising out of the same contract as that under which his indebtedness to Launder arises, and claims the right to set off against or deduct from the amount of the plaintiff's claim an amount of those damages equivalent to the whole or to a part of the amount of the plaintiff's claim ; and, of course, proper particulars would be given. To that counterclaim the pleader acting for the plaintiff has to find a defence, and according to the argument we have heard the defence would be to the following effect : That by way of defence to the set-off and counterclaim, the defendant had, before notice of the assignment of the debt due from him to Launder was given, obtained a judgment against Launder for the recovery of unliquidated damages, the whole or a part of which he now seeks to set off against or deduct from the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and that the effect of that judgment was that there was a merger of Launder's liability in damages in the judgment debt.

On that the question arises which is really the question in this case, whether that would not be a demurrable defence to a counterclaim ; in other words, whether it would not be bad in law and one which could not in any view of it be sustained.

In my opinion it is not an available defence in these circumstances. Nobody has ever disputed that there was a merger as between Launder and the defendant or that there was as between them a consequent estoppel which arose from the judgment. Although it is entirely unnecessary to decide that point, it seems to me, as Serjeant Sullivan has contended, that it would be open to the plaintiff in these circumstances to say something to this effect : It is all very well for you to say that you have got judgment against Launder, but if you are seeking for a different kind of purpose to exercise a different kind of remedy against a different person, that different person may call upon you to prove the necessary facts to show that in fact you have a claim to unliquidated damages to an amount equivalent to or overtopping my claim against you. If that question had arisen in any form, it would no doubt have been dealt with in the counterclaim, and we might have had to consider it and express some view upon it in this Court, but no such course was taken. The case admittedly proceeded from beginning to end upon the basis that the figure of the amount for which the defendant recovered judgment against Launder substantially represents the true figure of the amount of damages which the defendant had in fact suffered at the hands of Launder by reason of his breaches of warranty. The position in the county court was also apparently as follows : the plaintiff went so far as to address to the Judge an argument to this effect, that although a judgment had been obtained by the defendant against Launder, and was, of course, binding between those parties, nevertheless it was open to the plaintiff to say that the damages in respect of which that judgment had been obtained were in fact unliquidated, and that as far as they were unliquidated damages they could not in law be a set-off against the plaintiff's claim.

Everybody, including Mr. Gray, to whose ability we are indebted in the present case, agreed that the argument which was addressed to the learned Judge was entirely untenable, but the material fact for the purposes of our decision is that the argument was put forward, and, therefore, that the case proceeded to decision upon the basis that nobody sought to dispute the substantial correctness of the figure representing the indebtedness of Launder to the defendant in respect of these unliquidated damages, and that it was the plaintiff himself who sought to go behind the judgment, if I may so perhaps somewhat loosely express it, and to argue that, on looking behind that judgment to the nature of the claim upon which it was founded, that claim was one which could not be set up against him. In these circumstances it seems to me to be unnecessary to consider the matter any further. The dilemma in which the plaintiff is, in these circumstances, is this : that if he desired to question in substance the amount of the damages, recoverable by the defendant against Launder, he should have taken steps, at all events, to raise the question. He did no such thing, and, on the other hand, he allowed the case to proceed upon the basis that so far as the amount was concerned he did not seek to raise any question at all.

On the other hand, if it be said that the defendant sought to rely upon the judgment as a judgment binding against the plaintiff, one can only say that the evidence seems to be all the other way, and that it seems reasonably clear that the case was never put upon that basis, but upon the basis which I have indicated.

In the result, therefore, I arrive at the conclusion that so far as the question of merger is concerned, it cannot be relied upon by the plaintiff as a defence to the set-off and counterclaim which was raised against him in the present action. In the result, therefore, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant here, who was the plaintiff in the county court, is the assignee of a man named Launder under a contract which Launder made with the defendant for the sale to the defendant of a tobacconist's business. The county court Judge has allowed, as against the plaintiff's claim for sums due under the contract of sale from the defendant to Launder, a set-off of a sum which is in fact the amount of a judgment recovered by the defendant against Launder in an action in the High Court for damages for breach of warranty of title of part of the stock and furniture which he purported to sell. The present defendant claimed in that action, and in default of appearance established, that part of the stock and furniture was not Launder's at all, in the one case being subject to a hire-purchase agreement under which the property had not yet passed to him, and in the other case having been mortgaged by him by a bill of sale.

The judgment obtained by the defendant against Launder was obtained after the assignment to the plaintiff but before notice of it to the defendant. It is admitted that this claim of the defendant was of such a nature that it would in equity have been set off as against the assignee's claim. That admission could not be avoided in view of the cases of Young v. Kitchin (3 Ex.D., 127) and Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Company (4 The Times L.R., 292 ; 13 App. Cas., 199) which have been referred to.

The matter is regulated by section 25, subsection 6, of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, which contains the words in qualification of the rights of the assignee of a debt, "subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this Act had not passed" ; and that, as explained by Baron Cleasby in Young v. Kitchin (supra), means, as indeed is obvious, "subject to all equities which would be enforced"

(which would have been enforced would be more verbally correct) "in a court of equity."

The whole case as argued before us, upon that admission, is this. It is said that there being this claim which would be matter of set-off in equity and under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, that right of the defendant has been lost because he has obtained a judgment giving binding effect as between him and Launder to that claim, and that that judgment is in itself not matter of set-off under the principles of equity and under that Act and has extinguished or superseded or merged the right which was a matter of set-off before it was obtained. It was argued that what appeared to be a very unattractive piece of mere technicality had a foundation in substance because whereas the amount to be set off in respect of an unliquidated claim would have to be ascertained by some inquiry in the action between the assignee and the defendant, as is apparently recognized at the end of the judgment in the Newfoundland case (supra), and in such an inquiry the assignee would have the right to appear and take part—indeed, would be a party—on the other hand, the judgment might be obtained without his knowledge and in his absence. That was the argument, and on the strength of it, as well as of the technical argument which was adduced to support it, we are invited to lay it down as law that if a claim against an assignor which would be proper matter of set-off against the assignee has, after the assignment but before notice of it, been translated into a judgment, the right of set-off has gone. No authority for such a proposition has been brought to our notice, and it appears to me to be quite contrary to the principles upon which, before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, courts of equity dealt with this matter. They are very clearly stated in a passage which has been very frequently quoted as declaring the law on this matter from the judgment of Lord Justice James in the case of Roxburghe v. Cox (17 Ch.D., 520, at p. 526). He says: "An assignee of a chose in action . . . takes subject to all rights of set-off and other defences which were available against the assignor, subject only to this exception, that after notice of an assignment of a chose in action the debtor cannot by payment or otherwise do anything to take away or diminish the rights of the assignee as they stood at the time of the notice. That is the sole exception."

Here this judgment was obtained before notice of the assignment. Moreover, it is, I entirely agree, plain that the merger of the defendant's cause of action against the assignor under the judgment operates only as between the parties to that action; it cannot deprive the defendant as against the assignee of any right of set-off which could have been founded on the cause of action itself.

With regard to the other argument on behalf of the appellant, I desire to reserve my opinion as to exactly how far it was open to the plaintiff to challenge the accuracy of the judgment in point of amount. It is quite clear that as a matter of estoppel, the assignee is not estopped by the judgment obtained by the defendant against the assignor, but I do not feel sure that a court of equity would not allow the set-off of such a judgment debt as this due from the assignor before notice of the assignment as such, I mean as a judgment debt; and it may be that such a judgment could only be challenged by the assignee on the ground of collusion or fraud. It is quite unnecessary to decide that question in the present case, because here it appears that either the plaintiff made no attempt to challenge the accuracy of the judgment, or, if he did, the Court decided against him on that point, and if it did decide against him on that point, that would be a decision of fact as to which there is no appeal to this Court.

In my opinion, on the facts as found by the county court Judge, the allowance of the set-off was perfectly right in law, and I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (Branson, J.) 1927. Mar. 28.

O'CEDAR, LIMITED v. SLOUGH TRADING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Landlord and Tenant—Fire insurance—Demise by plaintiffs' lessors of adjoining premises for business causing increase of premium on the plaintiffs' premises—Claim against lessors.

The defendants, the owners of premises, demised them to the plaintiffs, who covenanted (inter alia) "not to do or suffer anything which may render any increased or extra premium payable for the insurance of the said demised premises or other premises adjacent thereto against fire or which may make void or voidable any policy for such insurance." The plaintiffs also covenanted to pay for the insurance of the premises. Subsequently the plaintiffs surrendered a part of the premises to the defendants, who then demised the surrendered part to a woodworker, with the result that the plaintiffs' payments in respect of premiums for insurance against fire were greatly increased.

Held, that neither on the basis of an implied correlative obligation nor on the basis of a derogation from their grant were the defendants liable to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the increased premiums.

The plaintiffs in this action sought to recover from the defendants the difference between the premiums which the plaintiffs had to pay for the insurance of their premises and stock against fire before and after the demise by the defendants, their landlords, of adjoining premises to a worker in wood. The facts fully appear from the judgment.

Mr. Alexander Grant, K.C., and the Hon. H. Fletcher Moulton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. F. K. Archer, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Branson.—This is an action for damages brought in the following circumstances: The defendants are the owners of the Slough Trading Estate at Slough, and their business is to let buildings upon that estate to persons prepared to rent them for the purpose of using them for factories and the like. The plaintiffs, whose name was originally the Channell Chemical Company, Limited, are manufacturers of mops and polishes. By indenture dated May 31, 1922, the defendants demised to the plaintiffs a part of No. 8 building on the said estate for a term of 21 years at a rent of £3,700 per annum. The plaintiffs also agreed to pay "as additional rent" an amount equal to that which the defendants might expend in effecting or maintaining the insurance of the demised premises against fire, and such amount was made recoverable by distress. Of the other material clauses in the lease Clause 8 says : "The lessees will not carry on or permit upon the said demised premises any noxious or offensive trade or business or do or suffer any other thing which may render any increased or extra premium payable for the insurance of the said demised premises or other premises adjacent thereto against fire or which may make void or voidable any policy for such insurance"—and goes on to prevent that prohibition from preventing the plaintiffs from carrying on the business of making mops and polishes. Then Clause 16 provides that "in case the said premises or any part thereof shall at any time be destroyed or so damaged by fire as to be unfit for occupation or use and shall not be rebuilt or reinstated by the lessors within twelve calendar months," then the rent is to abate. Clause 19 contains a covenant by the lessors, that they will adequately insure and keep insured the said demised premises against fire, and will rebuild or reinstate, and a covenant for quiet enjoyment. By a further indenture dated June 22, 1922, the defendants demised to the plaintiffs the rest of the building No. 8 on the same terms. At the outset the defendants, who had a general policy covering all their buildings at a flat rate of 2s. 6d. per cent., allowed the plaintiffs the benefit of that rate, but at the end of 1922 they decided to discontinue this method of dealing with the matter and sought to make the plaintiffs pay 10s. per cent. To this the plaintiffs objected, and on January 6, 1923, the defendants agreed that if the plaintiffs could effect an insurance upon the building at a less rate they might do so as agents for the defendants. This was done, the plaintiffs effecting an insurance with the Prudential Assurance Company, Limited, on the building and on the plaintiffs' plant therein at a rate of 2s. 6d. per cent. At that time the plaintiffs did not use the machinery in the building for making packing cases. At a subsequent period, however, they began to use it for making their own packing cases, with the result that the rate was raised to 3s. on the building and 3s. 6d. on the contents, at which rate it remained until the happening of the events which give rise to the present claim. Meantime, on May 2, 1924, by deed of surrender of that date, the plaintiffs surrendered to the defendants a portion, about one-third, of building No. 8. This deed contained a covenant by the plaintiffs to build a party wall to separate the surrendered portion from that retained by them, and a wall was built accordingly. On March 24, 1925, the defendants let the surrendered portion of building No. 8 to one Davies, a woodworker and maker of aeronautical parts and motor bodies. The terms of this lease were in all material respects the same as those of the lease to the plaintiffs. On September 1, 1925, it having come to the knowledge of the Prudential Assurance Company that the surrendered portion of the premises had been let as a woodworking factory, they raised the rate for insurance to one guinea per cent. for the remainder of the currency of the policy and refused to renew it. After considerable trouble the plaintiffs succeeded in effecting other insurances at a rate averaging 18s. 9d. An effort was made by the defendants to combat the suggestion that this rise in the premiums demanded from the plaintiffs was due to the letting of the surrendered portion of the premises as a woodworking factory. But the evidence satisfied me that if these premises had not been let for such a purpose the plaintiffs would have been able to continue insuring their premises at 3s. 6d.

The present action is brought by the plaintiffs to recover the difference between the 3s. and the 3s. 6d. per cent. which they used to pay and the 18s. 9d. which they now have to pay and will have to pay in the future so long as Davies uses the premises demised to him for the purposes for which they were demised. Mr. Grant puts his case in two ways : (1) He says that when the defendants put the plaintiffs under an obligation to do nothing which might render any increased or extra premiums payable for fire insurance upon the demised building or buildings adjacent thereto they impliedly came under a correlative obligation not to do anything on their part which would render an increased premium payable for fire insurance upon the demised premises. For this proposition he relies upon Barnes v. City of London Real Property Company (34 The Times L.R., 361 ; [1918] 2 Ch., 18). In my opinion that case has nothing to do with the present one. There the decision was that the reservation of a rent for the purpose of providing a housekeeper implied a correlative obligation on the part of the landlords to give an equivalent for that for which the rent was reserved. It was said by way of illustration that if there was a reservation of rent in favour of a lessor for the purpose of effecting insurance against fire on the property there must be an obligation on his part to employ the money paid him for insurance in effecting the insurance. Apart from the fact that in this case the correlative obligation to effect the insurance is express, that is a very different thing from saying, as I am asked to say here, that when a lessor puts his lessee under an obligation not to use the demised premises in a particular way he thereby becomes bound to his lessee not to use the remainder of his land in the way in question. I know of no authority for such a proposition, nor does it seem to me that it can possibly be sound. Secondly, it is said that the defendants' action, resulting as it has in making it necessary for the plaintiffs to pay vastly increased premiums in order to carry out their obligation to insure the premises, is a breach of the covenant to be implied in the lease that the lessors will not derogate from their own grant. This renders it necessary for me to consider the extent and application of the principle upon which Mr. Grant relies. The principle has been stated on various occasions. It is clear that when premises are let for a particular purpose the lessor must not do anything which would frustrate the purpose for which they were let, see per Lord Loreburn in Lyttelton Times Company Limited v. Warners Limited (23 The Times L.R., 751 ; [1907] A.C., 476, at p. 481) ; and this is the case although that which is done by the lessor, and which results in the frustration, may have no physical effect upon the demised premises. (Harmer v. Jumbil (Nigeria) Tin Areas, Limited, 37 The Times L.R., 91 ; [1921] 1 Ch., 200.) If there had been evidence to show that the action of the defendants had rendered it impossible in a commercial sense to insure these buildings at all, which as a matter of fact could only be the case if the adjoining premises had been let for some wholly unusual and unexpected purpose, different considerations might well apply.

In the case before me, however, the purpose for which the premises were demised to the plaintiffs has not been frustrated by what has been done by the defendants. The plaintiffs can still conduct their business as they were able to do before the surrendered premises were let to Davies. The premium they have to pay is still much less than ordinary commercial businesses of some kinds have to pay. For instance, woodworking factories working for the trade often pay as much as 50s. per cent., and most woodworkers not less than 21s. But the advent of Davies has resulted in its costing the plaintiffs £600 or £700 a year more than it used to do to fulfil their covenant to pay for the insurance of the premises. It therefore becomes material to consider whether the principle that a lessor may not derogate from his grant extends beyond cases in which the purpose of the grant is frustrated to cases in which that purpose can still be achieved albeit at a greater expense or with less convenience. That it does not extend to prevent any interference at all with the enjoyment of the property demised is beyond doubt. This appears from Robinson v. Kilvert (41 Ch.D., 88) and Browne v. Flower ([1911] 1 Ch., 219). There must be a substantial interference with the use of the premises for the purposes for which they were demised. I was invited by Mr. Archer to hold that mere interference, although it may be substantial, is not enough, but that the principle applies only in cases in which that which has been done frustrates the purpose for which the premises were demised to the lessee. This appears to me to be contrary to the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead and Co. (10 The Times L.R., 452 ; [1894] 2 Ch., 437), where a substantial interference with the purpose for which the premises had been demised was held to entitle the lessee to damages although it was not suggested that that purpose had been frustrated. Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead and Co. (supra) and Browne v. Flower (supra) were treated by the Court of Appeal in Harmer v. Jumbil (Nigeria) Tin Areas, Limited (supra) as stating the principle correctly. I see no reason in logic or fairness for limiting the application of the principle to cases in which there has been a complete frustration of the purpose for which the premises were demised. The fact remains, however, that, as was said by Lord Justice Younger in Harmer v. Jumbil (Nigeria) Tin Areas, Limited (supra), the obligation laid upon the grantor is not unqualified. It must in every case be construed fairly, even strictly, if not narrowly. It must be such as in view of the circumstances was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time when the transaction was entered into. It is convenient at this stage to deal with Mr. Archer's contention that the principle that a grantor must not derogate from his own grant has no application at all to the present case, by reason of the fact that the premises let to Davies were originally granted to the plaintiffs and were then surrendered to the defendants, so that in respect of these premises the plaintiffs and not the defendants are the grantors. In the view which I take of the case it is not material for me to decide this point. I content myself with saying that it might well constitute a difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs, because if the defendants' contract not to derogate from their grant is to be implied upon the original lease it could not apply to these premises which were included in the original lease, and the surrender contains no new grant by the defendants to the plaintiffs of the premises not surrendered.

Now I proceed, for the purposes of my judgment, upon the assumption that there is nothing in this point, and that the position created by the original lease and the surrender is as it would have been had the original lease contained only those premises now held by the plaintiffs and had the premises now let to Davies been then left in the hands of the defendants. In my judgment even so the principle involved by the plaintiffs does not assist them in this case. The contention is that by doing upon the adjoining land something which is not in itself unreasonable or unbusinesslike, which has not affected the demised premises physically in any way, and which has not rendered it less easy or less legal to carry on upon them the business for which they were demised, but which has had the effect of adding substantially to the expense of carrying on that business there, the defendants have derogated from their grant. I should be extending its application into a region quite different from that in which it has hitherto been applied if I were to hold that it applies to anything which is done by a lessor upon adjoining land, and which, whilst not otherwise affecting the demised premises or their use in any way, merely makes it more expensive for the lessee to carry on his business in the demised premises than it was before. I do not think such a case comes within that principle at all. It might as well be said that if the defendants had begun to pay higher wages in the adjoining factories on their land, and thereby raised the price of labour in the neighbourhood, the plaintiffs would have had an action for damages upon this principle. And many other instances might be cited, for it is difficult to place any limit upon the application of the principle, if it extends to such a case as the present. Mr. Grant relies upon the inclusion in the lease of the covenant by the plaintiffs not to do anything on the demised premises which might make it more expensive to insure the adjoining premises as indicating that a similar covenant on the part of the defendants should be implied as having been within the contemplation of the parties. To my mind it leads rather to the opposite conclusion. The fact that something done on one set of premises might affect the rate of insurance payable upon adjoining ones was obviously present in the minds of both the parties—a covenant by one party in relation thereto was inserted and none by the other. I cannot think that it was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties that the defendants were putting themselves under such an obligation to the plaintiffs as that contended for in this case.

The action fails and must be dismissed, with costs.

IN RE ROPNER SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED, AND CLEEVES WESTERN VALLEYS ANTHRACITE COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Shipping — Charterparty—Demurrage—Owners bunkering ship during demurrage time—Claim for demurrage during non-working hours of bunkering days.

Where, after a chartered ship had come on demurrage, the owners withdrew her from her loading position into a position in which they could put bunkers into her, demurrage was held not to run against the charterers during the bunkering days.

Budgett and Co. v. Binnington and Co. (7 The Times L.R., 15 ; [1891] 1 Q.B., 35), and Cantiere Navale Triestina v. Handelsvertretung der Russ. Soz. Föd. Soviet Republik Naphtha

Export (41 The Times L.R., 355 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 172) distinguished.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Roche upon a special case stated by an arbitrator.

By a charterparty dated October 15, 1925, made between the Ropner Shipping Company, the shipowners, and the Cleeves Western Valleys Anthracite Collieries, Limited, the charterers, it was agreed that the steamer Levenpool should proceed to the King's Dock, Swansea, and there load a cargo of coal for carriage to Vancouver. The charterparty provided (inter alia) : (3) the cargo to be loaded in 150 running hours (excluding bunkering time, Sundays, and certain holidays), and if detained longer the charterers to pay demurrage at a fixed rate for every running hour. With this exception the charter contained no provision relating to bunkering.

Working hours at Swansea were from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. on weekdays, other than Saturdays, on which the hours were from 6 a.m. to noon. No work was done on Sundays.

The shipowners claimed 92¾ hours demurrage, amounting to £92 16s. 8d. Loading hours began to run at 9 a.m. on November 10, 1925. The 150 hours running time for loading expired at 9 a.m. on November 18, 1925, and the Levenpool then came on demurrage. After the 150 hours running time had expired, but before the loading had been completed, the shipowners moved the ship from the position in which she had been taking cargo to a position where she could take in bunkers, and she was engaged in bunkering during parts of six days, during the whole of which time, with the exception of a few hours of loading which intervened between two of the last stages of the bunkering, the steamer was withdrawn from the occupation of the loading of cargo. The shipowners contended that demurrage ran continuously from the expiry of the 150 running hours until the completion of the loading. But as a concession, they made no claim in respect of the time when bunkering was actually proceeding. Their claim was consequently limited to the non-working hours of the bunkering days, or, what were referred to as the night hours of the bunkering days.

The charterers contended that during the whole of the time during which the vessel was used solely for bunkering, and was not shifted back so as to be available for loading cargo, she was not at their disposal, and therefore that they were not liable for demurrage during that period.

The umpire rejected the charterers' contention, upheld that of the owners, and awarded that the charterers were liable to pay demurrage in respect of the night hours of the bunkering days.

Mr. Justice Roche held that as there was no finding that bunkering was necessary for the safety of the ship or for the prosecution of the loading, and no finding that cargo was not available for loading during the bunkering days, the charterers were entitled to have the vessel available for loading during the whole of the demurrage time, and the shipowners could not claim to break into that time for the purpose of the bunkering, and they were not entitled to claim demurrage during the non-working hours of the bunkering days.

The shipowners appealed.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. W. L. McNair appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. James Dickinson for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said :— This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Roche upon a special case stated by an arbitrator. It raises what is undoubtedly, in reference to this class of charterparty, an important question, and, to some extent, an interesting question. I wish, if I can, to make my judgment quite plain in reference to the facts upon which I consider I have to pass judgment, and to make it quite plain on the points which I do decide and the points which I do not decide or do not desire to decide. Now, the claim was for demurrage in respect of the detention of a vessel beyond her lay days. It is not in dispute that there was a breach on the part of the charterers of the obligation to load within the given lay days, and it is not in dispute that the vessel then came on demurrage under a charter which provided not for a fixed demurrage time but for payment at a fixed rate in respect of the time for which the vessel was on demurrage. The dispute arose in reference to the time which was occupied in bunkering the vessel while she was on demurrage, the shipowners alleging that they were entitled to payment at the demurrage rate for the whole of the period during which the vessel was being bunkered ; that is to say, not only the working hours during which the bunkering was proceeding, but the whole period covered by the time during which the vessel was being bunkered. The charterers, on the other hand, contended that the shipowners were not entitled to any demurrage in respect of that particular period of time.

Now, the matter went to arbitration, and the arbitrator stated a special case. The arbitrator set out in his special case the contentions on the one side and the other. The contentions as made by the shipowners before the arbitrator are, in my opinion, confined to contentions of law, the contention being in substance that because the vessel had come on demurrage, the shipowners being occupied merely in bunkering, demurrage was as a matter of law necessarily payable during the whole of the bunkering period. The contention of the charterers, on the other hand, was that they ought not to pay demurrage at all in respect of any part of the time during which the vessel, in their own language, was used solely for bunkering. I do not think that before the arbitrator it was said on behalf of the shipowners, "the time occupied by bunkering was a time selected as a convenient time because there was no cargo available at the time for loading and we, therefore, occupied the time, which would otherwise have been wasted time, in bunkering ; and that being so, it is not open to you, the charterers, to contend that you are relieved from your obligation to pay at the demurrage rate for the whole of that period." I do not understand that any such case was made before the arbitrator, and I do not think the arbitrator has dealt with the matter on that footing ; he has dealt with it on the footing that the issue was, on the one side, that it was immaterial whether the cargo was available or not, and that as a matter of law the charterers were liable for demurrage, and on the other side was, that it was not so, because the vessel was used solely for bunkering. That was the case submitted to the Court by the arbitrator. I think that was the case submitted to the arbitrator and that is the only case with which Mr. Justice Roche had, or we have, to deal with.

Now, the charterparty was one which provided a fixed time for loading—150 running hours—and there was a provision that, if bunkering took place during the running hours, the bunkering time was not to count. There was no other provision at all with regard to bunkering. Therefore, the position was this : the shipowners might have selected part of the running time for bunkering ; they might have decided that they would bunker during the running time, and, if they did, the exception clause would apply. They might have decided to wait to bunker until the cargo was completely loaded, in which case no question of the kind which we have to decide would have arisen; or they might have decided, as they did decide, to bunker after the running hours had expired but before the cargo was completely loaded. He, therefore, had the option of selecting one or more of those three periods. Of course, if they are right in their contention, the middle of the three periods is the most favourable for them because they would then be able to carry out the bunkering of the vessel, which in this case occupied a considerable time, and claim demurrage at the charterparty rate for the whole of that time. But, prima facie, that does not seem to be reasonable, although, of course, it may be the law.

One has also to bear in mind, in reference to the authorities which have been cited, the facts in those cases upon which the decisions were arrived at. Now three cases have been cited to us, two of them proceeding purely upon the same principle and the other proceeding on the same principle but on rather different facts. Both in the case of Cantiere Navale Triestina v. Russ. Soz. Föd. Soviet Republik Naphtha Export (41 The Times L.R., 355; [1925] 2 K.B., 172) and in the case of Budgett and Co. v. Binnington and Co. (7 The Times L.R., 15; [1891] 1 Q.B., 35) the point was this. There being a contract time either for loading or for unloading, the charterers were relieved from the obligation so undertaken by them simply because, for some reason or another, they were not able to occupy the whole of that time in either loading or unloading. It was said in those cases that in order to excuse themselves the charterers must show that the particular facts on which they relied, as preventing the loading or unloading, were facts which came into existence because of some wrongful act on the part of the shipowners—it was not sufficient that the ship was not at their disposal, provided that it was not at their disposal for some cause other than a wrongful act of the shipowners. The other case, the case of Houlder v. Weir (21 The Times L.R., 503; [1905] 2 K.B., 267) was a decision of Mr. Justice Channell, and proceeded on the same principle, but there the facts were facts which involved an act of the shipowners themselves—not an act such as a strike, as there was in the case of Budgett and Co. v. Binnington and Co. (supra), or an act of a superior force or Government, as in the Cantiere Navale Triestina case (supra). It was, in the case of Houlder v. Weir (supra), the act of the shipowners themselves, and there Mr. Justice Channell, who decided the case, had regard to the special facts of that case, which were that the act of the shipowners, which prevented the charterers from fulfilling their part of the contract, was an act which was necessary to be done in order to secure the safety of the ship and cargo and to be done at that particular time.

Now, here I will not say what my decision would have been if the case had been presented to the arbitrator that this bunkering, at the time when it took place, was either done at that particular time in order to trim the vessel, or for something of that kind, or done because at that time there was no cargo available. Nothing of that kind, in my opinion, arises here. We have to deal simply with the case that the shipowners selected this particular time in which to do the bunkering for no reason at all except that it was the most convenient time for them to do it. In those circumstances, what is the law? In my opinion, the general rule laid down in Lord Justice Scrutton's book on charterparties which has been referred to, "When once a vessel is on demurrage no exception will operate to prevent demurrage continuing to be payable," has no application to this particular case, nor have the decisions which I have referred to in the Cantiere Navale Triestina case (supra) or in the case of Budgett and Co. v. Binnington and Co. (supra), because what we have to deal with is a case where it is admitted by the shipowners that they were in default.

The only question is whether under contract between the charterers and the shipowners, not contained in the charterparty, the charterers are under an obligation to pay on demurrage damages, if I may use that expression, in respect of the particular period selected by the shipowners to occupy the ship entirely for their own purposes—namely, bunkering. In my opinion, this being a claim for demurrage, damages payable to the shipowners in respect of the detention of the vessel by the charterers, it does not lie in the mouth of the shipowners to say that the vessel was being detained in the way suggested during the time when they, for their own convenience, were bunkering the vessel—and that that detention covers the whole period, not merely the working hours during which the bunkering was actually taking place, but the whole period referred to in the arbitrator's award—namely, the period from the time when the bunkering commenced, until the time when the bunkering finished. I think that is, in substance, entirely in agreement with the view of Mr. Justice Roche on that point, and I think his judgment was entirely right.

A great point has been made by Mr. Le Quesne as to the onus of proof. I do not think that that arises here, having regard to the case which was submitted by the arbitrator, and submitted by him because of the case which was fought before him. I treat this case as one in which we are asked to decide what the position in law is where the vessel has been used by the shipowners for their own purposes and for no special reason other than that it was convenient for them during the period when she was on demurrage, and where because she was being so used she was no longer available for the charterers to load. For those reasons, I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I am of the same opinion. The short point, and the only point, which I think was decided by the arbitrator was this: demurrage having begun to run, when the cargo had not been entirely loaded, the shipowners, for their own convenience, shifted the position of the vessel from a point where it was adapted to receive cargo, to a point where it was adapted only to receive bunker coal, and proceeded during a number of days to bunker the vessel, rendering it in fact impossible during that period for the charterers to continue the loading of the cargo. Yet the shipowners are alleging that demurrage is payable by the charterers during the whole of the period during which the shipowners were using the vessel for their own purposes, and were rendering the vessel unavailable for the purposes of the charterers. To my mind that is extremely bold, to say the least of it, and I do not think it is justified. It appears to me, in order that demurrage may be payable the shipowners must at least do nothing to prevent the vessel from being available and at the disposal of the charterers for the purpose of completing the loading of the cargo. That, to my mind, disposes of the case entirely.

We have had a very ingenious argument by Mr. Le Quesne on the question whether the charterers should not have shown, not only that the vessel was rendered unavailable for loading, but also that they had cargo ready to load upon the vessel. On that point I agree with the view which has been expressed by Mr. Justice Roche. It seems to me when it is once shown that the vessel had been placed in a position, by the act of the shipowners, which rendered it unavailable for the charterers' purposes in loading cargo, that then it would be for the shipowners claiming demurrage to show that the charterers had not in fact cargo available for loading, during the period while the shipowners were using the vessel for their own purposes, in bunkering, but that I do not think was really a point which was ever before the arbitrator or raised between the parties. I think the question that was raised and was decided was the simple question which I stated at the beginning of my judgment.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

CLARE AND HEYWORTH v. BETTS.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Schedule D—Profits of trade—Three years' average not applicable—Period over which average to be taken—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and II., Rule 1 (2).

The appellant firm began a new business on March 1, 1919, and made up their first account on December 31, 1919. On March 1, 1920, they sold the business to the appellant company, which decided to make up its accounts to March 31 in each year and accordingly made up an account for three months ending March 31, 1920. It was agreed that the assessment to income-tax, Schedule D, for the year ending April 5, 1920, ought to be apportioned between the firm and the company.

Held, that under Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D the liability to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1920, should be based on a fair and just average, for a year, of the profits from March 1, 1919, to April 5, 1919, without bringing in any profits of the year of charge at all.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 479 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 289) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 479 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 289), reversing an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (41 The Times L.R., 561 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 402), on a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The question for determination was as to the correct mode of computing the profits of a trade set up within three years of the year of assessment. The question depended upon the true construction of Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D. of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The rule applicable to Case I. provided that the tax should extend to every trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere (subject to certain immaterial exceptions) "and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains upon a fair and just average of three years ending on that day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade have been usually made up or on the 5th day of April preceding the year of assessment."

Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. was as follows :—

"Where the trade, profession, employment, or vocation has been set up and commenced within the said period of three years, the computation shall be made on the average of the profits or gains for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same, and where it has been set up and commenced within the year of assessment the computation shall be made according to the rules applicable to Case VI."

The trade of the appellants, which was that of textile manufacturers, was begun on March 1, 1919. The first accounts of the trade were made up for a period of ten months, beginning on March 1, 1919, and ending on December 31, 1919, and they disclosed a profit of £1,000.

For the first year of charge of the trade—namely, the income-tax year, April 6, 1918, to April 5, 1919, the profits were taken to be £117, and an assessment for that year was made accordingly. The figure of £117 was arrived at by taking a due proportion of the above-mentioned profit of £1,000 for the 36 days during which the trade had been carried on in that year. No question arose on the appeal with regard to the assessment for 1918-19, and it had not been disputed by the appellants. A second set of accounts of the trade had been made up for the three months beginning on January 1, 1920, and, the period being one of great prosperity, the profits shown by the accounts amounted to £12,150.

The date, December 31, 1919, up to which the first accounts were taken and which resulted in the above-mentioned period of ten months, was adopted for purposes of excess profits duty and in view of the expected termination of that impost. The date, March 31, 1920, up to which the second accounts were taken, resulting in the above-mentioned period of three months, was adopted because it had been decided that for the future the financial year of the business should terminate on that date.

Assessments were made for the income-tax year 1919-20 (being the second year of the trade) in respect of the profits of the trade by the additional commissioners for the East Morley Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the appellants appealed to the Special Commissioners against the assessments under section 148 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The method employed in making those assessments was to combine the profits for the 13 months, March 1, 1919, to March 31, 1920—namely, £13,150—and to assess twelve-thirteenths of that total, with the result that £12,138 was charged to tax for that year.

It was contended for the appellants that upon the true construction of Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D the proper figure at which the profits should be taken for the year 1919-20 was £1,200, being twelve-tenths of the amount of £1,000 shown in the above-mentioned accounts for the ten months from March 1, 1919, to December 31, 1919, and that the accounts for the later period of three months from January 1, 1920, to March 31,

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1920, showing a figure of profits of £12,150, should be disregarded.

It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes that under the rule in question both the said accounts should be taken into consideration for the purpose of arriving at the figure of profits for the year of charge 1919-20, and that in effect the figures of the two accounts for the respective periods of ten and three months ought to be combined, so as to produce a figure of £13,150 for the 13 months March 1, 1919, to March 31, 1920, and that twelve-thirteenths of that figure—namely, £12,138—ought to be taken as the profits for the year of charge April 6, 1919, to April 5, 1920.

In the course of the year of charge the ownership of the trade had changed, the business which previously had been carried on by a partnership firm trading as Clare and Heyworth being transferred on March 1, 1920, to Clare and Heyworth, Limited, but it was conceded that that change of ownership of the trade did not affect the question raised in the appeal with regard to the amount at which the profits of the trade for the year of charge were to be taken.

Of the assessments appealed against, two were made upon the firm and one upon the company, but no question arose as to the person to be assessed.

The Special Commissioners decided that the appellants' liability should be based on the accounts to December 31, 1919, without regard to the accounts to March 31, 1920, and they reduced the assessment to £1,200.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners on the ground that the terminus ad quem of the period over which the average was to be calculated in the case of such recently established businesses was the beginning of the year of charge—namely, in this case April 5, 1919, and that, although the accounts for the ten months up to December 31, 1919, might be looked at, as being evidence of the amount of that average, the accounts for the first three months of 1920 could not be taken into consideration. His decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant, Lord Justice Scrutton dissenting).

Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellants; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondent.

Their Lordships reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal and restored the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords: This appeal raises the question how the Income Tax Act, 1918, computes taxable profits, where a trade has been first set up a few weeks before the commencement of the year of charge. The Crown affirms and the subject denies that, in such a case, the Inland Revenue is at liberty to bring into the computation the profits of so much of the year of charge itself as will make up a complete twelvemonth and even, if circumstances require it the profits of the whole of the year of charge. The subject contends that except in the case of a trade set up within the year of assessment, the profits must be computed without bringing in any profits of the year of charge at all.

The appellants, Clare and Heyworth, started a trade and then sold it to Clare and Heyworth, Limited. Both are joined in this appeal because the firm was assessed in respect of one year and the company in respect of the next, but nothing now turns on the distinction between them, for the partners in the firm hold the shares in the company. It is also admitted by the appellants that the business is for assessment purposes one continuous business.

The dates are as follow. The firm began business on March 1, 1919. The company was incorporated on February 16, 1920, and on March 1, 1920, it adopted the agreement for the purchase of the firm's business. Since then the company has carried on the business begun by the firm.

In 1922 and 1923 assessments were made on the firm and on the company for the year April 6, 1919, to April 5, 1920. The practical importance of the dispute turns on the liability to tax in respect of a sharp increase of profit made in the three months from January 1 to March 31, 1920. When the assessment for the year 1919-1920 came to be made, the question arose whether this profit could be included in the computation of the tax for that year under Schedule D.

The appellant firm was assessed for the year 1918-19 in respect of the period March 1, 1919, to April 5, 1919, in the sum of £117. This was ascertained as follows. The firm made up a balance-sheet to December 31, 1919, for the ten months from March 1, 1919, which showed £1,000 profit. The sum of £117 was computed as the proportional part of this profit for the period from March 1 to April 5, 1919. The date, December 31, 1919, was selected for the purposes of excess profits duty. This has not been adopted by the company as the date at which to make up its annual balance-sheets. The date selected in subsequent years has been March 31.

For the year 1919-1920 the appellants (who have to apportion between themselves whatever tax may be payable) have contended that the assessment on the company ought to be on the profits actually made between March 1, 1919, and April 5, 1919, expanded to an entire twelvemonth by a process of "averaging," thus representing for income-tax purposes the profits of the following year of charge. The Inland Revenue contends that the statutory mode of computation allows the profits actually made after April 5, 1919, during the year of charge to be brought in, thus including the three months of exceptional prosperity in 1920. Whether the part of the year of charge thus to be included is only such part as would make up a complete twelve months, when added to the period from March 1 to April 5, 1919, or is extended to the whole of the year of charge in a similar case, constituted an alternative contention.

The Special Commissioners adopted the subjects' contention and their conclusion was affirmed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt. His decision was reversed in the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Scrutton dissenting. The only authorities on the point were both decided in the Court of Session—namely, S.S. Glensloy Company v. Lethem ([1914] S.C., 549) and Burntisland Shipping Company v. Weldhen ([1923] S.C., 449).

It is to the actual wording of the relevant cases and rules under Schedule D that one must first turn, and these are the rule applicable to Case I. and the first rule, subsection (2), of those applicable to Cases I. and II. These must be read together, the latter being in the nature of a proviso on the former, and for this purpose the rule applicable only to Case II., which comes between them in the Act, may be ignored. With great respect to Lord Justice Sargant, I am unable to adopt the principle on which his judgment is so largely founded—namely, that these rules should be treated as entirely independent enactments.

By the rule applicable to Case I. the tax (that is, the tax under Schedule D charged under Case I. "in respect of any trade not contained in any other schedule") "shall be computed on the full amount of the . . . profits . . . upon a fair and just average of three years " ending in this case, where the accounts of the trade had not been usually made up to any date, on April 5, 1919. As, however, there were not three years of trading before that date, it becomes necessary to proceed to the words of Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II.—namely, " where the trade . . . has been set up . . . within the said period of three years " (i.e., before the eve of the year of charge) " the computation shall be made on the average of the profits . . . for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same."

If these words mean on the average of the profits for one year from the first setting up, if and when the date of the setting up was as much as one year from the commencement of the year of charge, then they do not apply to this case. If so, however, the rule itself does not apply to this case at all, for the following words only relegate the computation of the profits to another case, viz., Case VI., where the trade has been set up within the year of assessment, and thus no rule deals with the case of a trade set up within three years of the beginning of the year of charge but not so much as a complete year before it.

On such a construction what at first sight appears to have been a complete formula for computing tax in all the possible cases, dividing them into cases where the trade has been, and the cases where it has not been, set up before the commencement of the year of charge, contains an obvious gap, in which the present case falls and remains unprovided for. Does the formula really leave such a gap, or does it, truly construed, cover this case as well as the other ?

My Lords, the words in Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II.—" within the said period of three years "—refer to the rule applicable to Case I. and virtually incorporate them as follows : " three years ending on . . . the fifth day of April preceding the year of assessment." If these words be written into the later rule, clearly the present case falls within them in point of time. The question then is whether or not it is nevertheless taken out of them again, because the words following are inapplicable to it, viz., " on the average of the profits . . . for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same." It is not " profits made during one year, &c.," nor would there be any occasion to employ the device of an average, if the only reference is to a case where the trade has been set up for a year or more and the amount of the last year's profits can be taken and taxed as the profits of the next year, namely, the year of charge. What is contemplated is a computation, which, by means of an average, will get at profits for a year as well as one which will proceed on a computation of " profits for a year," that is, of annual profits, extracted out of a period of a year or more by the process of averaging the profits of that more extended period.

The language of the rule in the present Consolidation Act differs from that in which it is expressed in the Act of 1842. It previously ran : " provided always that in cases where the trade . . . shall have been set up . . . within the said period of three years, the computation shall be made for one year on the average of the balance of the profits and gains from the period of first setting up the same." This, though archaic and cumbrous, at any rate as a proviso to the case of trades set up three years or more before the year of charge, covers both the remaining cases of setting up trade before the commencement of the year of charge, viz., a setting up more and a setting up less than one year before it, and the same formula is used for both. Presumably a Consolidation Act introduces no changes except of words and arrangement. If this change in words, or rather the change made in their order by transposing the words " for one year," nevertheless made a change in the meaning on ordinary principles of construction, it would be necessary to give effect to it, but on consideration I do not think that it does.

No real assistance seems to be derivable from the rules applicable to other schedules than D, or to other forms of taxable property than profits and gains. I think that counsel for the Inland Revenue was warranted in saying that, if the Act does not confine the computation to a period ending just before the commencement of the year of charge by the express language in which the rule is couched, then nothing is prescribed as to the method by which the computation in the present case is to be made, and it must be made on such facts as are available. This would permit recourse to the profits made in the year of charge or part of it. The symmetry of the general scheme might be thereby impaired, but the method of computation in question must necessarily be a matter for express prescription, and not an inference from other cases, in which it is expressly prescribed, to the present, as to which it is not. In any case, the so-called scheme, which substitutes a notional year's profits, taken before the year of charge, for the actual profits made in the year of charge, is departed from, symmetry or no symmetry, when the business is set up in the year of charge. If the scheme is inapplicable in one case, why not in two ? The Act leaves it there. I should agree with this, if I did not think that on the proper construction of the material rule the present computation falls within it.

So far as authority goes the Burntisland case (supra) supports the view which I have felt constrained to take. The Lord President and Lord Cullen have given clear and terse explanations of the method prescribed, which I respectfully adopt. The contrary construction, adopted in the earlier Glensloy case (supra) is weakened by the misapprehension, into which the Court seems to have fallen there, as to the connexion of the words " balance of profits or gains " with some balance-sheet of the taxpayer's, supposedly drawn up for a period of a year ending during the year of charge. I think that the appeal should be allowed and that the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, which affirmed the Special Commissioners' decision, should be restored on the grounds above mentioned. There may have been other points arising out of the assessment which, had the amount at stake been greater, would have been successfully disputed. These have not been raised before your Lordships and accordingly no opinion upon them is involved in this conclusion. I move your Lordships accordingly.

I am desired to add that my noble and learned friend, Lord Carson, concurs in this opinion and motion.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : This is an appeal from an order of his Majesty's Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Lords Justices Scrutton and Sargant), dated April 26, 1926, reversing an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt dated June 18, 1925, affirming the decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts (hereinafter referred to as " the Commissioners ") upon a case stated by the Commissioners for the opinion of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, pursuant to section 149 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The question for decision in the case turns upon the construction of the relevant provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and resolves itself into this, whether in computing the trading profits of the appellants for assessment under Case I. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the year ending April 5, 1920 (the appellants' second year of assessment) the trading profits made in that year should be taken into account in arriving at the measure of the liability to be taxed. No question of figures arises in the case.

Profits of trade are subjected to income-tax under Case I. of Schedule D, the relevant statutory provisions being contained in the Income Tax Act of 1918.

Those portions of the Schedule run as follows :—

"1. Tax under this Schedule shall be charged in respect of—"(a) The annual profits or gains arising or accruing . . .

"(ii) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation, whether the same be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere" ;

"in each case for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of the profits or gains."

"2. Tax under this Schedule shall be charged under the following cases respectively ; that is to say,—

"Case I.—Tax in respect of any trade not contained in any other Schedule ; . . . and subject to and in accordance with the rules applicable to the said cases respectively."

The rule applicable to Case I. runs as follows :—"The tax shall extend to every trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere other than a trade relating to lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages directed to be charged under Schedule A. and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains upon a fair and just average of three years ending on that day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade have been usually made up." This is the main and general provision of the Act. From its terms it is clear that the materials upon which the assessment is to be made are the average of the profits and the gains made in the three years immediately preceding the year of assessment. The profits and gains made in any particular portion of the year of assessment are apparently not to be taken into account in making this assessment. That would seem to be clear.

Provision is made in Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. for cases where a trade, profession, employment, or vocation is set up and commenced within this period of three years. The rule in clear and explicit language enacts that the computation shall in that case be made on the average of the profits and gains for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same. This portion of the rule is very inappropriately worded. It apparently refers only to the profits and gains for one year, the first year of the trading, but an average, properly speaking, can only be made when one has two or more things to compare. What the provision may fairly be construed to mean, I think, is that the rate of profit made in the first year of trading may be taken to have continued to be reached during the period from the end of the first year in which the trade is carried on up to the first day of the year of assessment. For instance, if the profits made in the first year of trading were on an average of the 52 weeks £10 per week, the profits for the second year of trading may be taken as £10 a week. The rate of profit can be ascertained by taking an average on the 52 weeks of the first year. There is nothing unreasonable or unfair to a trader in holding that during the time which elapses between the end of the year in which he commenced to trade and the first day of the subsequent year of assessment he will be assumed to continue to make profits at the same rate at which he made them during the first year of his trading. This would appear, to me, at all events, clear, that the general rule is not to be departed from, and that profits made during any portion of the year of assessment are not to be taken into account in cases such as this. Where the trade has been set up within the year of assessment neither the general rule nor the last-mentioned method of calculation can apply, and accordingly a special provision is made for it. That provision is contained in the last 2½ lines of Rule 1 (2), Cases I. and II., and runs thus : "Where it (i.e., the trade, &c.) has been set up and commenced within the year of assessment the computation shall be made according to the rules applicable to Case VI." On turning to those rules one finds that by the second of them it is provided that the computation shall be made either on the full amount of the profits made during the year of assessment, or according to an average for such a period being greater or less than one year, as the case may require, and as may be directed by the Commissioners ; and Rule 3 provides that every such statement shall be made to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person in receipt of or entitled to the profits and gains.

The three cases are thus provided for. First, where the trade has been carried on during the full period of three years anterior to the first day of the year of assessment ; second, where the trade has been first started within those three years ; and third, where the trade has been set up within the year of assessment ; but I have searched in vain to discover any case in which the period of three years, on the profits of which the trader may be assessed, may comprise a certain period lying without the year of assessment and a certain period within it. I do not believe that such a hybrid period is ever recognized, by the legislation on the subject of income-tax, as a period the profits made in which are to be subjected to taxation. The House has no power to come to the aid of the Legislature and insert such a period as a unit of computation where the Legislature has failed to do so.

The facts of this case are as follows :—The appellant firm set up and commenced a new business on March 1, 1919. They took stock and made up the first account of their business on December 31 in the same year 1919. Why they did this is irrelevant. The profits of the business for this period of ten months amounted, according to this account—the accuracy of which is not challenged—to £1,000. On February 6, 1920, that is, before the first day of the year of assessment, they agreed to sell their business, its goodwill and assets, as and from January 1, 1920, to the appellant company, which latter was incorporated on February 16, 1920, and on March 1 adopted the agreement for sale of February 6 previous. The members of the appellant firm were the sole members of the appellant company. The appellant company have since continued to carry on the business by them so acquired. From motives wise or unwise they made up an account of their business from January 1, 1920, to March 31, 1920. For this period their profits—it is not disputed—amounted to £12,150. The appellant firm was assessed on February 3, 1923, for the year 1918-1919 to income-tax in respect of the profits of its trade from March 1, 1919, to April 5, 1919, in the sum of £117, being a due proportion of the sum of £1,000 shown by its accounts to have been its profits for the ten months ending December 31, 1919.

The Special Commissioners decided that the liability of the appellants should be based on the accounts to December 31, 1919, without regard to the accounts up to March 31, 1920, and reduced the figure contended for by the respondent to £1,200. As I understand the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, he held in accordance with the decisions in the two Scottish cases, namely the Glensloy case ([1914] S.C., 549) and the Burntisland case ([1923] S.C., 449), as to the period over which the profits were to be calculated in such a case as this, that though no terminus ad quem is distinctly named in Rule 1 of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D, yet according to the principle underlying the general provision of the statute that terminus must be the first day of the year of assessment. If so, I entirely concur with him. As I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, the profits of the appellants are to be computed over a period extending beyond the first day of the year of assessment and extending to the end of the 13 months, that is, to the end of the first trading year of the appellants' trading, which would necessarily include a portion of the year of assessment. With all respect, I am quite unable to concur in that conclusion. Lord Justice Scrutton, who dissented from the majority ([1926] 2 K.B., at p. 307) is reported to have expressed himself thus : "Yet considering that Parliament contemplates a shorter period than three years as the foundation of the average, and I think contemplates that the foundation of the average is a period of fact, not estimate, I have with considerable hesitation come to the conclusion that the Commissioners and Mr. Justice Rowlatt have taken a correct view of the case, and that the period from which the average is derived terminates at the commencement of the year of assessment, or, possibly, on the date preceding that year to which the accounts of the trader are usually made up, if such a date exists." I concur with the learned Lord Justice in the conclusion at which he has arrived, and, as I have failed to find a single instance in the whole Income Tax Code in which, where the trader's trading commenced outside the year of assessment, that year or any portion of it has been included in the period for which the trader's profits are to be measured and assessed, I concur in the learned Lord Justice's conclusion without the hesitation to which he gives expression. I think the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt should be restored and approved.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords : The language of section 100 of the Act of 1842 was, "the computation shall be made for one year on the average of the balance of the profits and gains from the period of first setting up the same." The language of the Act of 1918 is, "the computation shall be made on the average of the profits or gains for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same." I agree with Lord Sumner in thinking that the transposition of the words "for one year" in a Consolidation Act does not make a change in the meaning.

The language of the Act of 1918 can be read as if it were, "the computation shall be made on the average of the profits or gains (for one year) from the period of the first setting up of the same." The "one year" is the year of assessment. The "period of the first setting up of the same" must, I think, mean "the period from the date of the first setting up of the same." Even then the date is not named at which "the period" is to end. This must, I think, be the date referred to in the Schedule D rule applicable to Case I. That is to say, a date not later than the first day of the year of assessment. This "period" may be more or less than a year.

Further, the words "profits or gains" are followed not by the preposition "of" but by the preposition "for," a word which is appropriate if it is to be read in the connexion, "the computation shall be made for, &c.," which was the sequence of the words in the Act of 1842.

Neither the Act of 1842 nor the Act of 1918 specifies the items of which the average is to be ascertained. It is impossible to have an average unless two or more sums are under consideration. An average of the profits for a period is not intelligible unless the period is to be in some way considered as consisting of several parts. This consideration is reached if the meaning is that the average of the weekly or monthly profits over the number of weeks or the number of months that have elapsed during "the period" is the average to be computed, and that this average sum is to be attributed to the whole of the "one year," i.e., the year of assessment. I think this is the meaning. I agree with Lord Sumner's judgment and think that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords : For convenience of reference and at the risk of repetition I will begin by setting out Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. under Schedule D with the words placed in the order in which it is agreed that for the purpose of construing the rule they may properly stand.

"Where the trade . . . has been set up and commenced within the said period of three years, the computation shall be made for one year on the average of the profits or gains for one year from the period of the first setting up of the same, and where it has been set up and commenced within the year of assessment the computation shall be made according to the rules applicable to Case VI."

My Lords, on this sub-rule I venture to observe as follows :—

First of all, it is sufficiently clear that the expression "the profits or gains from the period of the first setting up of the same" are the equivalent of "the profits or gains arising or accruing during the period commencing with the first setting up of the same." In other words, except that the profits are those arising during a different period, the operation of averaging and its purpose and result are the same under this sub-rule as is the operation directed by Case I.

Secondly. The "period" of which the profits are to be averaged is identified by reference to another period referred to in the sub-rule as "the said period of three years," and the reference is made in a form which to my mind connotes inevitably that it is a shorter period than the period so referred to.

Thirdly. It is a period which commences after the other period has, in point of time, begun. It commences "within" that period. These considerations together strike me as almost necessarily, and without more, leading to the conclusion that the two periods are treated as ending at the same date. But when to them is added this further consideration that the shorter period in question must commence before the year of assessment—a condition shown by the later part of the sub-rule and one not only consistent with but confirmatory of the view that it does not continue after that date—this conclusion becomes inevitable if it be found that the same characteristic applies to the said period of three years itself. Now that this is so appears from the description of that period given in Case I. to which this sub-rule is, as I entirely agree, in the nature of a proviso. That period is there described as one of three years

"ending on that day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade have been usually made up, or on the fifth day of April preceding the year of assessment."

In the present case, I cannot doubt that the "period" ended on April 5, 1919, and, as it seems to me, the profits of this trade for the year April 6, 1919, to April 5, 1920, must be computed on a fair and just average, for a year, of the profits or gains which arose or accrued between March 1, 1919, when the trade was first set up, and April 5, 1919.

My Lords, I think that much of the difficulty which has beset this particular case is attributable to the final importance wrongly, as I believe, attached to the balance-sheet made up to December 31, 1919—a date which, in itself, has no relevance on the question at issue. I think the difficulty is further due to the fact that the light cast upon the whole of sub-rule 2 by the reference in it to "the said period of three years" has not been fully utilized.

I am in entire agreement with the rest of your Lordships as to the effect to be attributed to that sub-rule and as to the proper result of this appeal.

Court of Appeal.

1927. Mar. 22.

PUTSMAN v. TAYLOR.*

Restraint of Trade—Agreement by servant not to compete with employer after termination of employment—Limits of time and area—Protection of employer's trade interests—Validity.

The defendant was employed by the plaintiff, a tailor, as manager and cutter, for 12 months certain, the employment being thereafter terminable by one week's notice on either side, under a written agreement which provided (inter alia) that "after a determination of this agreement for any cause whatsoever the manager shall not for a period of five years from the date of such determination carry on any business similar to that of the employer or . . . be employed in any capacity by any person, firm or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in Snow-hill, Birmingham, or within a half-mile radius of Aston Cross, Birmingham, or Bristol-road, Birmingham."

Held, that the limit of area, as well as the limit of time, applied to all the promises, and therefore it was not necessary to consider any question of severability; and that having regard to the fact that the defendant was an experienced cutter and was well known in certain districts of Birmingham, and to the necessary opportunities that he had of influencing customers, the covenant was not unreasonable to protect the employer's trade interests, and was not invalid as being in undue restraint of trade.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 153; [1927] 1 K.B., 637) granting an injunction to restrain the defendant, a former servant of the plaintiff, from competing in business with him (the plaintiff) after the termination of the service.

The plaintiff was a tailor carrying on business in Birmingham at three places—namely, Snow-hill, Bristol-road, and Aston Cross. The defendant was formerly in the employ of Dresdens, a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, who carried on business as a tailor quite near to the plaintiff and was a trade rival. One Joe Putsman, a brother of the plaintiff, also carried on business as a tailor at 73, Snow-hill, and was a trade rival of the plaintiff.

The defendant left the employ of Dresdens and entered the service of the plaintiff in March, 1925. The contract of service was in writing and was dated March 24, 1925. The employment was for 12 months certain, and after that was terminable by one week's notice on either side. The plaintiff promised to employ the defendant, to pay him £4 a week and a commission, and to allow him two weeks' holiday in a year at half wages. The defendant promised to serve the plaintiff as manager and cutter at Snow-hill, "or at such other place or places where the employer's business shall be carried on and as the employer may require," to serve with diligence and fidelity, to keep his employer's secrets, to keep and render accounts, not to compete or to be engaged in any other business, and not to compete after the determination of the service.

By clause 11 of the contract it was agreed as follows: "After a determination of this agreement for any cause whatsoever the manager shall not for a period of five years from the date of such determination carry on any business similar to that of the employer or be employed by Dresdens, tailors, or be employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in Snow-hill, Birmingham, or within a half-mile radius of Aston Cross, Birmingham, or Bristol-road, Birmingham."

Under this contract the defendant managed the plaintiff's business at Snow-hill, Birmingham, for 15 months. On Thursday, June 10, 1926, he went to the plaintiff's brother, Joe Putsman, and arranged with him to leave the plaintiff's service and enter that of Joe Putsman on the following Monday. On Saturday, June 12, the defendant paid the plaintiff £4 in lieu of a week's notice and left his service. On Monday, June 14, he entered the service of Joe Putsman, who exhibited a photograph of the defendant in his shop window with a notice that he had secured the defendant's services.

The plaintiff took proceedings in the County Court, claiming an injunction in the terms of clause 11 of the service agreement. He further submitted that, if clause 11 should be held to be too wide to be enforceable as a whole, he was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant for a period of five years from the determination of the agreement from being employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company in a business similar to that of the plaintiff in Snow-hill, Birmingham.

The County Court Judge rejected the claim to an injunction in the terms of the whole clause. He held that the promise not to take service for five years with any tailor in Snow-hill was a promise which might properly be enforced as a separate promise if it were a valid promise, but he held that such a promise was invalid as being in undue restraint of trade.

On appeal, the Divisional Court held that the promise not to take service with any tailor in Snow-hill could be severed from the other promises and enforced, and that in view of the facts that the employment was highly confidential, that the service was for 12 months at least, and that the limit in space was very narrow, the time limit of five years was not such as to render that promise invalid as being in undue restraint of trade. They accordingly allowed the appeal.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Bosanquet, K.C., and Mr. C. R. Williams appeared for the appellant; and Mr. R. A. Willes for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes.—In my opinion this appeal fails. Both the two learned Judges who decided this case in the Divisional Court gave very elaborate and very careful, and I think very accurate, judgments; but it really is not necessary, in my opinion, to go into the question with which they mainly dealt, and that is: What is the law at the present moment in reference to the severability of covenants in a case of this class? And the reason why I think it is not necessary is because I agree with the view which was indicated by Mr. Justice Talbot as his opinion in reference to the construction of the covenant. Mr. Justice Talbot, after referring to the case of British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Company, Limited v. Schelff ([1921] 2 Ch., 563), said (43 The Times L.R., at p. 157; [1927] 1 K.B., at p. 647): "The contract there was very different from that in the present case, and the decision that it was not severable clearly does not make the contract now sued on not severable. Moreover, I am of opinion that on the true construction of this agreement the contract not to carry on business is limited in space to the three areas specified. No doubt the words are capable of the other construction, but, if they are to be treated as ambiguous, it is right to give them the more limited of the possible meanings." Then he goes on to deal with the principle applicable to such a case.

It seems to me on consideration of this covenant that although the person responsible for it cannot be very proud of the drafting of it, yet it is, I think, reasonably plain that attaching a reasonable and fair meaning to the words used and putting a construction upon them which does not render them, for all practical purposes, absurd, one comes to the conclusion that just as the whole of the covenant must be governed by the period of five years by which it is introduced so also must it be governed by the area clause at the end, and both the opening words, the period of five years, and the concluding words, the area words, govern the whole covenant. If that is so, it is not necessary to go into the question of severability; the question is whether, taking the covenant as a whole, it is a reasonable protection for which the employer was entitled to stipulate. The County Court Judge has said that it was not, and he applies a process of reasoning to a principle which, with respect to him, I do not think is applicable to this particular case, and I agree with what the learned Judges in the Divisional Court said in reference to that. It seems to me that it is not possible to apply the same reasoning to a case where an experienced person is employed because of his already acquired experience, which his personal contact with the customers must necessarily give, in the same way as one would in the case of a person who comes into the business quite young and inexperienced and in the course of his employment gains business experience and knowledge, and who is not brought into touch with the customers so as to be in a position to influence them. It is not possible to apply the same test to those two classes of case. Here, this man is an experienced cutter, a man apparently well known in Birmingham or, at any rate, certain districts of Birmingham. He has got a clientèle and he is well known as a man of experience and ability, and he is engaged upon the terms that at the conclusion of the agreement he is not, for a period of five years and within quite a limited distance from his employer's three places of business, either to engage in business himself or to go into the business of a particular firm of tailors by whom he had previously been employed, or be employed within that area, and for that time, in any capacity with any person carrying on a business similar to the plaintiff's. It seems to me, having regard to the man's experience and the necessary opportunities he had of influencing customers, that that is not at all an unreasonable provision, or one which the law ought not to recognize as being in restraint of trade.

Mr. Bosanquet has taken two other points. He contends that "after a determination of this agreement" is to be read as including the case of a breach by the employer, so as to put him in a position to take advantage of his own wrong. Again, I do not agree with that, and I do not think it is a possible construction of this clause in the agreement, because it refers to "a determination of this agreement," and I think that means a contractual determination, a determination for any of the reasons indicated in the agreement itself, and "for any cause whatsoever" merely means for any of the causes indicated in the agreement itself. For these reasons, in my opinion, the appeal must fail and fail with the usual consequences in a poor person's case, which is, I believe, that nobody gets any costs.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the construction of the covenant, I think it is to be noted that it is limited both as regards time and as regards space. As regards time, the words of limitation seem to me to be quite clearly carried on over the whole range of the covenant. That being so, ought the words as regards space to be carried back so as to apply to everything in the covenant from the beginning onwards? I do not say that the grammar is particularly excellent or the expression very good, but I think the words are quite capable of having the words as to space carried back to the beginning; and I think that, unless one does so, one gets into a really almost absurd interpretation of the covenant. I think the fact that the limit as to time is to be carried forward right through forms a strong indication that the limit as to space ought to be carried right back and that both and not only one of them should apply to the whole range of the intermediate words in the covenant. If that is so, then we have this: a limit to Snow-hill and a limit to two areas which, if the centre point of the area were a point, not merely a road, would amount to something under three-quarters of a square mile each. The fact that a road is mentioned and not a point might, of course, considerably enlarge that area, but still the area seems to me to be not at all an unreasonable one. One has to bear in mind here that the person who is being employed is a person who has a considerable connexion and is employed as a manager, and as a manager he necessarily must come largely into contact with the customers, must know their names, their residences, their peculiarities as to dress, and so on; and I cannot see that any help is to be derived by the defendant from the fact that he brought a clientèle of his own to the employers, because the employer is entitled to protect himself against his customers' being taken by the defendant, and if, in the course of providing against that, the words do also provide necessarily almost (because I do not see how a distinction could be drawn) against the defendant's also taking the clients whom he has himself brought to the business, so much the worse for the defendant. I cannot find in any case, and I have had occasion to consider these cases a good many times, that any stress has been laid by the Court upon the circumstance that the defendant was bringing into the stock of the business some connexion of his own. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree; I have nothing to add.

R. F. BROWN AND CO., LIMITED v. T. AND J. HARRISON.*

Contract—Carriage by sea—Responsibility of carrier—Fault of his agents or servants—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV., r. 2 (q).

By Art. IV., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from—(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship. . . . (q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage."

The plaintiffs shipped a case of cotton goods on the defendants' steamer at Liverpool for carriage to Tampico and delivery there. Without the fault or privity of the defendants, and in spite of the vigilance of the ship's officers, the goods were stolen by the stevedores' men, who were engaged by the ship's agents to discharge the cargo at Vera Cruz, where the ship called before going to Tampico. In an action for non-delivery,

Held, that if the stevedores' men were servants of the defendants to effect discharge their stealing of the cargo was not an act in the management of the ship, and therefore the defendants were not protected by rule 2 (a); and that in rule 2 (q) the words "or without" must be read as "and without," and therefore, although the defendants themselves were free from blame, yet, since the stevedores were the defendants' servants or agents, and since the defendants, in order to succeed, had to prove that both they themselves and their servants or agents were free from blame, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed £30 14s. 7d. for the non-delivery of a case of cotton goods sent from Liverpool to Tampico, Mexico, on a steamship managed by the defendants. Another case in the list was concerned with the non-delivery by the defendants of goods consigned to Vera Cruz, Mexico. The same points were raised in each case, and they were tried together.

Mr. Miller, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Procter for the defendants.

It was stated by counsel that many other similar claims were pending and that the two actions now before the Court were to be treated as test cases governing the whole.

In January, 1925, the plaintiffs shipped a case of cotton goods at Liverpool on the defendants' steamer Spectator under a bill of lading dated January 15, 1925, issued by the defendants and acknowledging the receipt of the goods in good order and condition, and agreeing to carry them to Tampico and there deliver them. When delivered the case was broken and the goods had entirely disappeared.

Alternatively, the plaintiffs said that the defendants had received the goods to carry them for reward and had negligently lost them.

By their defence the defendants put in a general denial and pleaded, further, that the goods, if lost in fact, were lost owing to theft and/or pilferage on the part of Mexican labourers and/or custom house officers at Tampico without the fault, privity or neglect of the defendants, their servants or agents, and that the loss was therefore covered by an exceptions clause in the bill of lading which relieved the defendants from liability for "loss . . . caused by or arising from . . . robbers, thieves of whatever kind, whether on land or afloat or in the service of the carriers or not."

The defendants also pleaded that they were not liable because the plaintiffs had not given notice in writing of the loss as required by Article III., rule 6, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and they also relied on the provisions of Article IV., rule 2 (a) to (q), of that Schedule.

MR. MILLER, in opening, said that though the pleadings put everything in issue the parties had made admissions to one another which left only two important matters for decision, (1) the effect of Article III., rule 6, of the Schedule, and (2) the effect of Article IV., rule 2 (a) to (q). The really important matter was the effect of subsection (q), which was in the following terms:—

"Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from . . . (q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage."

It was not suggested that there had been actual fault or privity of the carriers themselves, and the defendants contended that on the true construction of the subsection that was enough to relieve them of liability. The plaintiffs contended that though the words in the first part of the subsection were "without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier," the subsection must be read as a whole and the use of the words "neither" and "nor" in the latter part showed that the word "or," before the word "without," should be read as "and." The defendants must therefore prove that not only they personally, but also their agents and servants, had been free from default.

The Court could construe the word "or" as "and" if it was necessary to do so in order to carry out the real intention of the Legislature—Metropolitan Board of Works v. Steed Brothers (8 Q.B.D., 445); Walker v. York Corporation (22 The Times L.R., 456; [1906] 1 K.B., 724); Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Kingsley Navigation Company ([1923] A.C., 235, at p. 245).

Mr. Clement Davies called evidence to show that every precaution had been taken to guard against theft. The thefts, said counsel, had been committed by the local stevedore's men, and the Custom house men were in league with them and no police assistance was obtainable. The ship's officers and the cadets watched as carefully as possible to see that no robberies took place, but they felt that they could not rely much on the crew to help them. There was great difficulty at Mexican ports generally. When the hatch was opened at Tampico the case of goods now in question was found to have been broken into, and this must have been done at the previous port of call, Vera Cruz. The stevedores' men carried knives and were very hostile in their attitude; they used to drop heavy packages on light packages in order to burst open the latter and steal the contents. When complaint was made to the Custom house officials they only laughed.

Counsel submitted that the defendants had done everything that could possibly be done in the circumstances, and that the loss did not occur through any fault or neglect of their agents or servants. It had occurred by some cause other than those enumerated in subsections (a) to (p). The theft was committed by the stevedores' men, who were engaged by the ship's agents at Tampico, and the fault of agents did not include the fault of agents of the ship's agents.

There was no ground for saying that in subsection (q) the word "or" must be read as "and." The shipowner was to be free from liability in both cases if he was not negligent himself and if his servants were not negligent. The Act had been fully discussed, it had been agreed between shipowners and freighters, and the words used must have been deliberately used. The Court was entitled to alter a word in an Act only if it was impossible to make sense of the Act otherwise, and here the words were perfectly intelligible. If the word "or" was to be altered now it could be altered only by an amending Act—Machu v. London and South Western Railway Company (2 Ex. 415, at p. 425).

Further, if it was held against the defendants that the stevedores' men were in fact agents of the defendants, and that theft by those men was a fault or neglect within the meaning of the subsection (Marriott v. Yeoward, 25 The Times L.R., 755; [1909] 2 K.B., 987), discharge of cargo was still an act in the management of the ship and the defendants were protected by rule 2 (a) from liability for any act, neglect or default of their servants in the management of the ship. Management included the safeguarding of the cargo from the time of loading to the time of discharge.

In the course of the argument the defendants abandoned their other defences and relied only on rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act.

Mr. Miller replied. Management did not include felonious acts by the defendants' servants. In contracting to carry the goods to Mexico the defendants must have known that serious difficulties were likely to arise in discharging and they should have taken some extra precautions.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, said that the questions in each of the two cases were the same and the facts were similar. There could be no doubt that the goods were stolen by the Mexican labourers employed by the stevedores to discharge the cargo, and the question was whether rule 2 relieved the defendants from their prima facie duty to deliver.

The defendants relied, first, on subsection (q). They had proved that there was no actual fault or privity of the owners or managers of the ship. Was that enough to establish immunity? Or must the word "or" before the word "without" in the earlier part of subsection (q) be read as "and" so that the defendants must establish both their own innocence and that of their agents or servants?

In a previous case, Heyn v. Ocean Steamship Company (43 The Times L.R., 358), the same question had been raised before him, but there it was not necessary to decide it. In this case, however, the point was definitely taken, and he must deal with it.

If the subsection had ended before the word "but" it would not have been possible to read "and" for "or," whatever opinion one might have had as to the policy and intention of the Legislature. But the subsection continued, and in the latter part used the words "neither" and "nor," with the result that there was a clear inconsistency between the two halves of the subsection. To make the whole consistent one must either read "and" for "or" in the first part or alter the wording of the second part.

The case of Walker v. York Corporation (22 The Times L.R., 456; [1906] 1 K.B., 724) showed that to obtain consistency it was legitimate for him to read "and" instead of "or," and to do so would give a less surprising result than to alter the latter part of the subsection. He therefore held that "and" must be read instead of "or" in the early part of the subsection, and that the defendants must prove that both they themselves and their agents or servants were free from blame.

He was satisfied that the ship's officers did their duty as well as they could in the very difficult circumstances. It was known that the Mexican labourers would loot the cargo whenever they got a chance, and nothing short of a man to watch every labourer all the time would have been enough to ensure safety. But though the officers did their duty he thought that the stevedores themselves were the servants or agents of the defendants, and if, therefore, the defendants could only rely on subsection (q) they must fail.

It was said, however, that they were protected by subsection (a), because the act of the stevedores' men in stealing the cargo was an act of the defendants' servants in the management of the ship. He should despair of ever finding a satisfactory definition of the word "management." It was so vague that it was almost impossible to say whether any act constituted management, but he was not satisfied that if the stevedores' men were servants of the defendants to effect discharge their stealing of the cargo was an act of management of the ship. That point also failed. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1927. Apr. 6.

HART v. RIVERSDALE MILL COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant — Truck Acts — Lancashire cotton trade — "Standard list" of wages — Deductions for bad work — Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 37), ss. 3, 23—Truck Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 44), ss. 2, 9.

Section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, provides for the payment in current coin of the realm of "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour." Section 23 permits an employer to make, and contract to make, reasonable deductions from wages in respect of certain specified matters. Section 2 of the Truck Act, 1896, prohibits an employer from making, except under certain conditions, "any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for or in respect of bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer. . . ." Section 9 provides for the exemption from the provisions of the Act by order of the Secretary of State of persons engaged in certain trades, either generally or within a particular area. By order dated March 3, 1897, the Secretary of State exempted from the provisions of the Act persons engaged in the weaving of cotton in Lancashire.

The appellant, a weaver of cotton in Lancashire employed by the respondents, was negligent in performing certain work and, in accordance with a custom which had long existed in the Lancashire trade, the employers deducted a reasonable sum from the "standard list" rates of wages which had been agreed between the employers' and workers' organizations, as the remuneration for good, merchantable cloth, and paid her the balance as her wages.

Held, that this deduction was not illegal as being in contravention of the provisions of the Truck Acts, since the implied contract between the parties was that the appellant should be paid according to the "standard list" subject to a fair deduction for bad work, and the deduction was made from the standard list to ascertain the wages earned and was not made from the wages earned.

Decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 73; [1927] 1 K.B., 624) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division (43 The Times L.R., 73; [1927] 1 K.B., 624), which raised a question of great importance as to the legality of the customary method of paying piece-workers in the textile trades—namely, whether deductions could lawfully be made for bad or careless work. The question came before the Bolton justices, who stated a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The appellant, a woman textile piece-worker named Nellie Hart, preferred in the Bolton police court against the respondents, her employers, the Riversdale Mill Company, Limited, a claim under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, for the sum of 6d., being the balance of wages alleged to be due to her and to have been unlawfully deducted by the employers, who counterclaimed for 1s. in respect of damages suffered by them through the negligence of the appellant.

It was admitted that the appellant was negligent, and that the 1s. claimed by the employers was a fair claim for the damage done to the employers' cloth through her negligence.

The case stated found that it was the duty of the appellant to weave a good merchantable cloth by performing her work without negligence and in a careful manner; that she was to be paid for her work according to a standard list, an implied condition of which was that the prices in the list should apply to good merchantable cloth produced by the observance by the appellant of her duty as a weaver. There was a practice to pay more than the standard price, if the materials provided by the employer were defective, as payment for extra work due to defective material. But if the workmanship of a weaver was bad or negligent, there was, and had been for many years, a custom to pay a sum less than the sum contained in the standard list—namely, the standard list price less compensation assessed by the employer of a reasonable amount in respect of the loss suffered by him through damage to his cloth. It was admitted for the purpose of the case that the deduction of 6d. was fair and reasonable and less than the actual loss caused to the employers.

The employers contended that section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, which made deductions from standard wages illegal, had nothing to do with a deduction for bad work; that the amount of wages "earned by" and the amount "payable to" a workman were not necessarily the same thing, but that in this case the amount shown in the standard list was not "earned" because some of the work was bad, and that that amount was subject to a deduction for bad work. Nor was it "payable" to the weaver, because the amount to be paid was the net wage after the deduction, which formed no part of the wages. They further contended that the effect of the Order made by the Home Secretary on March 3, 1897, exempting the cotton weaving industry from the operation of the Truck Act, 1896, was to leave the industry free to make contracts permitting deductions in respect of bad work.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the claim was based upon section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, and that the Truck Act, 1896, had no application to the case.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes and H. Langford Lewis, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The justices were of opinion that the standard list was the rate of wages applicable and held that the employers had illegally deducted 6d. by way of fine from the wages of the appellant, and gave judgment for her for 6d. On the employers' counterclaim the justices gave judgment in their favour for 1s.

The employers appealed.

The Divisional Court by a majority (Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Salter—the Lord Chief Justice dissenting) allowed the employers' appeal.

Miss Hart appealed by leave of the Court.

Mr. Eastham, K.C., and Mr. Neville Laski appeared for the appellant.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Mr. Harold Derbyshire for the respondents (the employers) were not called upon to argue.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that he agreed with the majority in the Divisional Court. He would be sorry to weaken in any way the effect of the Truck Act, 1831, which said in section 3 that "The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour by him done . . . shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm. . . ."

But the facts as found in the case stated must be considered and the Court was bound by those findings. In those findings was the fact that the right to make certain deductions had always been part of the weaver's contract of service. There had always been a scale allowing for deductions and additions, and, though it was also found that the weavers as a class had always objected to the deductions, yet the custom had gone on for very many years.

In the standard list of prices payable to the piece workers there was not only provision for deductions in the case of unsatisfactory work, but there was also a provision that if the materials provided by the employer were not good he was to pay the piece workers on a higher scale. Further, as those provisions were bound to lead to disputes, there was a provision for settling them. From the standard list, and from the facts as found, it seemed therefore clear that deductions were a recognized custom, and that on the other hand there was also to be compensation in the form of increased pay for having to work with bad material.

The point was made that by deducting the 6d. the employers had not paid the "entire amount" to the artificer, but, if a calculation could be made which allowed a deduction for bad work and an increase for bad material, it was impossible to say until that calculation had been made what the wages earned really were, and, therefore, what the "entire amount" might be.

In Chawner v. Cummings (8 Q.B., 311, at p. 323) Lord Denman said :—

"Now it is to be observed that payment otherwise than in money is alone prohibited. Deductions or charges are nowhere mentioned or alluded to before the 23rd section, hereafter to be considered. Then are these deductions in the nature of payment at all ? It seems to us to be the mode of calculating the amount of wages and nothing more. Whether the arrangement took place at the beginning or end of the work makes no difference, because it is stated that the deductions were made according to the usage of the trade, and that the plaintiff knew it, and was dealt with accordingly. The plaintiff, therefore, must be presumed to have contracted upon the usual and well-known terms, and his wages so ascertained have been actually received by him in the current coin of the realm."

Those words seemed to be clearly applicable to the present case. In Archer v. James (2 B. and S., 61) the Chawner case (supra) was questioned, but for all that it still stood as an authority.

In Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited, Lord Davey said (22 The Times L.R., 372 ; [1906] A.C., 136, at p. 143) :—

"Archer v. James (supra) was a similar case and was decided in the first instance on the authority of Chawner v. Cummings (supra). In the Exchequer Chamber three Judges held that Chawner v. Cummings (supra) was wrongly decided, and three other Judges on the other hand approved the decision, and held that the deductions in question in the case before them were in the same category and were elements only in calculating the real amount of the workman's wages."

That last sentence of Lord Davey put the point very shortly. Was this deduction a sum of which the appellant could lawfully be deprived in calculating the "real amount" of her wages, or was it a sum deducted after her proper wages had been ascertained? In the latter case it would be a sum which the employers had chosen to deduct from the sum which they were bound to pay in its entirety. To him (the Master of the Rolls) it seemed that it was the former. Chawner v. Cummings (supra) applied to the present decision, whereas Williams's case (supra) did not.

It seemed to him that the 6d. was not a deduction from the appellant's wages due to her as an "entire amount," and that the employers had not offended against the Truck Act, 1831. Rather, the deduction seemed to be a loss suffered by the appellant in a calculation which, when made, would determine the sum which she ought to receive as wages. The appeal would be dismissed.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that, giving the best attention he could to the case, he thought that the views expressed by the majority in the Divisional Court must prevail. The question was : Was this a case where the wages of the worker, being calculated on a certain understanding, were found to be 6d. less than might have been the case under other circumstances, or was it a case where a worker, having agreed to do work for a named sum, ought to receive that sum, and the 6d. knocked off had the effect of diminishing a sum properly payable ? As far as the findings of fact were concerned, the present Court was bound by them, and to him (Lord Justice Scrutton) they indicated that the present case was one of contract, and not of breach of contract. They showed that the deductions in question had been going on for many years, and had been taken into account in fixing the standard rates. The wages depended upon the quality of the work. It was a matter of contract that wages should be so much less if the work were not up to standard, and so much more if the material supplied made work difficult, and it was doubtless to be construed as a term of the contract that the deductions should be reasonable. True it was that the workers had always objected to the deductions on principle, but there was a contract of a kind which included them, and it was not affected by those objections.

It was said by the appellant that though there might have been a custom to make these deductions, yet these deductions were illegal under the Truck Act, 1831. In Chawner v. Cummings (8 Q.B., 311), however, it was said that these deductions were "the mode of calculating the amount of wages and nothing more." In Archer v. James (2 B. and S., 61) the question again came up. The Court below decided for the employers, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber was equally divided, which meant in fact that the Court of Exchequer Chamber decided the question in the same sense; a decision which was binding upon the present Court. Counsel for the appellant had argued that all deductions from wages were illegal, but in the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, section 11, it was enacted that "In the case of a child, young person, or woman . . . any forfeiture on the ground of absence or leaving work shall not be deducted from or set off against a claim for wages or other sum due for work done before such absence or leaving work, except to the amount of the damage (if any) which the employer may have sustained by reason of such absence or leaving work," and that was a statutory recognition that there were cases in which a deduction might properly be made from wages.

Counsel for the appellant referred to sections 1 and 2 of the Truck Act, 1896, and said that these sections gave power to the employer to make deductions in certain cases only, and that implied that he could not do so under the Act of 1831 at all. But that contention was destroyed by section 8, which said that "Nothing in this Act shall make lawful any contract or payment which is illegal under the Truck Acts, 1831 and 1887 . . . ," showing that the right must have existed before. For those reasons, and on the findings in the case, he (Lord Justice Scrutton) thought that the contract fixed the terms of settlement between the parties. The price ultimately fixed was the weaving price, and the so-called "deduction" was made before the wages were fixed, and not afterwards.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he was of the same opinion, and as the ground had been completely covered by the judgments delivered it was not necessary for him to add anything except that the provisions of the Truck Act, 1896, referred to by Lord Justice Scrutton seemed to be the decisive factor.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. Apr. 7.

OSE GESELLSCHAFT, &c. v. JEWISH COLONIAL TRUST.*

Bankers — Negligence — Transmission of money abroad — Cheque sent by registered letter — No insurance — Failure to reach payee — Forgery of indorsement—Clearance of cheque —Non-liability of bank.

The plaintiffs, being customers of the defendants, who were bankers in London, instructed them to transmit a sum of money to a person in Rumania, and the defendants sent a cheque by registered post to him personally. The cheque never reached him, but someone apparently put on it a forged indorsement of his name, and it was eventually cleared through a bank in Poland, and the defendants debited the plaintiffs with the amount. In an action for negligence the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants should have sent the cheque by a letter which was insured in addition to being registered.

Held, that as the loss of a cheque was a rare occurrence, and as the standard of the defendants' duty should not be measured by a consideration of all the precautions which subsequent events might suggest, the action failed.

The plaintiffs in this action sued for a sum of £227 8s. as money held by the defendants to their use or, alternatively, as damages for negligence and breach of duty.

Mr. Conway, K.C., and Mr. Woolf appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Wilfrid Lewis for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were a German society formed to raise funds from the charitable and to give help to poor Jews resident in Eastern Europe. The defendants were a company carrying on the business of bankers in London.

In December, 1923, the plaintiffs were customers of the defendants. On December 2 they wrote to the defendants instructing them to send a sum of £227 8s. to a Dr. Jakir Ose at Chisinau, in Rumania. The defendants accordingly sent him a cheque by registered post. The plaintiffs said that the cheque never reached him, but was stolen by someone in transit; that a forged indorsement in the name of Jakir Ose was put on the cheque; and that it was eventually cleared through a bank in Poland. The defendants debited the plaintiffs with the sum in their account.

The plaintiffs now contended that in sending out the money in an ordinary registered letter the defendants had failed in their duty. They said that the proper course would have been for the defendants to instruct their correspondent bankers in Rumania to hand the money to Jakir Ose; or, if they preferred to send the money out by cheque, they should have sent it by an insured letter in accordance with the regulations contained on p. 29 and pp. 566 and 567 of the British Postal Guide for July, 1923, which was the guide then in force, and in accordance with the law of Rumania at that time in force.

By their defence the defendants denied that they were under a duty to do anything more than send a cheque in a registered letter. They also pleaded that whatever their duty might otherwise have been the course of business between themselves and the plaintiffs justified them in acting as they did.

Mr. Lewis submitted, first, that the plaintiffs must prove that Jakir Ose never in fact received the money. Secondly, the British Postal Guide regulations referred to were only intended to give information as to the law in force in Rumania and were in no sense law themselves. Thirdly, the Rumanian law was probably only intended to prohibit the export of securities from that country and was not concerned with money going in. Even if it did refer to money going into the country it only amounted to advising what would be the most prudent course and did not make it illegal to send a cheque uninsured. There was therefore no negligence on the part of the defendants.

Evidence was called on both sides.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs were a charitable institution in Germany and the defendants were bankers in London, and at the material time their relations were those of banker and customer. The plaintiffs, on December 2, 1923, wrote to the defendants to transmit £227 8s. to Jakir Ose in Rumania, and the defendants sent a cheque by registered letter to him personally. It never reached him and the plaintiffs now sued the defendants for alleged breach of duty in failing to carry out their mandate and for negligence in not carrying out their duty with reasonable care and diligence. The plaintiffs contended that the defendants should either have transmitted the money by communicating with their local correspondents and getting them to pay Jakir Ose, or, if they preferred to use the method of sending a cheque, that they should have insured it besides registering it. They added that the Rumanian law made the duty to insure additionally clear.

It was easy to be wise after the event and it was clear now that it would have been safer to have transmitted the money through a banking correspondent, but it appeared that the practice was only to pay through a correspondent when the transmitting bank had sufficient funds to meet the payment standing to their credit with the correspondent.

Out of many transactions that was the first occasion on which trouble had arisen through the sending of a cheque, and the plaintiffs had been notified that that cheque was being sent and they raised no objection. The evidence showed that the defendants had sent scores of cheques for the plaintiffs to places all over Eastern Europe and no trouble had resulted before. In his view, therefore, the plaintiffs had entirely failed to make out that by sending a cheque instead of paying through a correspondent the defendants had failed to use reasonable care.

Then it was said that the letter ought to have been insured as well as registered, especially in view of the Rumanian law. On the evidence he concluded that all that the Rumanian law amounted to was this: that if one sent paper money or securities to Rumania by registered letter one did it at one's own risk. No doubt that was an element to take into consideration in deciding whether it was reasonable and prudent to insure. The defendants did insure in cases where they were sending bank notes, but not where they were sending cheques.

It was clear that the loss of a cheque was a rare occurrence and he did not think that it would be right to measure the standard of duty of the defendants by a consideration of all the precautions which in the light of after events would have given a safer course. There must therefore be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

JOSEF INWALD ACTIENGESELLSCHAFT v. PFEIFFER.*

Treaty of Peace—Debt incurred before outbreak of war—Austrian creditor—Norwegian debtor—Action by creditor incompetent—Treaty of Peace Order, s. 7.

The defendant, a Norwegian subject, living in England, incurred a debt to the plaintiffs, an Austrian company, before the outbreak of war. After the Treaty of Peace the plaintiffs sued the defendant for the amount. The Judge in chambers made an order striking out the claim, on the ground that the only right to sue for the debt was in the Administrator of Austrian property. The plaintiffs appealed. It was admitted on their behalf that any money recovered by them would be subject to the provisions of the Peace Treaty and the charge thereby created.

Held (per Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that although the claim was against a neutral subject, yet, as s. 7 of the Treaty of Peace Order made the debt payable to the Administrator and transferred to him all the rights of the creditors, the plaintiffs had no right to bring the action.

As the two members of the Court differed, the order of the Judge in chambers stood.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, an Austrian company, who had brought an action on a specially indorsed writ claiming £494 for goods sold and delivered to the defendant, who was a Norwegian subject living in England. The debt was incurred in 1914 before the outbreak of war. The defendant contended that the only right to sue for it was vested in the Administrator of Austrian property, and he applied that the claim should be struck out. The Master in Chambers made an order striking out the claim and his decision was affirmed by Mr. Justice Shearman.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Walter Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. Scobell Armstrong appeared for the appellants; Mr. Aronson for the respondent; and Mr. H. M. Giveen for the Administrator of Austrian property.

Sir Walter Greaves-Lord said that under the Treaty of Peace Order there was an express prohibition of legal proceedings between the nationals of the two parties, and a charge was created on all the property rights and interests in the British Empire belonging to nationals of the former Austrian Empire.

But the debt now in question was not an "enemy debt": it was a debt due at the outbreak of war from a neutral subject resident in England to an Austrian company. The right to sue for that debt was suspended, not destroyed, by the war, and was revived on the making of the Peace Treaty.

It was admitted the Administrator could sue for and recover the debt, but he had refused to do so, except upon receiving a deposit of £50, a guarantee of a further £500, and the full costs of all proceedings, with an indemnity against further costs which might be incurred. The plaintiffs could not submit to those terms, and, to prevent the Statute of Limitations from running out, issued a writ against the defendant and made the Administrator a second defendant for the purpose of enforcing his charge. A summons for directions had been taken out under which the plaintiffs asked leave to file a statement of claim to supersede the specially indorsed writ, and that question now stood over.

The defendant's attitude was that the plaintiffs could not sue at all, but that, even if they could sue, they could not deal with any property recovered without committing a breach of the provisions of the Peace Treaty. The existence of a charge on the debt assumed that, subject to the charge, the property was a right of action vested in the plaintiff.

Mr. Aronson and Mr. Giveen addressed the Court.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the appeal must be dismissed. Having stated the facts, he said that the case raised difficult and complex questions, but he had come to the conclusion that the order made by Mr. Justice Shearman was right. It was not contested by Sir Walter Greaves-Lord that any money recovered by the plaintiffs would be subject to the provisions of the Peace Treaty and the charge thereby created.

His LORDSHIP then read Article 249 (b) of the Peace Treaty creating the charge and giving the right to the Allied Powers to retain and liquidate all property in their territory belonging to nationals of the former Austrian Empire. The property in question, though the claim was against a neutral subject, was none the less subject to the charge, for if it were recovered it would become the property of an Austrian national in this country (Article 250, paragraph 4 of the annex thereto). The Treaty of Peace Order provided for the carrying into effect of such charge and gave the Administrator wide powers to enforce it.

By section 7, paragraph (x) (ee) :—

"Where the property right or interest subject to the charge consists of any sum of money due to a national of the former Austrian Empire (not being an enemy debt within the meaning of Article 248 of the Treaty) it shall be payable to the Administrator, and the Administrator shall have power to enforce the payment thereof, and for that purpose shall have all such rights and powers as if he were the creditor."

Moreover, the plaintiffs could not transfer or otherwise deal with any of the money recoverable in the action. The plaintiffs, therefore, were not able to take any proceedings to recover the money, because if they did the defendant would plead that any money so recoverable could only be payable to the Administrator. The effect of sub-paragraph (ee) was practically the same as that of (f), which empowered the Board of Trade to make a vesting order vesting any property subject to the charge in the Administrator.

The effect of the Order was to transfer all the rights of the creditor to the Administrator, who had a discretion as to the terms on which he would take proceedings. It was clear that here he might be involved in litigation of a complex character. It might be said, though he (his Lordship) did not think so, that there was some apparent hardship in the case, but that was a matter of the Treaty alone, which might have been right or might have been wrong.

The expression "charge" was not quite the proper term to use if it was thereby suggested that there was some kind of equity of redemption. It was not contemplated by the Treaty that the ex-enemy national had any equity of redemption; his sole right was a claim to be compensated by his own Government.

The terms of the Peace Treaty and the Peace Treaty Order were far too strong to enable the plaintiffs to contend that they had any right to bring the action. Any right of the plaintiffs to be enforced against the defendant was to be at the suit of the Administrator. The action was therefore wrongly constituted, the order of Mr. Justice Shearman was right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, having stated certain of the facts, said that if the case had been left to him sitting alone he would have taken a different view and allowed the appeal, but the Master of the Rolls, who had had far more experience of Peace Treaties than he had, did not agree, and he would be content to say that there being a difference of opinion the order made below should stand. In the circumstances he did not desire to go at length into the reasons, which he had suggested during the argument, for his difference of opinion, as they might only have the effect of encouraging expensive litigation. The appeal would be dismissed.

COLE AND ANOTHER v. MERTON PARK (WIMBLEDON) GOLF CLUB, LIMITED.*

Club—Proprietary golf club—Rights of members — Extraordinary general meeting — No notice to women members—Validity of resolution—Rules of club — Women members not full members.

The plaintiffs were the captain and the secretary of the women's section of a golf club, of which the defendant company were the proprietors. At an extraordinary general meeting of the members a resolution was passed deleting from the rules of the club a provision for the election of a women's committee to manage the affairs of the women's section. No woman member of the club received notice of that meeting, as none of the women members held any shares in the company. In an action for a declaration that the resolution was invalid,

Held, that under the rules women members were not full members and were not entitled to receive notices of general meetings, and therefore the action failed.

This was an action in which Miss Thyrza Helen Cole, of The Green, Wimbledon, S.W., and Mrs. Violet Tummons Myhill, of Minsterworth, Cottenham Park-road, Wimbledon, who had been elected the captain and the secretary of the women's section of the Merton Park Golf Club, claimed from the defendants, the proprietors of the club, a declaration that a resolution passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the club on February 12, 1927, was invalid.

In the alternative, they claimed that that resolution was not retrospective and that the plaintiffs were entitled to discharge the duties of captain and honorary secretary of the women's section during the remainder of their year of office.

In 1926 disputes among the women members of the club took place, with the result that an extraordinary general meeting of the members was held on February 12, 1927, and a resolution was passed deleting from the rules of the club a provision for the election of a women's committee to manage the affairs of the women's section of the club. Miss Cole had been appointed captain and Mrs. Myhill had been appointed honorary secretary of the women's section in November, 1926. No woman member of the club received notice of the extraordinary general meeting of February 12, 1927.

Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. J. P. Eddy appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. J. B. Melville, K.C., and Mr. Cartwright Sharp for the defendant company.

* Reported by T. S. BOYD and G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Sir Henry Maddocks read an affidavit of Mr. William Thomas Curtis, the captain of the club, in which he said that neither of the plaintiffs nor any of the lady members held any shares in the company. There had been a bitter quarrel, which was still continuing, among the members of the ladies' section. It was the only desire of the committee and himself to arrive at some solution which would check the quarrel, as it was likely to bring the whole club into disrepute and to render friendly relations impossible.

The committee never approved of the election of the plaintiffs to their offices, and they had grave doubts as to the validity of that election. It was alleged that neither of the plaintiffs was elected by voting, but that Miss Cole declared herself and Mrs. Myhill to be elected, on the ground that no other effective nomination had been received. In fact, the nomination of a Mrs. Baker as captain and secretary had been received, but was returned on the ground that the same person could not be nominated for both posts.

It was further stated that at an annual general meeting of the ladies' section it was resolved that the club committee should be asked to take over the affairs of the ladies' section. The committee were very anxious to smooth over the difficulties of that section, and they accordingly invited the members to an informal meeting. It was suggested at that meeting that the office-bearers should resign and that a new annual general meeting should be called and new officers elected.

The plaintiffs and other members absolutely refused to resign, and in view of that the committee came to the conclusion that the resolution that the committee should take over the ladies' section should be made effective. The necessary resolutions were passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the club held on February 12, 1927. Lady members were not entitled to receive a notice of that meeting or to attend and vote at any general meeting of the club. In conclusion, it was submitted that the committee had power to remove any of the ladies alleged to have been elected and to make such arrangements for management as they thought fit.

Evidence having been called for the plaintiffs,

Mr. Melville, in opening the case for the defendants, said that this was an important case for golf clubs, as the administration of this golf club was similar to the administration of many other golf clubs all over the country. If his Lordship should hold that these ladies had the right to attend the general meetings it would upset the domestic arrangements of many other clubs. The ladies' section were not shareholders in the company, and he submitted that only those persons who held shares under the rules had any voice in the management of the club or any right to attend the meetings. The names of the parties had not appeared in last year's year-book.

Counsel said that he had come to the conclusion that it was unnecessary to call any evidence for the defence. It was also undesirable that one member of a club should be called to contradict another member. Before the present proceedings no woman member had ever asked to be summoned to general meetings of the club and had never protested against not being summoned. The rules of the club were to be construed with the defendant company's memorandum and articles of association to which they were subject.

The scheme adopted with regard to the defendant company's club was clearly to divide the members into two classes—one consisting of the full and five-day members, who took up shares and had a full voice in the management of affairs, and the other consisting of the non-proprietary members, who were the women members, the country members, the junior members, and the temporary members. The Court would not interfere by a very drastic remedy in the purely domestic matters of a club—a course which the Court always took with reluctance. The Court was being asked to stifle the acts of the club committee by directing that they were to carry on the women's competitions through Miss Cole and Mrs. Myhill.

Sir Henry Maddocks, in reply, said that the members of a proprietary club had a stake in the club as well as the company that owned it. The contract between the proprietors of a club and the members under which each member became a member of the club was contained in the rules. Arising out of the same transaction there could also be a contract between a new member and the old members.

An action for damages lay against the proprietors of a club by a member who was damnified by a breach of the rules. The Court very jealously guarded the exercise of rules which might do injury to a member's reputation. Junior members were the only class of members of the club who, it was provided by the rules, should have no voice in the management of the club. If women were not "members" of the club they could be expelled and socially ruined without any redress. Even though a woman had more restricted privileges than those enjoyed by men members, she was entitled to have proper notice of extraordinary and annual general meetings, and the fact of that notice not having been sent to Miss Cole and Mrs. Myhill rendered invalid the resolution passed on February 12, 1927.

Mr. Justice Branson, in delivering judgment, said that the question before him was whether the meeting of February 12, 1927, was properly called under the rules of the club, or whether the fact that no women members were summoned to it was a breach of the rules and rendered it void. The case turned on the proper construction which was to be placed on the rules of the club.

The articles of association of the defendant company provided that every member of the club should hold at least two shares in the company and the rules of the club had to be construed with reference to the memorandum and articles of association.

The decision in the case depended on the view which was taken of the use of the word "members" in the rules. The plaintiffs had contended that a woman member was a member in every respect and, as such, was entitled to vote for the committee of management of the club and to attend annual and extraordinary general meetings. When one looked at the rules, although it was perfectly true that the word "members" was used in different senses in different rules, it emerged clearly that a distinction appeared in rule after rule between a full member of the club, who was entitled to a voice in the management, and a woman member, who was entitled only to certain very restricted privileges of the club. The management of the club was obviously intended to be maintained in the hands of the men's committee.

Ever since the formation of the club in 1920 it had been assumed that the opinion which he now expressed about the meaning of the rules was correct, and the women members of the club had been aware that the view taken by the management of the club was that they were not entitled to receive notices of general meetings. It was unfortunate that the rules were not quite so clear as they might have been made with a little more care in drafting.

Had he been forced to hold that the resolution of February 12, 1927, was invalid he would still have found himself in some difficulty, because the relief claimed by the plaintiffs seemed to go further than that which had ever been given in any Court in a case involving the internal management of a club. The action failed.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendants, with costs.

THE RUAPEHU.*

Ship—Ship repairers—Dockowners—Damage by fire in dry dock—Ship undergoing repairs—Limitation of liability—Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 32), s. 2.

By s. 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, "(1) The owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels . . . be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock or canal owner . . . performs any duty or exercises any power . . . (4) For the purpose of this section the term 'dock' shall include wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks. . . ." The defendants' steamship, while undergoing repairs by the plaintiffs in the plaintiffs' dry dock at Blackwall, sustained damage by fire, the outbreak of which was found to be due to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants employed in the repairs. The plaintiffs therefore claimed a declaration that as dockowners they were entitled under s. 2 of the Act of 1900 to a decree limiting their liability.

Held (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that though the work in which the negligence occurred, giving rise to the liability of the plaintiffs in the present case, was work done by the plaintiffs in the capacity of ship repairers and not in the capacity of dry dock owners, s. 2 applied and the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 708; [1927] P., 47) reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Hill (42 The Times L.R., 468).

The action was brought by Messrs. R. and H. Green and Silley Weir, Limited, who were the owners of a dry dock at Blackwall, where they carried on the business of ship repairers, to limit their liability under the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, for damage done by fire to the defendants' steamship Ruapehu while she was undergoing repairs by the plaintiffs in their dock in May, 1923. In an action tried in 1924 the plaintiffs were held liable for the damage. They now claimed to limit their liability to £69,067, being £8 per ton on the tonnage of the largest vessel using their docks in the preceding five years.

At the hearing on February 25, 1926, however, it was agreed that the question of amount should stand over pending the decision of the question whether the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability at all under section 2 of the Act of 1900, which provided:—

"(1) The owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority, or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels . . . be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock . . . owner . . . performs any duty or exercises any power.

"(4) For the purpose of this section the term 'dock' shall include wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks, gridirons, slips, quays, wharves, piers, stages, landing places and jetties."

It was admitted that the fire in question occurred without the actual fault or privity of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Justice Hill held that the section only limited the liability of a dockowner as dockowner, and did not include a liability for anything which a dockowner might choose to do in any other capacity; that the work in which the negligence occurred giving rise to the liability of the plaintiffs in the present case was work done by the plaintiffs in the capacity of ship repairers and not in the capacity of dry dock owners; and that, therefore, section 2 did not apply and the plaintiffs were not entitled to limit their liability.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Atkin, and Lord Justice Sargant) allowed the appeal, being of opinion that some limitation must be placed on the general words of the section, otherwise they would lead to an absurdity. They said that the question was whether the limitation must refer to acts done by the dockowner in his capacity as such or whether it must be limited to acts done on the premises. It was simpler to apply the section with a limitation as to area, and it was much more probable that that was the intention of the Legislature. Section 2, therefore, applied to the facts of this case.

Mr. W. A. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. G. St. C. Pilcher appeared for the appellants; Mr. H. P. Macmillan, K.C., Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. K. S. Carpmael for the respondents.

Viscount Haldane.—My Lords: This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal which reversed a judgment of Mr. Justice Hill in an action brought by the respondents as plaintiffs in which they sought to limit their liability for damage and loss arising out of a fire to £69,067 7s. 2d. with interest. This limitation was claimed under section 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, which enacts that, inter alia, the owner of docks of various kinds, which include dry docks, is not to be liable for loss or damage to any vessel, where the loss or damage is caused without his actual fault or privity, beyond a statutory limit. It is conceded that there was neither actual fault nor privity in this case. The respondents are the owners of a dry dock at Blackwall, and they carry on there the business of ship repairers.

In May, 1923, the s.s. Ruapehu was lying in the respondents' dry dock at Blackwall undergoing repairs which they were carrying out. A fire took place in her hold and the vessel was seriously damaged. The owners commenced an action for such damage before Mr. Justice Hill. He gave judgment for the owners against the present respondents. The Court of Appeal affirmed his decision. The respondents then commenced the present action for a declaration, under the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act of 1900, of limitation of liability. The question was raised whether the respondents were dockowners within the meaning of section 2 of that Act, a preliminary point which was disposed of adversely to the respondents by Mr. Justice Hill as Trial Judge, but in their favour by the Court of Appeal. The only question now before the House on this appeal is whether the decision of the Court of Appeal in the respondents' favour on this point was right.

Section 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, enacts (subsection 1) that "the owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels, or to any goods or merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any vessel or vessels, be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding" a defined sum per ton of certain kinds of tonnage of ships which within a limited period have been "within the area over which such dock or canal owner, harbour authority, or conservancy authority performs any duty or exercises any power." Subsection 3 enacts that section 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall apply to this section as if the words "owner of a British or foreign ship" included a harbour authority and a conservancy authority and the owner of a canal or of a dock. Subsection 4 declares that for the purpose of this section the term "dock" shall include wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks, gridirons, slips, quays, wharves, piers, stages, landing-places, and jetties. It is clear that the respondents' dry dock at Blackwall was, at the material period, within the section.

The real question which we have to determine is whether the Act means that the respondents, who were repairers as well as dockowners, when doing the work which resulted in damage, are entitled to invoke the language used, or whether the limitation of liability is confined to acts done or omitted to be done by those whose function is that of dockowners only, and not, as in this particular case, of repairers also who are carrying out the repairs.

Mr. Justice Hill, the Trial Judge, thought that the negligence for which the present respondents had been held liable had nothing to do with docking, or the arrangement of shorers or blocks, or the pumping out or letting in of water, or other matters necessary to the proper management of a dry dock or of a ship in relation to a dry dock. The work of the respondents was done, he thought, in the capacity of ship repairers, and not in that of dry dock owners. If shipowners were to hire space in a dry dock belonging to a public authority, and to employ ship repairers to do repairs to a ship while she lay there, and the repairers incurred liability by negligence, it would be clear that the liability as repairers did not amount to liability as dockowners. When liability is incurred by exactly the same kind of negligence, he was of opinion that the fact that the ship was in dry dock did not turn the work into work done in the capacity of dockowners, for the mere circumstance that the ship was in the repairers' dry dock could not have that effect. If the negligence gave rise to a fire in the sheds belonging to the yard of those claiming limitation of liability, and if the fire spread to the ship, no one could say that this was negligence of the claimants in the capacity of dry dock owners, or that the liability was incurred in that capacity. This illustration, and other analogous illustrations which the learned Judge gave, seemed to him to show that the liability in the present case did not arise from negligence in work done in the capacity of dockowners.

My Lords, the first observation which occurs on this reasoning is that the question what liability arose must be determined by the words used in the section, and not from what might reasonably be expected in the actual circumstances of a case such as this. The Legislature has, on grounds which may seem good or seem bad, employed certain language. With the special grounds which influenced it we have nothing to do. The only question is whether the words are clear. Now, turning to these, I cannot find any ambiguity in the language. It declares that the owner of a dry dock is not to be liable in excess of the statutory limit, and the conditions defining the limit are to be sought for within the area over which the dockowner performs any duty or exercises any power. There is not a word about the capacity in which the dockowner has acted. It may well be that Parliament desired to encourage the construction of docks even by professional repairers. The expressions used in the statute are indistinguishable from those used in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 and in earlier Acts of which that statute took the place. The dockowner is put in the same position as was a shipowner. Now, if we turn to the case of a shipowner, a question analogous to that which arises in this case was settled as long ago as 1872, not, it is true, by this House, but by the full Court of Appeal in Chancery, constituted of Lord Selborne, Lord Justice James, and Lord Justice Mellish, in London and South-Western Railway Company v. James (L.R., 8 Ch., 241). The railway company, who were also shipowners, contracted to carry passengers and goods through from London to Guernsey. The passengers and goods were taken under the through contract by railway from London to Southampton, and were there put on board a ship which belonged to the railway company. A particular ship, on her way to Guernsey, came into collision with another ship and sank, with several of the passengers and all the goods. On claims for damages in respect of loss of goods and of life it was held that the railway company was entitled to the limitation on liability imposed by the then Merchant Shipping Act of 1862, section 54, the terms of which were for present purposes completely similar to those as regards ships of the Act of 1894. It was argued that the limitation had no application to the case of persons and goods carried by the shipowner when he was not merely shipowner but also carrier. But Lord Selborne and the Lords Justices held that every case where the owner would be liable, whether he was carrier or not, was intended to be within the relief given by the statute.

My Lords, the case which I have cited presents only an analogy, but I think that the analogy is a very close one, especially for the reasons given in some detail, not only by Lord Selborne, but by Lord Justice Mellish. The Court refused to entertain a distinction founded on the capacities in which the railway company contracted. It was held that the words of the enactment were so free from ambiguity as not to admit of any such distinction being drawn. Liability for what happened by the loss of the ship was specifically limited. I cannot find that this decision was noticed in the Courts below or in the arguments here, but I think that the principle adopted in it comes very close to that of the present case.

In the Court of Appeal, where the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill was reversed, Lord Justice Bankes held that some restriction must be put on the generality of the words in the section enacting the limitation. He thought that this was the result of the decision in the case of The City of Edinburgh (37 The Times L.R., 148, 468; [1921] P., 70, 274). That was a case in which by the negligence of the servants of a firm of ship repairers a vessel and its cargo were damaged by fire. The repairs were being done in a dock belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The ship repairers sought to limit their liability on the ground that they were owners of a dry dock at Garston, some distance away. It was held by Mr. Justice Hill, who also tried that case, that they were not entitled to a limitation of their liability under the section which we have to construe. For the section, in restricting the liability of the dock-owner, had, in his view, regard to the area over which he "performs any duty or exercises any power." The liability was one incurred by the ship repairers as such at a distance, and not as dockowners or at or near their dock.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Sterndale, M.R., and Lords Justices Scrutton and Younger) affirmed this judgment, but expressions were used by the two former which point to a somewhat different reason from that of Mr. Justice Hill having been in their minds. Lord Sterndale thought that the words must refer to a limitation of liability of the dockowner as such—i.e., "in respect of something in some way connected with his dock." Lord Justice Scrutton considered that the very wide words, if interpreted in their widest sense, would lead to absurdity, and it was an absurdity to limit the liability of a person who owned a dock for anything that he chose to do in another capacity. Thus, while Mr. Justice Hill made area or geographical restriction the basis of his judgment, the Court of Appeal, or at any rate the majority there, determined the case rather on the principle of distinguishing the capacity in which the repairer acted. I am not sure that Mr. Justice Hill, in his judgment in the present case, was not influenced contrary to his own opinion towards the view of capacity rather than of geographical area (which appears to have been adopted by the Court of Appeal), which differed from his opinion on the point in the case of The City of Edinburgh (supra). Anyhow, in reversing his judgment in the case now before us, the Court of Appeal, differently constituted, reverted to the principle that the basis of the limitation was area and not capacity. Lord Justice Bankes expressly says so. He doubted whether The City of Edinburgh (supra) was really based on any different principle, although he admits the ambiguity of some of the expressions used in it. He held that to introduce a limitation which depends on the nature of the act done was to create unnecessary confusion. It was simpler to read the limitation as confined to area. Lord Justice Atkin agreed. He considered that to read the words of the section literally and to apply them to the circumstances of the present case gave rise to no such absurdity as was contended for in The City of Edinburgh (supra). Moreover, it would often be impossible to determine whether particular work was done by a person as repairer or as dockowner. Lord Justice Sargant agreed. He held that there was no such absurdity in the repairers' contention as would justify a departure from the grammatical and ordinary interpretation of the words used in the statute.

My Lords, I also think that the words of the statute are too plain to admit of any other restraint being put on their operation than that of geographical area. I think that this is the result of the interpretation placed on the statute in 1872 in London and South-Western Railway Company v. James (supra). That interpretation appears to me to be the true one, and I am of opinion that this appeal should fail.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords: The respondents, the plaintiffs in the limitation action, carry on business as ship repairers at Blackwall, where they own a dry dock. While they were repairing the appellants' s.s. Ruapehu in their dry dock, fire broke out, without their actual fault or privity, and great damage was done to ship and cargo, for which at common law they were responsible. The evidence in the damage action was to the effect that the same negligence would have caused the same fire if the repairing work in question had gone on while the ship was afloat. No further evidence now material was given in the limitation action, but it was common ground that the respondents' business is to repair ships, and that at the time in question they were using their dry dock for the Ruapehu in the ordinary course of business. I think we must take this state of facts as the basis of this appeal. True, we do not know whether the respondents have a wet dock or any other submerged ground than such as may be necessary for docking and undocking ships in connexion with the dry dock; we do not know whether they also do repairs to ships afloat within their premises or to ships elsewhere whether afloat or not; we do not know whether they have any other business than that of ship repairers, but it seems to me that, if any of these questions could have affected the solution of the problem which arises on the prima facie case for limitation of liability, the appellants should have provided the materials for such answers as might have served to modify or to negative that right. For present purposes the respondents are dry dock owners; the damage was done in their dry dock and by their servants in the course of their employment; and we know of no business carried on by the respondents except that of ship repairers who use their dry dock for that purpose.

My Lords, the language of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, is clear enough. "Dockowners," which includes dry dock owners, without any specification of the use to which they put their docks, are expressly empowered, when liable for damage to ship and cargo occurring without their actual fault or privity, to limit their liability as the respondents claim to do. The appellants' argument really is that the respondents are nevertheless not within the Act, because they are dry repairing dock owners, and themselves use their dry dock for one of the main purposes for which dry docks exist—namely, ship repairing. To adopt this argument is practically to strike dry docks out of section 2, subsection (4). The short answer is that the Act says nothing of the kind. The respondents fall within the description of those persons on whom the right of limitation is conferred. What is there in the words to restrict this description so as to exclude them ?

The City of Edinburgh (37 The Times L.R., 468 ; [1921] P. 274) does not, in my opinion, touch this case. What had to be decided and what was decided there was this—how far, if at all, was the right to limitation available, where the ownership of the dock and the use of that dock had no connexion whatever with the damage or with the injured ship or cargo. The answer was not at all. A contrary conclusion would have made the Act confer a personal immunity, at the expense of owners of ships and cargoes whom they had wronged, upon persons who happened to own a dock somewhere else. The policy of the Act, beyond an intention to protect dockowners from being crushed by liabilities for accidents, which they cannot always avoid, is not declared on its face and would only be a subject of speculation now, but it certainly is safe to say, as Lord Sterndale said, that the section refers to a limitation of liability of the dockowner in respect of something in some way connected with his dock. This is the true ground of this decision, which, as a decision, cannot be questioned. I do not think it is either accurate or helpful to argue that this is a "docks clause" not a "repairers' clause," or that the action which leads to the liability must have been action by a dock-owner "as such" (except in the sense of the above words) or must have consisted in "dockowning activities." If a dry dock owner or a graving dock owner is within the section, whether or not (so far as the words go) he repairs ships in his dock or only hires it to others, I cannot see why he is not acting as a dry dock owner "as such" when he repairs a ship in his own dock in the ordinary course of business. The appellants' argument really begs the question and further introduces criteria for distinguishing one case of damages from another, almost infinitely complex, almost impossible to apply, and most arbitrary in their operation. The Act says nothing about them. They would not have been even plausible but for the notion that there is something in this kind of limitation which public policy requires us to restrict, but this, as it seems to me, is purely a matter for the Legislature. True, there is the rule that those who claim exemption from a common-law liability must bring themselves within it, but this depends on the language of the Act. Here the right to the limitation is clear, provided that the respondents are dockowners, as they are.

The question is asked, à propos of Lord Sterndale's canon in The City of Edinburgh (supra), "What connexion is there in this case between the dry dock and the fire in the ship's hold ?" The answer is, "The ship was in the respondents' dry dock and it was because she was in that dry dock that their careless workman was employed upon her at that time." True, he might equally have been employed on the Ruapehu if she had been lying afloat at buoys in the Thames and might have been equally careless there, but these were not the facts. It is true also that, if independent repairers had been at work on the Ruapehu in the respondents' dock and had been liable for the fire, they would have been liable in full, but that is because they would not be dock-owners in any way connected with the damage. Just as we cannot, as a matter of construction, extend the section to them when they are not dockowners, so we cannot exclude the respondents from it when they are. The proposition is not, "necessarily connected" or "inevitably connected" with the dock, but actually connected with it in some way. On the appellants' argument in half the cases of fire on board ship the shipowner would lose the benefit of the statutory limitation, because, as fire will break out equally on shipboard as on shore, if you upset lighted lamps or fling lighted matches among inflammable merchandise, there would be none but a casual connexion between the burning of the cargo and the ownership of the vessel. This would revolutionize what is well settled under the Act of 1894 and many earlier Acts. I see no reason for treating the amending Act of 1900 in any different way. It may be that the section fastens on ownership because the ground of the limitation may be supposed to be the great inroad upon the property owned by the judgment debtor if he were cast in damages without statutory limit, though this would have been an argument for deciding The City of Edinburgh (supra) the other way, but it throws no light on the question before us or, if it does, the light favours the respondents, for the judgment debtors are equally liable for their servants' wrong-doing to the full extent of their property, whether the servants were heating rivets or fixing shores.

My Lords, I think further that nothing can be founded upon the specification of the parties who are to enjoy the benefit of limitation of liability, or on the reference to the "area" over which they "perform any duty or exercise any power." These expressions form part of the context, but they neither add to nor take anything from the main operative words. The parties are four, dockowners (with a statement of what the word "dock" includes), canal owners with no such statement, harbour authorities, and conservancy authorities, both of these last as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, section 742, and not prima facie as owners of docks in any sense of the word. I find nothing here that excludes the respondents from being "dockowners" or that restricts the kind of operation in the course of which the liability that is to be limited is to arise. The reference to an "area" is inserted primarily in order to show where the appropriate measure for the amount of the limited liability is to be found, but in any case the Ruapehu was within the respondents' "area" when she was burnt. The words "performs any duty or exercises any power" are, it is true, odd words to apply to a private company using its own business premises and are suggestive of public authorities and undertakers, but, unless they have the effect of excluding private owners from the category of dockowners, which they clearly have not, they carry the present issue no farther. As for the observation that the section, by including wharves and jetties in docks, may raise some difficult questions, when we come to consider whether in such cases the damage is "connected with" the dock, I agree that they may, and will consider them when they do, but I need say no more about them now.

The only sound way of construing such a section is to follow its exact words and give effect to them unless some plain necessity can be found for implying some limitation. There is no absurdity, no repugnance, no inconsistency, produced by reading the words in their plain grammatical sense, and, when they are so read, the conclusion must be that at which the Court of Appeal arrived. With that I agree. I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : The facts have already been fully stated and it is unnecessary to repeat them. The parties are practically agreed as to the question which arises for decision in this appeal.

The appellants in the seventh paragraph of their case state it as follows :—

"7. It was agreed, as appears from the correspondence passing between the parties previous to the trial of the action before the Honourable Mr. Justice Hill, that the question raised by paragraph 3 of the amended defence as to whether the respondents were dockowners within the meaning of section 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, and as to whether they were entitled to limit their liability as such in the special circumstances of the present case, should be tried as a preliminary point, and this is the only question for decision upon the present appeal."

The third paragraph of the amended defence runs as follows :—

"The defendants deny that the plaintiffs are dockowners within the meaning of 63 and 64 Victoria, c. 32, and further say that the said liability of the plaintiffs was incurred by them as ship repairers and not as dockowners."

And the respondents in the second paragraph of their case state it as follows :—

"The sole question which arises on this appeal is a preliminary point of law, namely, whether the respondents (plaintiffs in the action) who are owners of a dry dock at Blackwall are entitled by virtue of section 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Victoria, c. 32), to limit their liability in respect of a fire caused by the negligence of their servants on board the s.s. Ruapehu at a time when the said steamship was lying within the respondents' said dry dock."

A reference to a most helpful authority, not cited in argument, but appealing to one's common sense, at least in my view, shows that the contention of the parties is based upon a false principle. That authority is the case of London and South-Western Railway Company v. James (L.R., 8 Ch., 241). I shall refer to the case in detail presently, but I think I may at once say that it appears to me to determine that the right of the owners of a ship which has been lost or has met with an accident depends not so much on what was the nature of the thing which met with the accident causing damage as upon what that particular thing was engaged in doing at the time when the accident happened. The particular thing in that case was a ship, and the work which she was engaged in doing was carrying passengers and goods from Southampton to Guernsey. Repairs, even substantial repairs, may be executed on a ship while she is in a wet dock belonging to certain owners, such as putting new boilers or engines into her while she is afloat, just as they may be done possibly in a graving dock belonging to the same owners. In both cases she is in the hands of repairers, the only difference being that she rests upon and is upborne by the water in the one case, and rests upon mechanical supports in the other, but the owners of the docks, the harbour authority, or the conservancy authority, exercise control over the graving dock as they do and claim to do over the floating dock. I think it is a mistake to suppose that in the case of the graving dock this authority of the dockowners, the harbour authority, or the conservancy authority is entirely superseded by that of the repairers, who happen to be executing repairs upon the ship, which it would not be if the repairs were effected in a floating dock. In the case of London and South-Western Railway Company v. James (supra) through tickets were purchased by the passengers from the company in London covering the whole journey by sea and land from London to Guernsey. No tickets of any other kind were issued to them in London, and no tickets of any kind were issued to them in Southampton. When they arrived there they straightway embarked on a steamship bound for Jersey, in this case named the Normandy. Goods were loaded on this vessel to be carried to the same destination. In the course of the voyage the steamship Normandy collided with another steamship named The Mary, and sank.

Many of the Normandy's passengers and their luggage and effects were lost and all her cargo was lost. In cross suits between the owners of the two vessels the Normandy was held alone to blame. Several actions were brought against the company, some by passengers for loss of luggage, injury and delay; some, under Lord Campbell's Act, by the administrators of the passengers who were lost. A case for limitation of liability was instituted in the Court of Admiralty, and an order was made by that Court restraining all these actions on payment by the company into Court of the sum of £6,376, being £15 per ton on the gross tonnage of the Normandy plus interest. On January 27, 1872, the Court of Exchequer, in an action instituted by one John James, one of the Normandy's passengers, decided that a writ of prohibition should issue to prohibit the Judge of the Court of Admiralty from enforcing the injunction issued by him.

This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. This decision left the persons who had brought actions, or intended to bring actions against the company in respect of the collision, free to proceed with them. The company thereupon filed a bill against the owners of the steamship Mary, and against the several persons who had actually instituted or threatened to institute actions against the company, stating the above facts, and also stating that the collision had occurred without the actual fault or privity of the company, and claiming that the company as the owners of the Normandy were entitled to such limitation of their liability as was in that behalf provided by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 and the Amendment Act of 1862, and alleging that the company for the purposes of the suit admitted their liability to the extent and to the amount mentioned in these Acts, and were willing to pay £15 per ton on the gross tonnage of the Normandy and interest thereon.

The bill prayed for a declaration that the company were, as owners of the Normandy, entitled to the benefit of the limitation of liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and that the losses and damages in respect of which they were answerable might be determined as the Court should direct, and that the defendants might be restrained from proceeding further in this suit or actions against the company.

John James, one of the passengers, denied that he had any notice of a by-law or any notice of the vessel by which he was to travel. The company allowed judgment to go by default in each of the actions which had been brought against them, but the damages had not been assessed. The Master of the Rolls granted an injunction against all the litigants except James. The other litigants were to be at liberty to have their damages assessed but not to levy them. The company appealed. The appeal was heard by a full Court. The principal point made upon the appeal was that the company were in this case acting as carriers of persons and goods, and that the Merchant Shipping Acts had no application to such cases.

Lord Selborne, in giving judgment, said at page 250 of the report that "the ordinary case was not excluded, and that every case where the owner would be liable, whether he was carrier or not, was intended to be within the relief intended to be given to the owner; nor is this inference rebutted by the subsequent repeal of this section (i.e., section 505 of the Act of 1854)." Lord Justice Mellish delivered a most helpful judgment. He said: "I think that the case clearly comes directly within the words of the Act. The London and South-Western Railway Company were the owners of the ship Normandy, and they are sued by Mr. James for damages on account of the loss of goods which were being carried on board that ship. The case being directly within the words, it ought to be held within the Act, unless it is clearly not within what was the scope and intention of the Legislature in passing the Act. But what was the scope and intention of the Legislature in passing the Act? Ever since the reign of George II. there has been a limitation on the liability of the owners of ships. It has been thought a matter of public policy to encourage persons to embark their capital in ships by limiting the liability to be incurred by the loss of goods; and this, previously to Lord Campbell's Act, was the principal liability. It was thought expedient to limit the liability, because a ship might carry gold, or goods of great value, and then, from some trifling act of neglect on the part of the master, or on the part of the man steering the vessel, the shipowner might be made subject to enormous liability. On that account the Legislature thought it was for the public advantage that there should be this limit on the liability of the owner. Why should that not apply to the case before us? The London and South-Western Railway Company are encouraged by that limitation of liability to embark, as shipowners, in the trade of carrying passengers and goods between Southampton and Jersey, and I do not understand what the grounds are upon which it is said they are not to avail themselves of this limitation. The ground put by the Master of the Rolls is simply that the passenger took a through ticket from London to Jersey. It was admitted that if the passenger had taken a ticket from London to Southampton, instead of from London to Jersey, and when he got to Southampton had walked on board the ship and had gone as a passenger to Jersey, then he would be subject to the limitation. But what possible object can there be in holding that, in order that the company may avail themselves of the limitation, it shall be necessary to deprive all their passengers of the convenience of paying for their ticket at one time, instead of paying on two different occasions? Such a decision would not deprive the company of the benefit of the Act, and would only put the passengers to inconvenience. In my opinion the case is both within the words and within what I think was the spirit of the Act."

The words of this judgment apply as appropriately to the owner of a dock as they do to the owner of a ship. Are not the owners of docks encouraged by the right of limitation of liability to embark as dockowners in the trade of affording facilities to ships to load and unload and be repaired in their dry dock? It is admitted that the words of the second section of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act of 1900 must be construed, if they are to be at all reasonably construed, so as to put some limit on its general language. This must, I think, be so, because the liability which is to be limited is the liability which would fall upon the dockowners if sued at common law for injury done to a ship in their dock by reason of the negligence of their servant. If the dockowners had docks at Leith and also docks at Southampton, and a ship was injured in the docks at Leith by reason of the negligence of the owner's servant, then if the dockowner was sued at common law in respect of the injury done at Leith, everything connected with the dock at Southampton would prima facie be held to be irrelevant and could not be gone into. Yet, as I understand it, it is contended that when the question is what liability is to be imposed, the condition, value or management of Southampton Docks, though at common law irrelevant, becomes relevant for the purpose of fixing liability. This inquiry as to the limitation of liability must, in my view, be confined to the condition of things and the occurrences in the docks in which the accident took place.

Lord Justice Bankes said that the second section of the Act of 1900 should be construed as if the words "whilst being at or upon the dock or canal" were, as I understand, inserted after the word "vessel" and before the words "be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding . . ." These words will effect the just and desired object of confining the liability which is to be limited to damages inflicted in the docks or canal mentioned earlier in the section.

On that construction, which, in my view, is necessarily the right one, the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords: The question to be decided is as to the nature of the acts in respect of which a dockowner is by virtue of section 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, entitled to limit his liability. If he carries on the business not of a dockowner only, but of a ship repairer also, is he entitled to limit his liability in respect of acts done by him as a ship repairer?

I have to assume that such events have happened that the dockowner has come under a common law liability in damages for some act done by his servants without his actual fault or privity. The section is one by virtue of which he is not to be liable in full for the damages which he is at law liable to pay. He is to be liable, so to speak, for less than he owes. It would be a material assistance if some principle could be suggested for this remission of liability, but it would seem to be the fact (and I accept it as being the fact) that the only ground for it is that a ship is a chattel of so great a value that a full liability would be so heavy that the construction and ownership of docks would be discouraged unless limitation of liability were sanctioned. This, however, does not give much assistance towards determining what the extent of the concession is to be in order to achieve the object in view. But it does give some assistance towards saying that it is to the dockowner qua dockowner that the privilege is given.

The question is entirely one of the true meaning of section 2 of the Act, and I prefer, in the first instance, to endeavour to ascertain that meaning for myself by a careful perusal of the section without reference, for the moment, to any authority; applying the usual principle of scrutinizing the language used, regarding in every case the context, bearing in mind the object indicated by the words, and thus settling the true meaning of the section in the particular circumstances of this case.

A dockowner, let us say, who is also a ship repairer, does acts in reference to a ship in the dock which he owns, but they are acts which are referable not to his character of dockowner but to his character of ship repairer. Is he entitled to limit his liability? That is the question. Purposely I assume that acts as dockowner and acts as ship repairer are capable of being discriminated. If they are not and all the acts may be taken as being done as dockowner, the question under debate does not arise.

The first guidance that I obtain in reading the section is that the dockowner is one of a group of four persons or bodies who are grouped together and form the common nominative to the verb which follows. They are : (1) the owners of any dock ; (2) the owners of any canal ; (3) harbour authorities ; and (4) conservancy authorities. The last three of these four are not bodies likely to be contemplated as carrying on the business of ship repairers. I am entitled, I think, to say that the Legislature when it mentions the dockowner is thinking of a dockowner comparable with the other three bodies, and not of a dockowner who may be carrying on other business in connexion with ships, e.g., as ship repairers or persons who supply ships' tackle.

Further, I find that by virtue of the definition in section 2 (5) the owner of a wharf or pier or jetty is, for the purposes of the Act, a dockowner. Many repairs may be done without going into dry dock. If a ship repairer, who undertakes the repair of a ship afloat, builds or buys for the purposes of his business a pier or jetty and moors the ship there while he is executing the repairs, is he a dockowner entitled to limit his liability in respect of acts done as a ship repairer ? It is truly said, I think, that it would be a cheap mode of insurance for such a ship repairer to become a dockowner by building or buying a pier.

The Court of Appeal measured the dockowner's right to limit his liability in respect of acts done as a ship repairer by geographical considerations, impressed, seemingly, by the fact that the section attributes importance to the area of the dock, since in measuring the limit of liability the ship whose tonnage is to determine the limit is to be the largest which, within a certain time, has been within the area. But there is nothing in the section to convey that the right to limit liability, as distinguished from the measure of the liability, is to be governed by the relative positions of the ship and of a dock which the ship repairer happens to own. If The City of Edinburgh (37 The Times L.R., 148, 468 ; [1921] P. 70, 274) was rightly decided (and I think it was) in my judgment it governs this case—not, of course, that it binds this House, but that in material facts it is not distinguishable. A decision is indistinguishable when not the facts but the material facts are the same. The City of Edinburgh (supra) differs from this case only in the one fact that the dockowner who was repairing the ship was repairing it in a dock which was not his own. The dock that he owned was some miles away. In the present case the dockowner was "at home" ; he was repairing the ship in a dock which he owned. I fail to see any ground upon which he should be entitled to limit his liability in the one case and not in the other. As a dockowner he either is or is not entitled to limit his liability in respect of acts which he does in a business other than that of dockowner. He must succeed in claiming limited liability, if at all, by reason of the fact that he is a dockowner, not by reason of the fact that he is a dockowner "at home." I agree with Lord Sterndale that the liability in respect of which he claims limited responsibility must be a liability of the dockowner as such—i.e., in respect of something in some way "connected with his dock," and with Lord Justice Scrutton that his limited liability as a dockowner does not extend to "anything which he chooses to do in any other capacity."

In London and South Western Railway Company v. James (L.R. 8 Ch., 241) a question arose upon the Act, but the facts were inverted. The railway company were, as shipowners, entitled by virtue of the statute to limit their liability. The question was whether they had forfeited that right because they were also a railway company and contracted with the passenger to carry him on a journey which, commencing with a journey by rail, included a passage by sea. It was held that they had not. Here the question is whether the ship repairer has acquired a right to limit his liability by reason of the fact that he is a dockowner and is repairing a ship in his own dock. London and South Western Railway Company v. James (supra) would have been in point if the accident had happened on the railway and the company had contended that their immunity as shipowners extended to the railway journey. That, of course, was not the case. I fail to see that that decision has any bearing upon the present case.

Everyone is agreed that some limitation must be placed upon the very general words of the section, because there would otherwise be included cases in which the application of this section would lead to an absurdity. The proper limitation is, I think, to read the section as if it contained the words "as such" so that the dockowner as such will enjoy the benefit in respect of acts done by him as dockowner.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords : That the actual decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The City of Edinburgh (37 The Times L.R., 468 ; [1921] P., 274) was not only right but inevitable no one at your Lordships' Bar has been bold enough to contest. Any other result on the facts of that case would have been absurd. Nevertheless the dockowners there, on the grammatical and ordinary construction of the words of section 2 (1) of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, seemed entitled to claim a decision in their favour. The words of the section so construed appeared to cover their case exactly. Yet they failed, and, as is now agreed on all hands, they rightly failed, and for one of two reasons, either of which was, in that case, adequate. They failed, either because it was, as is suggested, the opinion of the Court of Appeal that the section is only operative to limit the liability—say of the owner of a dock—in respect of a claim within the section which is made against him in that character ; or they failed, as is suggested by the respondents, because the damage there sued for was sustained by the City of Edinburgh when she was outside the area of the repairers' dock, and the Court of Appeal was of opinion that the section was, on construction, when a dock was in question, confined to cases where the vessel was actually within the dock at the critical moment.

My Lords, I was myself a party—albeit, a silent party—to that decision of the Court of Appeal. I have my own views of what the Court intended to decide. A statement of them might not have been irrelevant when this case was in the Court of Appeal. It would be of no moment now. The whole question is at large in this House, and it being conceded that the section, if absurd results are not in many cases to ensue, must be held to be limited either in the one way or in the other, the duty is now cast upon your Lordships to choose between these two alternatives. The choice is vital. In the present case everything turns upon it. If the appellants' limitation be accepted—I may compendiously describe it as a "limitation by function"—their appeal will, I think, succeed. If the respondents' be adopted—their limitation may be termed a "limitation by area"—then even more inevitably the appeal must fail.

Some of the considerations to which your Lordships will have regard in making your choice between these two alternatives are not, I should suppose, open to controversy. The House would hesitate to accept a form of limitation calculated to lead to absurdities only less numerous and serious than those from which the unqualified section has been rescued. A limitation again would be at once suspect if, as its result, it excluded from the benefit of the section cases for which, having regard to its whole frame and tenor, it must be presumed the Legislature intended to provide. Still another consideration occurs to me as apposite. The benefit of the section is extended to four classes of beneficiaries compendiously described as, the owner of a canal; the owner of a dock; a harbour authority; a conservancy authority. To each of these classes, various as they are in responsibility and status, the section extends a privilege in terms identical. It would seem to follow that any proper modification introduced into it must also with equal appropriateness apply to every case, and as the selection made will, when promulgated, apply to each member of every class benefited, it should owe nothing to the accidental circumstances of the case in which it was called for. In other words, while your Lordships, in making your final choice, will not forget the position of the owner of a dry dock, who repairs vessels within it, neither will you fail to have regard to the position under the section of the other beneficiaries, for example, that of a harbour authority, to which I will allude later.

Real assistance in this most important inquiry is, I think, supplied by an examination of the terms in which the classes to be benefited are by the section defined. The aspect in which each of them is being regarded by the Legislature is on such examination brought into full relief. A significance concealed by the compendious words of description employed in subsection 1 itself is thereby revealed.

Now the only one of these descriptive terms which is not subsequently expanded is the term "canal." Every other is the subject of a definition. I begin with the word "owner." The "owners of a dock or canal" are defined to include "any person or authority having the control and management of any dock or canal, as the case may be," subsection 5.

An owner of a dock, that is to say, to be within the protection of this section, need not be in any sense a proprietor nor need he have any proprietary interest in the dock. He is entitled to the benefit of the section if he can say of himself that he controls and manages it.

A "dock" again, as has already been stated, includes many things besides dry docks. For facility of reference I again transcribe the miscellaneous list. The term includes "wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks, gridirons, slips, quays, wharves, piers, stages, landing-places, and jetties," subsection 4.

This definition is, I think, significant in at least three relevant directions. When taken in connexion with the definition of "owner" it shows how small is the place—even in the category of "owners of docks"—which is held by those of the respondents' sub-class. Again, while it is a catalogue of places, with reference to each of which the owners in their "control and management" will frequently be responsible for damage to ships, very few of them are places in which even the possibility of their owners' conducting upon them any separate business is other than remote, or is indeed existent at all. More particularly still the definition in its remarkable comprehensiveness seems to dispose once and for all of the suggestion—never a very hardy one—that the extension of the benefit of the section to the respondents as repairers of ships under the name of the owners of a dry dock may well be justified by the view that the Legislature had an intention to encourage such repairers to construct their own dry docks wherein ship repairs could be carried out. The principle of noscitur a sociis is fatal to such a suggestion.

The definitions of a harbour authority and a conservancy authority are also specially suggestive in the present connexion. "Harbour authority" includes "all persons or bodies of persons, corporate or unincorporate, being proprietors of, or entrusted with, the duty or invested with the power of constructing, improving, managing, regulating, maintaining, or lighting a harbour." Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, section 742.

"Conservancy authority" includes "all persons or bodies of persons, corporate or unincorporate, entrusted with the duty or invested with the power of conserving, maintaining, or improving the navigation of a tidal water," ibid.

Now, my Lords, this being a section by which an identical benefit is, in identical terms, conferred upon these various classes of persons or bodies, it is manifestly important to discover, if one can, whether there is now disclosed any characteristic position or responsibility common to them all and of a nature not inappropriate to restrict the benefit which by the section is indifferently extended to each.

And first, it cannot be suggested that all the individuals or bodies concerned are looked upon as the potential owners of separate businesses for any of the responsibilities of which they should have their liability limited. This is not so of any one of them, even in their subdivisions; it is almost unthinkable in relation to a conservancy. Ownership or the possession of a proprietary interest again is not the essential thing. Even in the case of a canal or dock it is not, as has been seen, essential to protection; in the case of a conservancy authority, the possibility of ownership is not so much as mentioned in the definition, and in the case of such an authority such possibility ex necessitate rei is indeed remote.

But the examination discloses that there is attached to every one of the four a responsibility which, while in no way inconsistent with ownership, is capable of a separate existence. That responsibility is in relation to canals and docks described as the power of "control and management": it is, in relation to harbour authorities and conservancy authorities, the discharge of the duties and powers with which they are respectively entrusted and invested. And there being nothing in the section necessarily leading to any other conclusion, I should myself have thought, on a consideration of these things alone, that the liability and the only liability which under it a defendant is in any circumstances entitled to limit is a liability which, in the case of "the owner of a canal or dock," arose from his responsibility for the control and management of the canal or dock, and in the case of a harbour authority or conservancy authority arose from its discharge or failure to discharge some duty or power with which the authority in question was entrusted or invested.

But, my Lords, the correctness of this view by no means depends on that consideration alone. Later, in describing the area with reference to which the limit of liability is to be ascertained, the section refers to it as the area "over which such dock or canal owner, harbour authority or conservancy authority performs any duty or exercises any power" —the same terms being employed, it will be noticed, both with reference to the "owners" and the "authorities"; the terms chosen, as applicable to all, being taken from the definitions of the harbour and conservancy authorities to which reference has been made. My Lords, that comprehensive reference couched in these terms, so significant when they are traced to their origin, supplies to my mind the strongest confirmation of the view that the liability with which the section is dealing is a liability arising as above stated and none other.

But the argument does not even stop there. Subsection 6 of this section 2 has not yet been alluded to. To my mind it clinches the whole matter.

The subsection is as follows:—

"Nothing in this section shall impose any liability in respect of any such loss or damage on any such owners or authority in any case where no such liability would have existed if this Act had not passed."

My Lords, the necessity, or, at the least, the propriety of such a reservation is apparent if the liability referred to is intended to be confined to a liability arising from the performance of a duty or the exercise of a power in relation to a canal, dock, harbour, or conservancy area. But how entirely otiose and unnecessary it becomes if the liability to be limited is one that may arise on the part of the "owner" or "authority" on any account whatever.

Accordingly, my Lords, by reference to the terms of the section, unaltered and unexpanded, but, be it noted, to all its terms, I reach the conclusion that the liability of the respondents to the appellants, already established in this House, is entirely outside its protection. That liability was in no way referable to the duties or powers of the respondents as owners of their dock. The negligence which led to the fire on the s.s. Ruapehu in the dry dock of the respondents was negligence of their servants in the course of their duties as ship repairers—it was negligence which would have caused the fire wherever the vessel had been, whether in the dock of the respondents or of another, whether in a dock at all or afloat.

My Lords, I would further observe that the relevance to the present discussion of subsection 6 of this section 2 is very pointedly illustrated by the case of London and South Western Railway Company v. James (L.R. 8 Ch., 241), to which reference has been made by three of your Lordships. I think myself that the distinction between that case and the present has been clearly shown by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wrenbury. I refer to it again only because the whole basis of Lord Selborne's judgment is confirmatory of that view of this present section which I have ventured to present to your Lordships.

The gist of Lord Selborne's judgment is to be found in the following words at page 249 of the report:—

"We think it manifest that the ordinary case, or at least one of the most ordinary cases, in all contracts of affreightment is that of the shipowner carrying on board his own ship. The corresponding term 'carriage' occurring in the 505th section of the Act of 1854, with what is there said about freight, appears to me to show that the ordinary case was not excluded and that every case where the owner would be liable, whether he was carrier or not, was intended to be within the relief intended to be given to the owner; nor is this inference rebutted by the subsequent repeal of this section."

My Lords, I claim support from these words, "Whether the owner was carrier or not." Lord Selborne there recognizes a separation of function exactly comparable to the separation of function in the case of the owner of a dry dock who also repairs vessels within his dock. But, more apposite still, these words foreshadow the principle which in terms is to be found embodied in subsection 6 of this section. The liability of the respondents as ship repairers will be limited by the section only to the extent to which as owners of a dock they are under the same liability. But they must as dockowners be under some liability if there is to be any limitation at all. When the dock-owner is also ship repairer, he will be entitled under the section to limit the amount of such damage as would, in a question between the ship and the dock-owner, have been recoverable against the latter had he been some one other than the ship repairer. And to a limitation of that damage he will be entitled, whether or not in respect of it he was also liable as ship repairer or in any other character. But liability as dockowner for that damage there must be.

My Lords, the strength of the appellants' case is not, however, dependent only on the cogency of the considerations by which it can be affirmatively supported. It gains almost as much from the destructive criticism to which the respondents' alternative limitation is exposed. It is, I think, true of that limitation to say, first of all, that it is purely arbitrary. It will enable those in the position of the respondents to limit their liability where its origin was, in connexion with their dock, as remote or accidental as was the liability in the case of The City of Edinburgh (supra). I agree with my noble and learned friend, Lord Wrenbury, in thinking that there is, in principle, no distinction between the facts of that case and the present. But, secondly, I think this limitation is calculated to create absurdities hardly less serious than those which it would remove. Under it the liability for any damage done by the respondents, even as ship repairers, would be limited if the vessel in question were within the dock of the respondents; their liability, even as dockowners, for damage done by them without their actual fault or privity, would be unlimited if the vessel were in another dock or even just outside their own. The limitation, too, would produce the striking result shown by one of the illustrations of Mr. Justice Hill. He supposes the case of a railway company owning a pier—which is a "dock" within the meaning of the section—and also steamships. The railway company for reward permits another ship to be at the pier. One of the railway company's steamships, by the negligence of the master or crew, collides with and sinks that ship. The negligence arises and the liability is incurred in the capacity not of pier owner but of steamship owner. Yet the respondents' proposed limitation would presumably entitle the railway company, if it suited them, to limit their liability by the standard provided by the Act of 1900, and not by that provided by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. More serious still, the limitation proposed by the respondents would exclude from benefit cases—it may be many cases—which I suggest to your Lordships are clearly within the benefit of the section. Take, by way of example, one case of a harbour authority. Amongst the defined duties of such an authority, as has been seen, is that of lighting its harbour. Suppose that without the actual fault or privity of the authority the entrance to its harbour is on some stormy night left unlighted, and in consequence a vessel making for that entrance loses her bearings and is wrecked on rocks outside the harbour. My Lords, that would, I should suppose, be the case of cases clearly within the protection of the section so far as a harbour authority is concerned. Yet, if your Lordships are induced to sanction, as the proper and necessary limitation, this limitation by area, the authority would, in such a case, be left liable without limit of amount for the total loss of that ship.

My Lords, the only purpose of introducing the limitation by area in preference to a limitation by function is to include within the section liabilities incurred on what I may call general account. I have given my reasons for the view that such liabilities are quite outside the scope of the enactment. It is, however, permissible to suggest in the present connexion that a court of construction should hesitate before, by actually reading words into the section which are not there, it is led at such a price as that just indicated to produce a result at once so dubious and so equivocal. Limitation by area can, admittedly, only be made effective by reading words into the section. Unlike, as I think, limitation by function, it cannot be extracted from the section as it stands.

My Lords, I find myself in this case and for these reasons in agreement with my noble and learned friend, Lord Wrenbury.

In my judgment it would be proper for your Lordships to discharge the order appealed from and restore that of Mr. Justice Hill.

MAY v. BEATTIE.*

Metropolis — Road transport—London traffic — Restricted street — Advisory committee — Ordinary and additional members — Powers of Minister of Transport—London Traffic Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 34), ss. 1 (4), 7, Sched. II.

When the Advisory Committee appointed under the London Traffic Act, 1924, is considering and reporting and advising upon matters dealt with by the Minister of Transport in virtue of s. 7 of that Act, the additional members do not form part of the committee, and cannot be directed by the Minister to do so.

This was a case stated by Ealing magistrates which raised an important question as to the power to restrict omnibus traffic on particular routes under section 7 of the London Traffic Act, 1924.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), Mr. Roland Oliver, K.C., Mr. H. M. Giveen, and Mr. H. D. Roome appeared for the appellant, a police inspector; Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. F. W. Wallace for the respondent, the proprietor of an omnibus who had advisedly plied for hire in a "restricted" street in which he was not entitled to ply for hire if the order made in respect thereof was valid.

The Attorney-General, in opening the appeal, said that the question arose under a somewhat complicated statute, the London Traffic Act, 1924. That Act set up a Traffic Advisory Committee, which consisted of two classes of members: ordinary members, who were persons unconnected with the transport industry, and, therefore, unbiased in favour of any particular undertaking; and additional members, who were representatives of the transport industry. Under the Act, the ordinary members were to be members on all occasions; the additional members only on certain occasions specified in the Act.

The London Traffic Act, 1924, provides:—

"Section 1 (4).—The ordinary members shall form part of the committee on all occasions, and the additional members shall form part of the committee when considering and reporting to and advising the Minister upon any matter referred to the committee under or by virtue of section 10 of this Act or any matter or question referred to the committee under this Act in connexion with the matters specified in Part I. of the Second Schedule to this Act:

"Provided that the Minister may, if he thinks fit, direct that in any particular case the additional members shall form part of the committee when considering and reporting to and advising him upon any matter or question referred to the committee under this Act in connexion with any of the matters mentioned in Part II. of the said schedule.

"Section 7.—(1) Where as respects any street or part of a street within the area consisting of the City of London and the Metropolitan police district the Minister is of opinion that by reason—(a) of the width of the street or part of the street or the density of traffic thereon; or (b) of the existence of alternative facilities for the conveyance of passengers along the street or part of the street or in proximity thereto or of the omnibus accommodation on the street or part of the street being excessive; it is desirable that an order under this section shall be made, he may by order declare the street or part of the street to be a street in which the plying for hire by omnibuses ought to be prohibited or restricted. . . ."

Subsection (2) gives power to the Minister to make regulations as to plying for hire by the omnibuses of particular proprietors "but so nevertheless that the right so to ply shall not be limited to the omnibuses of one proprietor in any case where it appears to the Minister to be reasonable and practicable that the right should be exercised by other omnibuses also."

Subsection (5) requires the Minister before making an order or regulations to refer the matter to the Advisory Committee for their advice and report.

Schedule II. to the Act is in three parts:—

"Part I.—Matters in respect of which the additional members are to form part of the Advisory Committee: (a) The co-ordination of all or any of the various forms of transport services, and cooperation between the persons operating the same or different forms of transport services with a view to the combined operation of all means of transport in the London Traffic Area in the best interests of the public; . . . (d) the making of new orders, by-laws and regulations . . relating to traffic on streets in the London Traffic Area; . . . (f) the comparative desirability of different forms of transport services in various circumstances. . . .

"Part II.—Matters in respect of which the additional members are, if the Minister so directs, to form part of the Advisory Committee: . . . (i) The exercise of any of the powers of the Minister from whatsoever source derived in relation to traffic on streets in the London Traffic Area, with the exception of any matters dealt with by him in virtue of section 7 of this Act."

Part III. deals with matters in respect of which the additional members are not to form part of the Advisory Committee.

The respondent was charged before the Ealing petty sessions upon two informations laid by the appellant, charging him that he on March 30, 1926, not being a scheduled proprietor within the meaning of paragraph 3 and Schedule I. of the London Traffic (Restricted Streets) (Uxbridge-road) Provisional Regulations, 1926, did ply for hire westward with his omnibus on sections B and C respectively of the said Uxbridge-road contrary to paragraph 5 of the said regulations and section 7 of the London Traffic Act, 1924.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Minister on February 14, 1925, asked for the advice and report of the Advisory Committee on the exercise of his powers under section 7. On April 17, 1925, the Minister gave notice in the London Gazette of his intention to make an order declaring certain streets (including the Uxbridge-road) to be restricted streets, and regulations as to the number of omnibuses which might ply for hire thereon. On June 3, 1925, the Minister in purported exercise of his powers under section 7 of the said Act made an order (the London Traffic (Restricted Streets) (No. 2) Order, 1925 (St. R. and O. 1925, No. 549)), by which the Uxbridge-road from Shepherd's Bush-green to Harefield-road, Uxbridge, was declared to be a restricted street.

On February 9, 1926, the Advisory Committee made a report, by the ordinary members only. On March 22, 1926, the Minister purported to make Provisional Regulations (the London Traffic (Restricted Streets) (Uxbridge-road) Provisional Regulations, 1926), which purported to come into operation on March 29, 1926. The said regulations divided the Uxbridge-road into three sections, A, B, and C, and provided that, save as therein provided, no omnibus should ply for hire on the said road or any part thereof except the omnibuses of the scheduled proprietors. The respondent was not a scheduled proprietor.

On March 30, 1926, the respondent did ply for hire with his omnibus on sections B and C of the Uxbridge-road. On the same day the Minister published a further notice in the London Gazette.

The respondent contended that the order and provisional regulations were invalid and ultra vires upon the grounds :—(1) that the Minister had not complied with the provisions of the London Traffic Act, 1924, in that the additional members of the Advisory Committee had not been consulted by him ; (2) that the Minister, in taking into consideration and acting upon the said report of the ordinary members of the Advisory Committee, took into consideration matters outside the purview of the London Traffic Act, 1924 —namely, the financial position of the London United Tramways Company, Limited, which owned and operated a tramway system on the said Uxbridge-road, and of other undertakings owning and operating tramways in other parts of the London traffic area ; and the desirability of improving the financial position of the said undertakings by protecting the same from the competition of omnibuses on the said road and other roads in the said area which were served by tramways.

A number of other objections were set out in the case, but, inasmuch as the magistrates by a majority found that the provisional regulations were invalid and ultra vires upon the first two grounds, they gave no decision upon the remaining grounds.

The majority of the magistrates put their judgment in writing, and said :—

"What has happened is this : contrary to the terms of section 1, subsection (4), the Minister has referred the questions provided by section 7, subsection (5), to an advisory committee consisting of ordinary members only, and we are of opinion that these regulations are therefore invalid. In addition, even assuming the report of the committee to be in order, we are of opinion that the findings are largely based on the economic position of the tramway companies. This is a question as to which we find no reference in the Traffic Act, which appears to us to be an Act dealing only with the congestion and regulation of the traffic in the Metropolitan area."

The Attorney-General, continuing his argument, said that the matters on which the additional members of the committee were to be consulted were specified in the Act. The exercise of the Minister's powers under section 7 was expressly excluded. On the second point, it was the Advisory Committee that had made a report in favour of protecting the tramways for the sake of certain advantages which they gave the public, such as cheaper fares. The Minister was not bound to act on the report, nor was there any evidence that he had been influenced by the report in making his regulations.

He submitted that the case ought to go back to the magistrates, and it would be convenient that they should decide all the matters raised, as it was urgent in the public interest that this question should be settled.

Mr. Comyns Carr pointed out that if the matter was important from the point of view of the Minister of Transport, it was equally so from the point of view of the independent proprietors of omnibuses. The respondent here was the owner of only one omnibus, in respect of which he had duly deposited a schedule and obtained a licence. If he were driven off the road there was no alternative route to which he could go.

He submitted that in the absence of the clearest words no Court would hold that an Act of Parliament had the effect of driving a man off the streets for the benefit of his competitors. The Act must be construed strictly against those who proposed to act under it, Reed v. Ingham (3 E. and B., 889, at p. 899). The Act itself set up the committee with a view to facilitating the "regulation" of traffic. Considerations of the financial position of particular suppliers of traffic facilities were outside the purview of the committee.

The additional members were not included in the committee, but local authorities, such as those of East and West Ham, which owned tramway undertakings, were represented as ordinary members.

In his submission this question clearly fell under Part I. (d) of the Second Schedule. It might also have fallen under I. (a) or (f), but it was enough if it fell under (d). The only way to reconcile Part II. (i) with Part I. (d) was to construe the reference to section 7 as a reminder that that was already a matter on which the additional members must be included and was not in the Minister's discretion under Part II.

Not only would the opposite construction produce a direct conflict between Part I. (d) and Part II. (i), but if it had been the intention to exclude section 7 from the consideration of the additional members the appropriate place for it was Part III., which contained no mention of it at all.

As to the other question, apart from the wording of the report itself, that the Minister acted upon it was evidenced by the fact that restrictions were applied only to those parts of the routes where there was tramway competition. It required very strong words in a statute to authorize the putting of money into a person's pocket at the expense of his competitors, and it was not a thing that this Act entrusted to a Government Department.

Mr. Justice Avory.—This is a special case stated by justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex raising several questions of law, only two of which have, up to the present, been decided by the justices ;

if we agree with their view it would not be necessary to send the case back, but if we dissent from them, then it is obvious that it has to go back for their determination upon the other points.

The first ground upon which the justices have decided, and which is very plainly stated in their judgment, is this, that the regulations made by the Minister under the London Traffic Act, 1924, in this case were invalid because they were not made upon a report of the Advisory Committee upon which the additional members, as they are called, sat and formed part.

The Act of Parliament, by section 7, subsection (5), provides : " Before making an order declaring any street or part of a street to be a restricted street, or making any regulations under this section, the Minister shall give such notice of his intention to make the order or regulations, as the case may be, as he may think best adapted for informing persons affected, and shall refer the matter to the Advisory Committee for their advice and report."

The order in this case was made upon June 3, 1925, and an attempt has been made by Mr. Comyns Carr before us to take a point which was not taken before the justices, namely, that that order was not made after the advice and report of the committee, and he based that contention on the fact that the only report of the committee which was produced before the justices was one dated in February of 1926. I am of opinion that that point is not open, first because it was not in fact taken before the justices, and, secondly, because from page 5 of this report it is abundantly clear that before this date, February, 1926, the committee had made a previous recommendation to the Minister recommending the making of orders and regulations under section 7 of the Act, and the report on its face states that these recommendations were adopted by the Minister, with the results which are set out in the report. Therefore the case falls to be dealt with on the assumption that this order was made after the Advisory Committee had advised and reported upon the matter, and it is not disputed that the regulation which is in question was in fact made after the advice and report.

Now the question to be determined here is whether the Act of Parliament required that the additional members, as they are called, should form part of the committee when they were considering and advising and reporting to the Minister in this particular case. Section 1, subsection (4), provides that " The ordinary members shall form part of the committee on all occasions, and the additional members shall form part of the committee when considering and reporting to and advising the Minister upon any matter referred to the committee under or by virtue of section 10 of this Act, or any matter or question referred to the committee under this Act in connexion with the matters specified in Part I. of the Second Schedule to this Act : Provided that the Minister may, if he thinks fit, direct that in any particular case the additional members shall form part of the committee when considering and reporting to and advising him upon any matter or question referred to the committee under this Act in connexion with any of the matters mentioned in Part II. of the said Schedule "—that is of the Second Schedule. That refers us to the Second Schedule, Part I and Part II., and here, before dealing with the difficulties which arise, it is fair to say that the learned Attorney-General admitted that this legislation was at least open to criticism, and the learned counsel, Mr. Comyns Carr, has admitted that it is full of tautology. I concur in both those criticisms upon it, and would add to them that not only does it contain a large amount of tautology, but it contains a certain amount of contradiction also, which makes it very difficult to construe.

Was this a matter which comes within Part I. of the Second Schedule ? If it was, then the respondent here says that under subsection (4) of section 1 of the Act the additional members ought to have formed part of the committee. Now there is no doubt that the different clauses of Part I. of the Second Schedule are in such general terms that they might be said to include anything and everything which the Minister could do under this Act. Mr. Comyns Carr relies mainly upon clauses (a) and (d) of Part I. He says that the order and regulations in this case related to the co-ordination of all or any of the various forms of transport services within the meaning of clause (a), or, he says, it clearly was a matter relating to the making of new orders, by-laws, and regulations relating to traffic on streets, within the meaning of clause (d). No doubt the words are wide enough to include this particular matter. In my view, Part I. of the Second Schedule is not intended to refer or relate to the general administrative functions which the Minister is called upon to perform under the Act, but they are matters which contemplate future general legislation ; and that view is confirmed, I think, by Part II. of the Schedule. If, as may, I think, be presumed, Part II. was drafted after or simultaneously with Part I., those who drafted it must have had in view what had been provided in these clauses (a) and (d) of Part I. when they enacted, as they did in Part II., certain matters in respect of which the additional members are, if the Minister so directs, to form part of the Advisory Committee. That obviously contemplates that they are not to form part of the Advisory Committee unless the Minister so directs. And in clause (i) of that Part II. we find this provision, that one of the matters in respect of which the additional members are, if the Minister so directs, to form part of the Advisory Committee, is : " The exercise of any of the powers of the Minister from whatsoever source derived in relation to traffic on streets in the London traffic area." That is a wide and comprehensive phrase, which would seem to include all the powers which are given by this Act to the Minister, as all the powers which are given, or almost all of them, are in relation to traffic on streets in the London area. But it says : " With the exception of any matters dealt with by him in virtue of section 7 of this Act." Now I read that exception in Part II. of the Schedule to mean this, that when the Minister is dealing with matters by virtue of section 7 of the Act, in that case not only do the additional members not form part of the Advisory Committee, but that is not a case in which the Minister is to direct or can direct that they shall form part of the Advisory Committee. Turning back to section 7, in order to see whether there is any intelligible reason why that should have been made an exception to the general rule, we find that it is a section which deals expressly with the power of the Minister to declare a street to be a restricted street in which the plying for hire by omnibuses ought to be prohibited or restricted, and that power is to be exercised by the Minister if he is of opinion that by reason of the existence of alternative facilities for the conveyance of passengers along the street or part of the street or in proximity thereto, or of the omnibus accommodation on the street or part of the street being excessive—in those cases he is given power to prohibit or restrict omnibuses from plying for hire in a particular street or part of a street. Therefore, that section 7 being limited in that way in its operation, there does appear at all events an intelligible reason why it should be made an exception and taken out of Part II. of the Schedule as one of the cases where the Minister can call in the assistance of the additional members. If that view is right, then it is clear that the objection based on that fact that in this case the additional members did not form part of the Advisory Committee fails.

The second ground is this. It is perhaps better to read the actual words of the judgment of the justices in this case. They say : "Even assuming the report of the committee to be in order, we are of opinion that the findings are largely based on the economic position of the tramway companies. This is a question as to which we find no reference in the Traffic Act, which appears to us to be an Act dealing only with the congestion and regulation of the traffic in the Metropolitan area." Now in my view, whatever conclusion may be drawn from the report of the committee—about which I will say a word in a moment—there is before us no evidence, and there was not before the justices any evidence, that the Minister, in making this order and in making these regulations, was influenced or that his decision was based upon what is called the economic position of the tramway companies. Looking at the report of the committee, although no doubt it contains figures showing the amount of the capital which has been expended on the tramways, and showing the losses which have been made in recent years on the tramways owing to omnibus competition, although it contains those particulars, in my view the overriding consideration which the committee had in mind was the necessity of maintaining the tramways in the interests of the public ; and it is obvious, and it was obvious to them, that they cannot be maintained if they are continually being carried on at a heavy loss. Even if it be assumed that the Minister took into consideration these figures that appeared in the committee's report, I see nothing whatever to justify us in saying that he was influenced by any other consideration than the necessity of maintaining the tramways for the benefit of the public, and, in the words of section 7, the existence of alternative facilities for the conveyance of passengers along the street in question—which in fact, of course, means, and can only mean in this case, the existence of the tramways.

On those grounds, therefore, I think the second objection also fails and that the appeal, therefore, ought to be allowed on these two points.

The other points of law which are set out in the special case depend, apparently, upon the finding of certain facts which have not yet been found, and it is for that reason that they must all be remitted to the justices ; and in accordance with the express wish of the Attorney-General, even if we cannot give an actual direction to the justices, we certainly express the hope that they will determine all these other objections before the case comes back to this Court again.

Mr. Justice Swift.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the question arises primarily under section 7, subsection (5), of the London Traffic Act, 1924, which provides that before making a certain order or certain regulations the Minister is, amongst other things, to refer the matter to the Advisory Committee set up under the Act, for their advice and report ; and the first point deals with the constitution of the Advisory Committee, and it bears upon the construction of section 1, subsection (4), of the same statute. That subsection contemplates that there are certain members who are to be on the committee on all occasions, and there are certain additional members who are to form part of the committee when considering certain matters, and upon the question what those matters are the controversy here depends. They comprise, first of all, matters referred to the committee under section 10 of the Act, which is not here material, or any matter or question referred to the committee under the Act, in connexion with the matters specified in Part I. of the Second Schedule to the Act.

Now, there are, as I read the Act, two functions of this committee. First of all, there are certain matters which have to be referred to them by the Minister before he can take certain steps under the statute, amongst other things, before he can make the order or the regulations which are in question here ; but besides that, they have a duty, under section 2, of considering and reporting to the Minister on any matters within the scope of the provisions of the Act or such matters and questions as may be referred to them under the Act, or as the Minister may from time to time refer to them in connexion with any of the matters mentioned in the Second Schedule to the Act.

The argument for the respondent in this case is based upon the provisions of the Second Schedule, and it is said that that schedule uses words which are quite wide enough—and indeed they certainly are, considered by themselves—to include such an order and regulations as are in question here. But in my opinion, although the drafting of the Act is responsible for the confusion which has been introduced, that is not the true way to read section 1, subsection (4), or the reference to the Second Schedule which is contained in it. In my opinion the Second Schedule relates not to matters which the Minister is bound to refer to the committee under the Act, but it refers to matters which he may refer under section 2 and which, if he does refer, it is the duty of the committee to assist him on. I think that follows when the Act is carefully looked at, and when sections 1 and 2 and the Second Schedule are compared. It is greatly assisted by the heading of the Second Schedule : "Particular Matters which may be referred to the Advisory Committee"—a heading which is singularly inappropriate if it comprises a matter which the Minister under the Act is bound to refer to the committee before he can take the action which is here in question. So read, I think the Act becomes fairly consistent, whatever one may think of the way in which it has been expressed. I agree, also, if I may say so, that when you look at Part II. of the schedule under the heading "Matters in respect of which the additional members are, if the Minister so directs, to form part of the Advisory Committee," and when you find under that these words : (i) "The exercise of any of the powers of the Minister from whatsoever source derived in relation to traffic on streets in the London traffic area, with the exception of any matters dealt with by him in virtue of section 7 of this Act," it is really impossible to conceive that Parliament can have been intending to except section 7, which deals with the restriction of the plying for hire by omnibuses within a certain area, and with that alone, from the part of the schedule which contemplates the option of the Minister in certain cases to direct a particular constitution of the Advisory Committee, and at the same time to leave the making of new orders, by-laws, and regulations relating to traffic on streets in the London traffic area (which comprises only a part of what is mentioned in clause (i)) in the embracing words "The exercise of any of the powers of the Minister from whatsoever source derived in relation to traffic on streets in the London traffic area." To leave him, as to that, obliged to order that the committee whom he consults is to include these additional members is a construction so insensible that I think it goes very near to demonstrating that the construction argued for on the part of the respondent is untenable.

With regard to the other point, I would only like to say this, that assuming, as I do for the purposes of this judgment, that the Minister in making this order and these regulations did not shut his eyes to the financial effect of unrestricted omnibus competition upon statutory tramway undertakings, it appears to me impossible to contend that he was not entitled to consider that amongst other things. His attention is specially directed by the Act to, amongst other things, the existence of alternative facilities for the conveyance of passengers along the street in which he is invited to make an order either for prohibiting or restricting the plying for hire of omnibuses; and to say that Parliament, in giving such power, intended that he should not be entitled to consider how the existence of the tramway in that street might be affected if some reduction or restriction of omnibus competition was not effected, seems to me really quite an impossible view of the powers which Parliament by this statute intended to confer upon the Minister. Parliament naturally and obviously considered that, dealing with that question, he would consider all matters relevant to it, all the results of the existence of tramway facilities in the street, and it is not perhaps immaterial to observe that by the same section Parliament retained to itself the power, if necessary, to disallow any regulation made under the Act by the Minister.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the magistrates came to an erroneous decision on the two points of law which they decided, and I agree that the matter must go down to them to deal with the rest of the case.

REX v. ESSEX JUSTICES—EX PARTE PERKINS.*

Justices — Certiorari—Bias—Justices' clerk a partner in firm which had acted for complainant—No personal knowledge that firm had so acted—Order quashed.

Certiorari will issue to quash a maintenance order made by justices when it is shown that the justices' clerk is a member of a firm of solicitors which acted for the wife at an earlier stage of the same proceedings, even though it is proved that the wife's business was conducted exclusively by a managing clerk in charge of a branch office, and that the justices' clerk was in fact quite unaware that his firm had ever acted for her. The test is not whether there is in fact bias, but whether a reasonable man concerned in the proceedings might think that the tribunal was not impartial.

Rex v. Hurst and Others, Sussex Justices—Ex parte McCarthy (40 The Times L.R., 80; [1924] 1 K.B., 256) applied.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash, at the instance of William John Albert Perkins, a maintenance order made by the justices of the Tendring Division of the county of Essex in favour of his wife, Kathleen Maria Florence Perkins. The rule was obtained upon the ground that the justices' clerk, having acted as solicitor for one of the parties until immediately before the hearing, took part in the hearing.

The applicant filed an affidavit setting forth that he was the managing director of a printing works. After some detail not material to this report, the applicant stated that in or about June, 1926, his wife consulted Mr. C. Gordon Jones, who practised as Messrs. Jones and Son at Clacton-on-Sea and was clerk to the justices of the Tendring Division, as to arranging a deed of separation, and that he received from Mr. Jones a number of letters, and that in particular on July 19 and on August 4, 1926, Mr. Jones wrote to the applicant threatening to issue a summons; to some of these letters the applicant replied. [The letters were exhibited to the affidavit and were all written from Hurlingham Chambers, Clacton-on-Sea, and were signed "Jones and Son." The applicant's reply was also addressed to "Messrs. Jones and Son."]

On September 15, 1926, the applicant was served with a summons at the instance of his wife charging him with wilfully neglecting to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife and children. On September 27, 1926, he attended at the Petty Sessional Court for the division of Tendring, appearing in person. Six justices sat. Mr. Field, a solicitor, appeared for the wife, and began the case by saying that, as the justices were aware, the case had been in the hands of other solicitors. Mr. C. Gordon Jones acted as clerk to the magistrates, and (as the affidavit alleged) "practically conducted the proceedings," taking part in the examination of the wife and in particular eliciting that she was not willing to return to live with her husband. The applicant further alleged that he was much confused and embarrassed in his cross-examination of his wife by Mr. Jones saying that he was not to make speeches but only to ask questions. He made certain other complaints as to the conduct of the proceedings, in that letters put in by him were not passed by Mr. Jones to the Bench, but were shown to Mr. Field. Finally the applicant asked the Bench to adjourn the application for three months to enable him to find accommodation for his family. The Bench retired with Mr. Jones, and on returning the chairman stated that they had decided to adjourn the case for two months, the applicant to pay 30s. a week meanwhile. Owing to a misunderstanding as to the date fixed for the adjourned hearing, the applicant was not present thereat, but he was informed that Mr. Jones again acted as clerk and the justices made the permanent order now sought to be quashed.

In the concluding paragraph of the affidavit the applicant said: "During the proceedings at which I attended I felt embarrassed in my conduct of the case by reason of the feeling that although Mr. C. Gordon Jones had formally divested himself of his capacity of solicitor for my wife and was now a part of the tribunal, whose duty it was to adjudge the matter in question, or was their legal adviser, he was adverse to me. I was not aware at the time that I could make objection to his conducting the proceedings or advising the magistrates or retiring with them."

The justices did not show cause, but filed an affidavit to the effect that they were unaware that Mr. Jones or his firm had acted for the complainant, that they had been shown by him all the documents, that he did not "practically conduct the proceedings" or put any more than the usual formal questions, and that when he retired with them he advised them—contrary to their general opinion—to grant the application for an adjournment. Mr. Jones in no way showed any feeling against the applicant, but if the applicant had given the slightest intimation that Mr. Jones or his firm had acted for the wife they would have arranged for a deputy to sit as clerk.

Mr. Gordon Jones, who showed cause by counsel, filed an affidavit that he was the surviving member of the firm of Jones and Son, solicitors, of Colchester, clerk to the justices of the Tendring Division, and also of the Lexden and Winstree Division of the county of Essex, and Registrar of the Haverhill County Court of Suffolk, and had offices at Colchester, at Clacton-on-Sea in the Tendring Division, and at Haverhill. The Clacton-on-Sea office was kept mainly for the purpose of the business of the clerkship to the Tendring justices, and was under the management of his clerk, Mr. Francis Probyn Dighton. He personally seldom attended at the Clacton office except on Court days, but was available by telephone or otherwise for special or urgent matters, and routine and minor business was dealt with by Mr. Dighton, whose duty was to make a weekly report to the Colchester office of the business transacted at the Clacton office. In Mr. Dighton's report for June 12 there was a reference: "New matters: 57. Mrs. Perkins. Separation agreement. I am afraid the costs will be very small." No further reference to the matter occurred in any report from Mr. Dighton, and Mr. Jones, if he had thought of it at all (though he did not), would have assumed that the matter had been completed or become abortive. He never heard anything further, and he made no inquiry about Mrs. Perkins or her business till after the rule nisi was granted. He had not seen or signed any of the letters written by his firm, nor did he when the case appeared in the agenda paper of the Court on September 27 in any way connect it with the Mrs. Perkins whose name had been mentioned in Mr. Dighton's report in June. Mr. Dighton did not attend the Court on either date, and Mr. Jones did not know that Mr. Field had not been instructed by the complainant in the ordinary way. He did not remember any mention being made of "other solicitors," and certainly did not understand that his firm was referred to. He answered the applicant's affidavit in detail, and in particular stated that he advised the justices on September 27 that the case was not sufficiently made out to justify them in making a permanent order—which they were prepared to make—and he advised them to grant the applicant's request for an adjournment. The applicant appeared from the paragraph of his affidavit quoted above to have been aware throughout the proceedings that Mr. Jones through his firm had been or purported to have been directly or indirectly or in some way interested in or concerned for his said wife, but apparently deliberately forbore to draw attention to the alleged circumstances, and gave no indication of embarrassment such as he alleged. Any protest or suggestion by the applicant that Mr. Jones or his firm had been concerned would at once have received attention, and Mr. Jones would have asked the justices to appoint a deputy-clerk, and this could have been done without delay or expense. Mr. Jones finally said that he was not consulted in any way when the justices made the final order which it was sought to quash.

Mr. S. E. Pocock showed cause for Mr. Gordon Jones; Mr. Alexander Cairns supported the rule.

Mr. Justice Avory.—This is an application on behalf of one William John Albert Perkins to remove into this Court a maintenance order made in favour of his wife, Kathleen Maria Florence Perkins, dated November 22, 1926, on the ground that the justices' clerk, having acted as solicitor for one of the parties until immediately before the hearing, took part in the hearing. There is no dispute upon the material facts that before the hearing of the summons the firm, of which the clerk was a partner, had acted for the wife, and carried on a considerable correspondence with the husband upon the very subject which came before the justices—namely, the neglect of the husband to maintain his wife. On the hearing the present applicant appeared in person to answer the complaint, and the justices' clerk was present taking the ordinary part which a justices' clerk takes. I certainly think we must accept a statement made by the justices' clerk that he was not in fact aware that his firm were acting as solicitors for the then defendant, the fact being that the business of his office at Clacton was conducted entirely by a managing clerk who reported weekly. With the exception of one weekly report that a Mrs. Perkins had called at the office there was no mention of the name. I accept the statement of the justices' clerk that if he had ever seen that name he had entirely forgotten it.

But he did retire with the Bench after the applicant had cross-examined his wife with a view to showing that no order should be made. The applicant did suggest, it is true, at the end of his case that if an adjournment were granted he could make arrangements. The clerk retired with the justices, and suggested to them that there were no grounds for the making of a permanent order, and he advised that an adjournment should be granted. On the adjourned hearing the applicant, through some misunderstanding, did not attend, and the justices made a permanent order.

It may be quite true, as Mr. Pocock has said, that no injustice has been done. We must apply the principle which Lord Hewart, C.J., repeated in the case of Rex v. Hurst and Others, Sussex Justices—Ex parte McCarthy (40 The Times L.R., 80; [1924] 1 K.B., 256, at p. 258): "It is said, and no doubt truly, that when that gentleman retired in the usual way with the justices, taking with him the notes of the evidence in case the justices might desire to consult him, the justices came to a conclusion without consulting him, and that he scrupulously abstained from referring to the case in any way. But while that is so, a long line of cases shows that it is not merely of some importance, but is of fundamental importance, that justice should not only be done, but should manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done."

I think the Lord Chief Justice clearly meant to say "seem," not "be seen," as it appears in the reports. He continued: "The question, therefore, is not whether in this case the deputy-clerk made any observation or offered any criticism which he might not properly have made or offered; the question is whether he was so related to the case in its civil aspect as to be unfit to act as clerk to the justices in the criminal matter. The answer to that question depends not upon what actually was done, but upon what might appear to be done. Nothing is to be done which creates even a suspicion that there has been an improper interference with the course of justice."

The only difficulty which arises in this case arises from the fact that the clerk has stated on affidavit—and I accept it—that he did not in fact know that his firm had acted; and, if we had to decide whether there was in fact bias, that would be most material, but what we have to determine is whether it would appear to one of the parties that justice was done. In my view, although the clerk did not know that his firm had acted, I think the necessary, or at least the reasonable, view would be that justice was not being done, inasmuch as the clerk was a member of the firm which had acted for the present applicant's wife.

The only other question is waiver. The applicant states in paragraph 10 of his affidavit : "During the proceedings at which I attended I felt embarrassed in my conduct of the case by reason of the feeling that although Mr. C. Gordon Jones had formally divested himself of his capacity of solicitor for my wife and was now a part of the tribunal whose duty it was to adjudge the matter in question, or was their legal adviser, he was adverse to me." He knew the fact, therefore, that Mr. Jones was a member of the firm, but he goes on : "I was not aware at the time that I could make objection to his conducting the proceedings or advising the magistrates or retiring with them." The question is whether in those circumstances he can be said to have waived this objection. We must act on what was said by Sir John Romilly, M.R., in Vyvyan v. Vyvyan (30 Beav. 65, at p. 74) : "Waiver or acquiescence, like election, presupposes that the person to be bound is fully cognizant of his rights, and that being so, he neglects to enforce them, or chooses one benefit instead of another, either, but not both, of which he might claim." I think it cannot be said that the applicant was fully cognizant of his rights, and therefore he cannot be said to have waived them. For these reasons, although no moral blame attaches to the clerk to the justices, I think that this rule must be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Swift.—It is essential that justice should be so administered as to satisfy reasonable persons concerned that the tribunal is impartial. As was said by Lord Hewart, C.J., in Rex v. Hurst and Others, Sussex Justices—Ex parte McCarthy (40 The Times L.R., 80 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 256, at p. 259) : "Nothing is to be done which creates even a suspicion that there has been an improper interference with the course of justice."

Might a reasonable man in the position of the applicant think that there was interference ? I think he might, and I agree that the order made by the justices must be moved into this Court to be quashed.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I agree.

On an application for costs against the justices' clerk,

Mr. Justice Avory said :—It is a little unusual for a clerk to justices to appear to show cause, but as he has done so the order must be with costs.

LAKE v. SIMMONS.*

Insurance (Theft)—Jewelry—Necklets obtained from assured by woman to show to third parties — Sale by woman — Larceny by trick — Necklets obtained by assured "on approval" — Whether held "in trust" — "Responsibility" of assured — Exception in policy.

The plaintiff, a jeweller, insured against theft with the defendant and other Lloyd's underwriters jewelry which was his own property, or which he held in trust, or for which he was held to be responsible, while it was in his custody or in the custody of any person or persons to whom he might have entrusted the same on the condition of sale or return, for valuation or inspection, or for any purpose whatsoever. The policy excepted "loss by theft or dishonesty committed by . . . any customer . . . in respect of goods entrusted to him. . . ." A woman, who had previously bought from the plaintiff and paid for certain minor articles, told the plaintiff that her "husband" (a man with whom in truth she was living) wished to give her as a birthday present a pearl necklet of the value of £1,000. The plaintiff procured from London firms two necklets on approval, the "appro. notes" declaring that they remained the property of the senders, and he allowed the woman to take them away to show to her "husband," and the necklets were debited to that man in the plaintiff's books. Later the woman brought back one necklet, saying that her "husband" preferred the other, but that he was away, and could not pay for it until his return home. At another interview she said that her sister's fiancé wished to buy the necklet which she had returned, and she was allowed to take it away again to show it to him, the necklet being debited to him in the plaintiff's books. In fact the woman's statements about her "husband" (who knew nothing about the necklets) were all untrue, her "sister's fiancé" was a fictitious person, and she sold both the necklets through a pawnbroker.

Held, that the woman's conduct constituted larceny of the necklets by a trick, since the plaintiff had never intended to pass the property in them to her, but only that she should hand them for inspection and approval to others whom only the plaintiff intended to be his purchasers and debtors, and that the goods had not been "entrusted" to a "customer" within the meaning of the exception, since there was no mutual assent to a contract of bailment, and since the plaintiff did not look on the woman as a possible purchasing customer ; and therefore the action succeeded.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 425 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 51) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 425 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 51), reversing by a majority the judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie (42 The Times L.R., 168 ; [1926] 1 K.B. 366). The Court of Appeal held that the respondent was not liable to the appellant on a Lloyd's policy of insurance, underwritten by the respondent, dated December 28, 1922, in respect of the loss of two pearl necklaces valued at £750 and £700 respectively. The substantial question was whether one Esme Ellison who had been convicted of the theft of the necklaces, was, in relation to the necklaces, a customer of the appellant within the meaning of one of the exceptions in the policy.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Haldane.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. J. B. Melville, K.C., appeared for the appellant; Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. F. van den Berg for the respondent.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—My Lords: In this case there is no dispute as to the facts. What has happened is that two of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal have taken a different view of the interpretation to be put on them from that taken by Lord Justice Atkin who dissented, and that taken by Mr. Justice McCardie who tried the case.

The narrative of events is briefly this. The appellant, who claims as plaintiff on a policy of insurance, is a jeweller at Exeter who became insured in 1922 by a Lloyd's policy underwritten, among others, by the respondent, to cover risks up to a total of £16,000 for 12 months. The property so insured consisted of the appellant's stock-in-trade, and it included precious stones, pearls, and all other articles usually kept in stock by jewellers. What was insured extended not only to the property of the appellant, who was described in the policy by the name of his firm, but to what he held in trust or commission, or was held by him as responsible while in his own custody, "or in the custody of any person to whom" he might "have entrusted the same on the conditions of sale or return, for valuation, or inspection, or for any other purpose whatsoever." The perils insured against were loss or damage or misfortune to any of the property arising from any cause, with the exception, set out specially in the policy, of "loss by theft or dishonesty committed by any servant or traveller or messenger in the exclusive employment of the assured (except when conveying goods to the post), or by any customer or broker or broker's customer in respect of goods entrusted to them by the assured, his servants or agents," unless such loss "arise, when the goods are deposited for safe custody by the assured, his servant or agents, with such broker or customer or broker's customer."

The claim of the appellant under this policy was for the value of two pearl necklets (valued at £750 and £700 respectively) lost during the currency of the policy. The circumstances in which the claim arose are as follow:—The claim was made by the appellant against the respondent, representing a number of insurers, by reason of the fraudulent conduct of a woman named Esme Ellison, who was convicted, on October 2, 1923, at the quarter sessions of the city of Exeter, of theft of the necklets, the subject of the claim in this action, and was sentenced to hard labour for sixteen months. She was a practised criminal, who had been previously convicted of larceny and false pretences and had spent substantial periods in prison.

In the early part of 1923 Esme Ellison was living with a Mr. Van der Borgh, who probably knew nothing of her past, as his wife, which she was not, at Stonelands, a well-known residence near Dawlish, not very far from Exeter. On March 2, 1923, she called at the appellant's shop in Exeter, and saw his manager. She said that she was living with her husband at Stonelands, and mentioned that her sister had just become engaged to a Commander Digby. She bought a ring for £30. This sum was debited to her personally, as Mrs. Van der Borgh, and she paid it on March 6 by cheque on a local bank with which she had opened an account. On the same date she bought from the appellant a pair of old Sheffield dishes for £16 16s., which were duly debited to her personally as before, and she paid the price on March 16 by a cheque on the same account. On March 6 she also bought a diamond ring for £28 10s., which was again debited to her personally as Mrs. Van der Borgh, and for which she paid by cheque on April 4. In some of these transactions the appellant personally dealt with Esme Ellison.

When she made her visit to the appellant's shop on March 6, she saw the appellant and told him that her husband intended to give her as a birthday present a pearl necklet of the value of £1,000, and she asked the appellant to produce some necklets for her inspection. After he had sent for and got them she saw them at the shop. She told him that a relative, a Mrs. Bosanquet, who she said was staying at Stonelands, wished to give a wedding present to one of her sisters who had become engaged. On March 16, at an interview with the appellant, she looked at two necklets which he showed her, and asked him to permit her to take them to Stonelands in order that her husband, who was temporarily absent, might look at them. This the appellant let her do. He made an entry in his books which is:—"P. F. Van der Borgh, Stonelands, Dawlish. (1) A fine pearl necklet of 121 pearls, £1,100; (2) A fine pearl necklet of 139 pearls, £1,000. On appro." The learned Judge who tried the case and the Court of Appeal agreed in thinking that Esme Ellison was under these circumstances a "customer" within the meaning of the policy. No doubt on the earlier occasions she was so, but that does not conclude the question as to the relationship in the transactions to which I now come.

What was the precise nature of the transaction between the appellant and Esme Ellison in regard to the two pearl necklets? As already stated, it took place on March 16, 1923. The appellant made an entry in his books, not in her favour but in that of P. Van der Borgh, her supposed husband, as the purchaser, on approbation. He let her take both necklets away to show him. On March 21 she paid a further visit to the shop. She bought one of the necklets, saying that her husband was pleased with the other and had selected it, but that Commander Digby, who, she had said, was engaged to her sister, admired the one she brought back, but would not be able to pay the whole price at once. On March 28 she made yet another visit to the shop and stated that Commander Digby continued to admire the necklace she had brought back, and that she wished to take it back to show to him again. On April 4 she called again, and the appellant let her take it away for this purpose. He entered in his books, "Lt.-Commander Digby, Caddistock, Dorset, a fine pearl necklet (139 pearls), £1,000 on appro." There was no such person as Commander Digby, nor had Esme Ellison a sister. Van der Borgh knew nothing of the transactions about the necklets. She herself made away with both of them. She disposed of them, and neither has been recovered.

The learned Judge who tried the case found the facts as I have stated them, and he also found that Esme Ellison's conduct was fraudulent throughout; that the small preliminary purchases in her own name were part of a design to gain the confidence of the appellant; that at the time when she gained possession of each necklet she intended to steal it; that the only purpose for which the appellant gave her possession was that she might hand the one to Van der Borgh for his inspection and the other to the fictitious Commander Digby for a similar purpose; that she received the necklets for limited and specific purposes only; that the appellant intended that his purchaser and debtor should be Van der Borgh in the one case and Digby in the other, and not Esme Ellison. In these findings of fact the Court of Appeal concurred. Both Courts held that as the result she was guilty of larceny by a trick.

My Lords, so far I have no doubt that this was a true conclusion. If that were all, the case would come within the initial and operative words of the policy, which insures against the risk of theft. It would also come within the words which follow descriptive of the property insured; for these expressly mention property for which the insured is responsible if it is in the custody of any person to whom the insured has entrusted it on the condition of sale or return, for valuation or inspection, or for any other purpose whatsoever. But there is in this policy the exception to which I have already referred in quoting the language of policy. It is exception 1, which excepts from the insurance loss by theft or dishonesty committed by, inter alios, "any customer or broker or broker's customer in respect of goods entrusted to them" by the insured, unless the loss arises when the goods are deposited for safe custody.

It is contended for the respondent that what has been established in point of fact amounts to an entrusting, obtained by false pretences, of the property, as distinguished from an obtaining by larceny by a trick or theft. What we have to determine is thus a question on the construction of the exception. Was the case simply one where there was no real consent to any property or such possession being taken over by the woman, and in that sense theft in contemplation of law? Or was it a merely voidable as distinguished from a void transaction, in which a delivery, which was intended to pass the possession and a limited proprietary title in the nature of a bailment, was brought about by a false representation, so that it would stand if the seller did not affirm it? That this question is a difficult one is obvious, for the Judges in the Courts below have been evenly divided about it. We have had it fully argued at the Bar.

My Lords, in the speeches of counsel on the appeal a mass of authorities was cited and relied on. I have thought it my duty to read them through. I cannot say that I have derived much new light from the study. Some of the cases cited lay down principles of law which are general and clear. About these principles there is, however, no real controversy. Others relate to the application of principles to circumstances which are not the same as those in the case before us. They help, in truth, but little. What is important for our purpose is to get before our minds the particular concrete questions before considering the law to be applied.

Now the first of the questions is partly, at least, one of mixed fact and law, the interpretation to be placed on the application of the word "entrusted" in the exceptions. "Entrusted" is not necessarily a term of law. It may have different implications in different contexts. In its most general significance all it imports is a handing over of possession for some purpose which may not imply the conferring of any proprietary right at all. I hand my umbrella to a servant to enable me to be free of it while I am taking off my coat. In a very general sense I entrust him with the umbrella. But there is no easily definable bailment in such an instance. What I have really done is to divest myself of the embarrassing circumstance of holding it. Entrusting may, of course, introduce a bailment, conferring some definite but restricted proprietary right. It is a question, then, of a contract entered into. And whether there is such a contract depends on more than a bare parting with possession. To entrust to a customer or broker or "broker's customer," as specified in the exception, means a definite contract. The reference to "safe custody" as a purpose outside the exception points to this. So does the reference to a broker or a broker's customer. But in the general clause at the beginning of the policy, where the entrusting may be for any purpose whatsoever, the word is surely used in a more general sense to cover all cases in which the article has been deliberately put into the possession of some other person.

Now it may well be that in this more general sense the appellant entrusted Esme Ellison with the possession of the necklets. She may well have been his customer on other occasions. But on this particular occasion it is plain from his evidence and from his books that he did not look on her, but only on Mr. Van der Borgh and the supposed Commander Digby, as the possible purchasing customers.

Esme Ellison was a mere intermediary, little more than a porter, so far as any contract was concerned, a person entrusted with the possession for purposes which seem to fall short of all of those specified in the exception. She certainly got no property. Having regard to the circumstances that in contemplation of law she stole the necklets from the appellant, it is only in a qualified sense that she even got the possession. No doubt she got possession physically, but there was no mutual assent to any contract which would give her even the qualified proprietary right to hold it of a bailee proper. The appellant thought that he was dealing with a different person, the wife of Van der Borgh, and it was on that footing alone that he parted with the goods. He never intended to contract with the woman in question. It was by a deliberate fraud and trick that she got possession. There was not the agreement of her mind with that of the seller that was required in order to establish any contractual right at all. The latter was entirely deceived as to the identity of the person with whom he was transacting. It was only on the footing and in the belief that she was Mrs. Van der Borgh that he was willing to deal with her at all. In circumstances such as these I think that there was no such consensus ad idem as, for example, Lord Cairns, in his judgment in Cundy v. Lindsay (3 App. Cas., 459), declared to be requisite for the constitution of a contract. No doubt physically the woman entered the shop and pretended to bargain in a particular capacity, but only on the footing of being a different person from what she really was. There was never any contract which could afterwards become voidable by reason of a false representation made in obtaining it, because there was no contract at all, nothing excepting the result of a trick practised on the jeweller.

Jurists have laid down, as I think rightly, the test to be applied as to whether there is a mistake as to the party which is fatal to there being any contract at all, or as to whether there is an intention to contract with a de facto physical individual, which constitutes a contract induced by misrepresentation so as to be voidable but not void. It depends on a distinction to be looked for in what has really happened. Pothier ("Traité des Obligations," section 19) lays down the principle thus, in a passage adopted by Mr. Justice Fry in Smith v. Wheatcroft (9 Ch. D., 223): "Does error in regard to the person with whom I contract destroy the consent and annul the agreement? I think that this question ought to be decided by a distinction. Whenever the consideration of the person with whom I am willing to contract enters as an element into the contract which I am willing to make, error with regard to the person destroys my consent, and consequently annuls the contract. . . . On the contrary, when the consideration of the person with whom I thought I was contracting does not enter at all into the contract, and I should have been equally willing to make the contract with any person whatever as with him with whom I thought I was contracting, the contract ought to stand." In the careful judgment delivered in Phillips v. Brooks, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 470 ; [1919] 2 K.B., 243) Mr. Justice Horridge decided that the alternative view secondly stated by Pothier applied to the case with which he was dealing. A fraudulent person had entered a jeweller's shop and looked at and selected certain jewels which the jeweller was prepared to sell to him individually as a casual customer who had entered the shop. All that remained to be subsequently arranged was payment of the price. The unknown customer who drew a cheque pretending to be someone else, and signing it in a well-known name, was allowed in exchange for the cheque to take away one of the jewels, of which he disposed subsequently. Mr. Justice Horridge found as a fact that, though the jeweller believed the person to whom he handed the jewel was the person he pretended to be, yet he intended to sell to the person, whoever he was, who came into the shop and paid the price, and that the misrepresentation was only as to payment. There was therefore consensus with the person identified by sight and hearing, although the title to delivery was voidable as having been induced by misrepresentation. In the other type of case referred to by Pothier, where the belief of the contracting seller depends wholly on identity of character or capacity, there is, as Mr. Justice Wendell Holmes says at the beginning of the ninth lecture in his book on "The Common Law," no contract because there is really only one party.

This being so, I think that on the facts found there ought to be judgment for the appellant. No doubt if there was a bailment such as alleged by the respondent, and if it is merely voidable, as where the handing over merely follows on a further false representation which leaves an initial contract intact, a determinable right of property of some kind may pass sufficient to enable a title to be made by the bailee to someone who takes under proper circumstances without notice. But it is otherwise when the bailment is void ab initio, as in case of mere theft. I am unable to see how the relation of entrusting to a customer within the meaning of the exceptions can arise here. Lords Justices Bankes and Warrington came to the conclusion that there was in this case an entrusting to a customer within the words of the exception. I find myself more nearly in agreement with the other view taken by Lord Justice Atkin and by Mr. Justice McCardie at the trial. I go rather farther than the learned Lords Justices went in their interpretation of the facts. For to me it appears that on the occasion with which we are dealing the jeweller was not dealing with this woman as a customer. We have to remember that what he did was to let her have possession in her alleged capacity of the wife of a husband who was to inspect and possibly approve. Nothing short of a belief in her identity as a wife who was transacting for her husband as the real customer would have induced the appellant to act as he did.

My Lords, I do not rely on any doctrine belonging to criminal as distinguished from civil law. The only relevance of the criminal law is, I think, the analysis of the elements required to establish a consenting mind in a general sense. On the broader ground stated I am of opinion that on the facts before us the judgments of Mr. Justice McCardie and Lord Justice Atkin were right and those of the majority of the Court of Appeal wrong. If so the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and also in the Courts below.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords : The facts which are material here fall under two heads. The first is accurately described by saying that the woman Ellison might have been convicted of larceny by a trick ; the second by saying that no actual contract, either of sale or of agency or otherwise, purported to have been made between her and Messrs. Lake and Co. "Larceny by a trick" is a short way of saying that the actual delivery of the necklace to her by Mr. Lake de manu in manum, though it wore the outward appearance of consent on his part, was in that respect illusory, because, owing to the deception which Ellison practised on him, his mind did not go consensually with his physical action. It might have saved some discussion, if the finding of fact had simply been so described, without resorting to the more formal title of the crime which she committed, but in my opinion the result is the same. Whichever description is preferable, I adopt the conclusion of both Courts below. I should have been slow to differ from the learned Judge, for, in any case, his finding involved consideration of Mr. Lake's state of mind, and he alone heard his evidence. The conclusion that his state of mind was an appearance of consent produced by the trick and not a real consent induced by fraud is a judicial conclusion from the circumstances proved, from the evidence of the victim as to what was said and done, what he believed, and what he would or would not have done in the absence of that belief, and finally, from the Judge's own view of the ability of the witness himself to analyse and explain his own mental processes with tolerable exactness. A conclusion from these materials is greatly assisted by seeing him and judging what manner of man he is. It would therefore be rash to set up any opinion of my own against the trial Judge's conclusion and I am content to accept it, but I wish to add that, on the evidence, it was doubtless right.

As to what purported to be done the case is clear. The necklaces had been placed in Mr. Lake's hands on approbation under such circumstances that, for the purposes of this case, he was in the same position as if he had actually been the owner. Ellison proposed Van der Borgh and the fictitious Digby as purchasers. She never proposed to be the buyer herself. She never acquired nor was meant to acquire any property from Mr. Lake. He let her take the goods in order that these persons might see them on approval. He gave her no authority to negotiate or to conclude a bargain or to pass property from him to them. If the pearls were approved, if they were kept beyond a reasonable time, if the persons who were to have the opportunity of approving or of disapproving the pearls offered to them dealt with them in a manner inconsistent with such offer, a direct sale by Messrs. Lake and Co. to them would result with an immediate passing of the property from the vendors to them.

My Lords, however otiose it may be to do so in your Lordship's House, I would venture further to say something as to the definite consequences of this finding, since any obscurity on this question is certain to raise doubts on a branch of law which is settled beyond dispute and ought not to be unsettled. First, when Ellison took the necklaces from the hand of Mr. Lake, she took them as a thief and with no more consent on his part than if she had picked his pocket. The facts are not that she received them from Mr. Lake honestly and without any trick and afterwards formed a felonious intention to deprive him of them, which intention she proceeded to carry out. If that had been so, her offence would have been that of larceny as a bailee. Such a state of facts would further have been inconsistent with obtaining the pearls by false pretences, for a felonious mind only arising after she received the goods from the jeweller would not constitute criminality at the time of the actual obtaining. The whole argument as to the meaning and effect of the word "entrusted" in the exceptions clause in the policy is at once vitally affected if the expression "larceny by a trick" is used in anything but its strict, that is, its only legal, sense.

Again, if Mr. Lake consented to nothing, analogies from the distinction between void and voidable contracts are beside the mark, and equally so are arguments which turn on consensus ad idem as an ingredient in the conclusion of a contract. A voidable contract imports a consent with a right to avoid it. The jeweller must then make an election in order to free himself from the obligation. As it is, there was no contract and nothing to avoid. Enlightenment as to the facts was what Mr. Lake needed, and, on becoming aware of Ellison's dishonesty, he could forthwith have taken back his pearls, provided that he avoided any trespass or use of unjustifiable force in doing so. Again, we need not ask how far Ellison would have enjoyed rights under an assumed or implied bailment if some stranger had converted the pearls as against her. What is clear is that she herself had no property or title of any kind as against Mr. Lake. A legal expression, not altogether felicitous, attributes to a pawnee what is called a "special property" as against the pawnor's "general property" in a chattel, but as there was no question of pledging these pearls to Ellison or of giving her a lien or security over them, she had no special or any other property in them and the possession was merely that of a thief. We come back again to the larceny by a trick.

Such being the relevancy of this finding, the next step is to consider whether anything can be imputed to Mr. Lake which would be equivalent to his consent, however it may have been obtained.

Your Lordships heard an argument to the effect that Mr. Lake was not deceived as to the identity of Ellison. She was the same person, it is said, whom he had seen before, and, if he continued to deal with her, it must have been because he gave credit to her statements, which in itself made his act an "entrusting." I think this immaterial. Such facts may raise difficulties in deciding whether his frame of mind involved misplaced consent or was consistent with absence of any consent at all, but the conclusion that it was such as would negative the appearance of consent, and so remove the difficulty in the way of proving an asportavit, concludes the whole issue. It matters not whether the trick takes the form of claiming falsely to be a particular person, or of claiming falsely to be another kind of personage than the thief is, or in manipulating the objects which are to be acquired. The trickster is equally a trickster in all. If A B passes himself off as C D it is an instance of the first class. The confidence trick man, posing as a benevolent millionaire from the United States, is of the second. The man who rings the changes and confuses the barmaid, whom he has asked for change, is of the third. The result in all is absence of consent on the part of the person tricked. Of course animus furandi may be a separate matter and it remains to be proved. If the jury were persuaded that the trick was all a joke they would have to acquit, but that would not set up a true consent on the part of the party hoaxed nor would it establish a bailment. The joker's possession would still be bad for want of any consent.

Let us now examine the structure of this accustomed form of policy. Even in reported cases it figures as in use in 1914 (Moore v. Evans, 32 The Times L.R., 224; [1916] 1 K.B., 479), and I have no doubt is much older. I offer no observations on its drafting. If it suits the parties, as it obviously does, there are no doubt sound reasons for the shape in which it comes before us. It begins with (a) a recital that a premium has been paid to insure Messrs. Lake against the risks of loss and/or damage by fire, burglary, robbery, theft, accident, from whatsoever cause or misadventure to/of the property herein specified; this is (b) certain chattels, including pearls, the property of Mr. Lake, in trust or on commission or for which the assured is/are held to be responsible, (c) while in their own custody or in the custody of any person to whom they may have entrusted the same on sale or return for valuation or inspection, or for any other purpose whatsoever. (d) The loss must have occurred from Mr. Lake's premises, 43, High-street, Exeter, or while in transit in the United Kingdom. Then follows (e) the duration of the policy. Having thus recited the name and premises of the assured, the kind of chattels covered and their relation to the assured, and the place in which they are to be when covered and the period of the insurance, the policy declares as follows: "Touching the adventures and perils to the property hereby insured, which we the assurers . . . do take upon us, they are the loss of and/or damage or misfortune to the before-mentioned property or any part thereof, arising from any cause whatsoever, except as hereinafter mentioned," and then follows the material exception clause No. 1.

Leaving out words not material for present purposes, I think that as a matter of construction the exception clause takes out of the stipulated cover against "thefts" generally certain thefts conditioned in accordance with its terms, and these fall into two classes—viz., those committed by employees of the assured under all circumstances, and those committed by customers, brokers, or brokers' customers, when, but only when, the words "in respect of goods entrusted to them by the assured" are satisfied.

Now that must mean the same theft or thefts as in the recitals which define the extent of the insurance, and, though not so peculiarly a term of art as larceny, theft in each case must mean anything that the law would regard and punish as theft in the fullest sense of the word. Next, the part of the clause, under which a quality of the excluded theft is indicated by the words "by any customer . . . in respect of goods entrusted," must cut out something already in the policy and exclude something already included by the general recitals and provisions. When the goods have passed out of the assured's own custody, they are not covered unless they have been "entrusted" to others on sale or return, for valuation or inspection, or for any other like purpose under the ejusdem generis rule of construction. "Entrusted" has therefore the same sense in the exception as in the general words, and the only material "entrusting" is an entrusting (a) by the assured, (b) for one of the specified purposes. I think it follows that "entrusting" in the exception cannot mean a bare handing over or physical delivery. It does not extend beyond such a delivery as satisfies the two qualifications stated. The goods must have been handed over in a way that can be described as "entrusting" and for one of the named purposes, which in this case can be no other than "on the conditions of sale or return." Here it is quite plain that the pearls were never entrusted to Ellison on conditions of sale or return. She was not the person who was to approve or to buy or return them—that was Mr. Van der Borgh or Commander Digby. If there was entrusting, it was to one of them. One of these persons was imaginary. The other was not a customer and he was not, in fact, aware of what was being done or concerned in it in any way. In fact, nobody was entrusted.

In the next place, Mr. Lake, who trusted Ellison in the sense of believing what she said, who entrusted the pearls to her, if at all, only that she might take them to Van der Borgh or Digby for purchase or return by them, and who did what was done under a complete delusion, can only be said to have "entrusted" the pearls to her if he consented to her having them. If there was a trick which prevented any true consent arising, there could be no entrusting. The terms are mutually exclusive. In my opinion, the natural meaning of "entrusted" involves that the assured should by some real and conscious volition have imposed on the person to whom he delivers the goods some species of fiduciary duty. There is no room here for any colloquial sense. A large and important part is played in a jeweller's business by the various kinds of genuine "entrusting" which the earlier part of the policy describes. The exclusion from the risk covered of any delivery of possession, however devoid of mental assent on the part of the person who gives it, would be quite arbitrary and hard to reconcile with the general insuring words. The language is the insurers' own, and in an exception it must be read contra proferentes. If they intended no more than "handed over," they should have said so, and the more plainly the better.

Against this conclusion reliance has been placed, both before your Lordships and below, on three lines of argument, of which the last two have particularly found favour with Lords Justices Bankes and Warrington. The first is that in the exception clause "entrusted" should be read as referring simply to a physical act and means "handed over"; or alternatively that, though Ellison's mind was felonious, Mr. Lake's was, in his ignorance of that fact, an entrusting mind at the moment, and it is to his mind in connexion with his act that the exception must be deemed to refer. With this I have already dealt. A second is that in a commercial document no legal technicality of the criminal law should be taken into account. A third is that the element of consent should be taken in the sense in which, in the Factors Act, 1889, section 2, the Court of Appeal was disposed to read it in Folkes v. King (39 The Times L.R., 77; [1923] 1 K.B., 282).

Every one must agree that commercial contracts are to be interpreted with regard to the circumstances of commerce with which they deal, the language used by those who are parties to them, and the objects which they are intended to secure. This, however, is not a case in which the appellant proposes to read the policy as if he was arguing an old-fashioned indictment, nor do I think it fair to discuss his contention as if it involved "technicalities of the criminal law." Even if it be the case that the occasion on which the doctrine of larceny by a trick at common law was first developed was one in which a thief would otherwise have escaped conviction, where he had called in fraud to the assistance of his nimble fingers, the doctrine is now statutory under the Larceny Act, but I do not think the doctrine was ever one which could be described as being an artificial view of the facts as opposed to the actual facts of the case. It was not merely "invented by Judges" to prevent a thief from taking advantage of his own wrong and relying upon a possession which he obtained unlawfully. Before this "invention" an accused person who contended that there was no sufficient evidence of a taking was not relying on a possession unlawfully obtained; he was relying on the law and was taking proper advantage—if that is the right word—of being in the right as to the law of evidence. I dissent from the view that criminal law should be treated as irrelevant merely because a document is commercial. After all, criminal law is still law, and so are its definitions and rules. The distinction between a real consent, obtained by deceit, and an unreal consent, extracted by a trick, is equally applicable to civil disputes. As Mr. Justice Story says (Equity Jurisprudence, s. 222): "consent is an act of reason accompanied with deliberation . . . Grotius has added that what is not done with a deliberate mind does not come under the class of perfect obligation. And hence it is that if consent is obtained by meditated imposition, circumvention, surprise, or undue influence, it is to be treated as a delusion and not as a deliberate and free act of the mind."

On the bearing which apparent consent, obtained by a trick, may have on the "consent" which is mentioned in section 2 of the Factors Act, 1889, there has been so signal and so indecisive a conflict of authoritative opinion that I should be loth to offer any conclusion of my own, unless it was quite clear that the point was necessary to the decision of this case. I think it is not. The fact that it is the word "entrusted" that is before us and not the word "consent" is a minor matter, but the nature of the document under construction is crucial. By the present policy the underwriters stand behind Mr. Lake and hold him harmless if certain events happen to their detriment, specifying these events in their own words first by a general inclusive statement and then by a particular exclusion thereout. All theft is covered except such theft (so far as this case is concerned) as is committed by an "entrusted" customer. The question of larceny by a trick and the question of false pretences do not arise under the words "theft or dishonesty." The relevance of larceny by a trick is to test whether a customer whose dishonest act is in issue is a customer "entrusted." The word clearly connotes a definite state of mind. Whose mind? Only that of the assured. It is he who entrusts, if entrusting there be; no third party other than the thief enters into the case, and it is the jeweller's state of mind that matters on the issue "consent or no consent," while the thief's state of mind, and not the jeweller's, is relevant to loss by theft or dishonesty. Further, this contract is made for the protection of the assured and nobody else. The Factors Act, on the other hand, was framed for the benefit and protection of third persons into whose hands commercial documents of title have passed for value and in good faith on their part. The action which prejudices them is action which only becomes possible because an unauthorized person has got the documents in circumstances that lead others to act in the belief that the true owner has given his consent. An argument may well arise in such circumstances that, as against the third party who has changed his position, the original owner cannot deny a consent which is not only apparent but is invested with this appearance by what he has done. What they have to be protected against is not confined to the results of his intelligent and consensual action, but against the results of any action on his part at all. Be this as it may, it seems to me not to be decisive in the present case and I say no more upon it.

I agree that Ellison was not a customer for the purpose of the exceptions clause. There is no point in introducing a person, who is by trade a broker and still less his customers too, who may be unknown to the assured, unless that capacity is directly connected with the goods with which the exception deals. Accordingly, my Lords, I think that the appeal succeeds.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : The argument in this case has ranged over a very wide field. My noble friends who have preceded me have dealt with the various points which have been argued by counsel on both sides. I do not propose to deal with these points again. I think the appeal succeeds. I think Miss Esme Ellison obtained the possession of the jewelry handed to her by the appellant by an operation which is appropriately described as larceny by a trick. That when she got possession of it she feloniously appropriated it is not disputed. But the operation of entrusting the possession of the jewelry, though not the property in it, to her, which prima facie would mean handing it over to her to be devoted by her to some legitimate purpose, was treated rather as if it were something separable from and unconnected with the theft committed. It really was nothing of the kind. The theft was a composite thing. It consisted first of the false representation which the woman made to the appellant, and which he apparently believed ; secondly, the action which he took, acting on that belief ; and thirdly, the felonious appropriation of the goods, when obtained, to her own use. The so-called entrusting of the jewels to her furnished to her—as she intended it should—the opportunity for and means of committing the theft.

It does not appear to me to be possible to separate the handing over of the possession of the jewels from the falsehood which preceded it and the felonious action which followed it. The entrusting of goods to a customer mentioned in the exception cannot mean the delivery in all good faith by a dealer of goods to a customer which that customer has planned to steal, and by that very delivery enabling the customer to effect her felonious purpose. The true character of the operation was larceny of the appellant's goods by means of a trick—the trick being the false and fraudulent representation which this woman made to the appellant, by which the delivery to her of the possession of the jewels was obtained.

The appellant had no suspicion, apparently, that he was about to be robbed through the medium of this trick. He acted perfectly honestly in giving over the possession of the jewelry. So does every one, presumably, who suffers from larceny by a trick. It is the honest belief of the person robbed in the false statements made which enables the intending thief to defraud him. That, however, does not alter the real character of the entire transaction.

Again, the inclination of my opinion is that Miss Esme Ellison was not a customer of the appellant quoad the goods, the possession of which was handed over to her, within the meaning of the exception, though she may have stood to the appellant in the relation of customer in other transactions. No doubt the appellant regarded the handing over of the jewels to her as ancillary to a possible sale of them to her pretended husband, but the idea of having any dealing of that kind with the appellant in reference to this jewelry never entered her head. From the first she apparently designed and intended a theft. That was the nature of the only dealing that she had in mind. As I have said, I think the appeal succeeds.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords : I think also that this appeal succeeds, and, while I entirely agree with the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Sumner, which I have had the advantage of reading, I propose specifically to base my judgment on the simple ground that Ellison was not in either transaction a customer of the appellant within the meaning of the exception clause of the policy.

I do not doubt that by the month of March, 1923, she had resorted to the appellant's shop for the purpose of purchasing goods from him with sufficient frequency to justify her inclusion in the class of persons aptly enough described as the customers of the appellant in connexion with his business of a jeweller. I am free also to agree that, if the only customers or persons referred to in the exception clause had been customers of the assured, it might on construction have been difficult to avoid the conclusion that nothing more was required to bring Ellison in this respect within the exception. With reference to a clause so framed it could with force have been urged that his customers were so excepted because the assured had no need to be protected against the unlikely dishonesty of people whom he knew and trusted in business.

But, my Lords, the exception is not confined to customers of the assured. It extends to a "broker or broker's customer" as well, and, as will be seen in a moment, no corresponding explanation of their appearance in the exception can be put forward.

If the whole expression is to be construed in absolute or detached terms, as I have so far construed the word "customer," who, it may be asked, is a "broker" ? May he be any kind of broker ? What is the qualification for his inclusion if he may not ? What possible connexion, still construing the word at large, is there between the assured and the "customer" of such a broker ? Who is such a "customer" ? Who is not ? How would that position, one way or the other, be known to the assured ? It is, my Lords, I think, quite impossible to say. In my judgment, therefore, it is necessary to reconsider the effect of the whole phrase "customer, broker or broker's customer in respect of goods entrusted to them," from this standpoint and with a view of seeing whether there is any relation in which they all stand to the assured which makes it possible at once to fix their identity and to justify the exception in regard to each of them indifferently, and that relation, in my judgment, is that the customer of the assured, the broker or the broker's customer, are, each and all of them, such with reference to the particular goods so entrusted to them. And Ellison was not, and never pretended to be and was not treated by the appellant as being, a customer in that sense in relation to either of the necklaces now in question.

My Lords, I am in entire agreement with Mr. Justice McCardie on this point. I cannot think that it would have been dealt with in the Court of Appeal so lightly as it was if the Lords Justices had noticed that reasons which are apt enough to justify the inclusion of customers of the assured as such in the exception, have no application either to brokers or their customers and that in construing the clause no wider meaning can properly be attached to the word "customer" in the one case than in the other.

BLATCHFORD v. STADDON AND FOUNDS.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Industrial disease—Painter—Lead poisoning—Liability of last employer—"Employment to the nature of which the disease was due"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), s. 8 and Schedule III., as extended by Order of February 26, 1918 [S.R. and O., 1918, No. 287].

The appellant, a painter, claimed compensation from the respondents, a firm of builders and house decorators, in respect of disablement caused by lead poisoning. The appellant served in the Navy as a painter until 1918, and during that service contracted the disease of lead poisoning. His last employment was with the respondents from October to December, 1924, when he left owing to illness. In July, 1925, the certifying surgeon certified that he was then suffering from lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning his full wages at the work at which he had been employed. The certificate gave no date for the commencement of the disablement, and, accordingly, by virtue of s. 8, subs. 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, it was deemed to have commenced at the date of the certificate. The arbitrator was not satisfied that there was anything in the nature of the appellant's employment with the respondents that would tend to aggravate or accelerate the process of the disease so as to warrant a finding that his disablement was due to that employment and made an award in favour of the respondents.

Held, that the appellant was entitled to compensation under s. 8 (1) from the respondents as being the last employers who had employed him within the twelve months immediately preceding his disablement in the employment to the nature of which the disease was due, i.e., in work of the same character as that to which his disease was due, namely, lead painting, notwithstanding that he failed to prove that his disablement was due to his employment by the respondents.

Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 283; [1914] 2 K.B., 213) overruled.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (135 L.T., 219) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (135 L.T., 219) affirming an award made by the County Court Judge of Devon under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906 to 1923, in favour of the respondents.

The appellant, a painter, claimed compensation from the respondents, a firm of builders and decorators, in respect of disablement caused by lead poisoning. The appellant, who served in the Navy until 1918 as a painter, contracted lead poisoning during that period. Subsequently he worked from time to time as a painter for various employers until July, 1924. He was then out of work for a period. From mid-September to mid-October he worked for Messrs. Woolacot and Son. From October 23 to December 12, 1924, he worked for the respondents. He then fell ill and left the employment. He was, in fact, then suffering from lead poisoning, though this was not discovered till June, 1925, and he had not since been at work. On July 13, 1925, the certifying surgeon certified that he was then suffering from lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed, and an appeal by the respondents to the medical referee against this certificate was dismissed. The certificate gave no date for the commencement of the disease, and accordingly by virtue of section 8 (4) of the Act of 1906 it was taken to have commenced at the date of the certificate.

The appellant claimed that he was entitled to compensation under section 8 (1) from the respondents as being the last employers who had employed him within twelve months previous to the date of disablement in the employment to the nature of which the disease was due.

The respondents resisted the claim on the ground that the disease was not contracted while the appellant was in their employment, nor was it aggravated or accelerated during that employment. They also claimed to be entitled to contribution under section 8 (1) (c) (iii.) from Messrs. Woolacot and Son, who were added as third parties for that purpose.

The County Court Judge said that the evidence failed to satisfy him that there was anything in the nature of the appellant's employment by the respondents that would of itself tend to aggravate or accelerate the process of the disease, from which he had probably been suffering for a considerable time, and he could not find that the appellant's disablement was due to such employment. Accordingly, on the authority of Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 283; [1914] 2 K.B., 213) he made an award in favour of the respondents. The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Sargant) affirmed this award.

Mr. Edgar T. Dale and Mr. Montague Berryman appeared for the appellant; and Mr. W. Shakespeare and Mr. J. L. Pratt for the respondents.

VISCOUNT SUMNER.—My Lords: The appellant is a painter by trade, and the respondents are a firm of builders and decorators. On December 12, 1924, the appellant, who was then and had been for seven weeks in the respondents' employment as a painter, left them owing to illness. Though his panel doctor did not for a long time detect it, he was then suffering from lead poisoning, a disease from which he had suffered six years before. The learned arbitrator, in summing up evidence which was sufficient to warrant his finding, said that it showed that "there was nothing exceptional in the nature of the work that the applicant was called upon to perform whilst in the respondents' employment. It has failed to satisfy me that there was anything in the nature of his employment by the respondents that would of itself tend to aggravate or accelerate the process of disease, from which the applicant had probably been suffering for a considerable number of years, so that I can find that it was due to such employment that the lead poisoning became so acute as to render the applicant disabled." It has, however, turned out that the disablement is permanent. The applicant has not worked since he left the respondents' employment. Lead poisoning was eventually diagnosed in June, 1925, and a certificate was obtained from the certifying surgeon that he was suffering from effects of lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he had been employed, a conclusion subsequently affirmed by the medical referee on appeal. The certifying surgeon, not being able to certify a date on which the disablement commenced, duly deleted the words in the form of certificate, which fix the date of commencement, and under the Act the commencement is deemed to have been the date of the certificate, viz., July 13, 1925. The applicant's last employment was not at or immediately before this date, and accordingly he did not enjoy at the hearing the benefit of the presumption which arises under section 8 (2) of the Act of 1906. The issue then may be briefly stated as follows :—Has the applicant, in the state of facts found by the learned arbitrator, proved enough to establish a right to receive compensation from the respondents ? He says in this appeal that he has, for he has proved that within the period limited by section 8 he suffered from one of the scheduled diseases, due to the nature of his employment, as a workman who handles lead paint in connexion with his work as a painter. The respondents say that he has not, for he has not proved that his suffering arose out of his employment by the respondents, and that nothing in the Act, either clearly or at all, makes them liable for a misfortune, which did not arise out of or in the course of some employment by them, nor, without the clearest words, can persons be called on to pay compensation to a workman when their employment has not in any way affected a disabling disease contracted elsewhere. The arbitrator's award in the respondents' favour was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, bound as they were by the decision in Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 283 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 213). In effect it is that case which is now under appeal, but the question really depends not on authority but on the construction of the Act of 1906, section 8 (1).

When the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897 was re-enacted as amended in 1906, the Legislature decided to introduce into it a provision dealing with diseases, which affect those who use certain processes in their trades, commonly called "industrial diseases." A schedule to the Act specifies some of these diseases, and section 8 of the Act is the code which regulates them. Under the Act of 1897 and the earlier sections of the Act of 1906, the subject of compensation is injury or death due to "an accident arising out of and in the course of" the workman's employment, and an "accident" (a word which is not defined by the statute) is spoken of in its ordinary sense. As a mere matter of drafting it would have been easy to enact in 1906 that disablement or death, caused by any of the scheduled diseases, should be deemed to be an "accident" within the Act of 1897 and the corresponding sections of the Act of 1906 and should be compensated accordingly. This, however, would only have been the beginning of trouble.

An accident may result in an attack of some disease and so become disabling, though not otherwise of any moment. In such a case the supervention of disease is a matter of chance and not of certainty, and to that extent is an accidental or fortuitous consequence, but no one in ordinary language would say that the illness was itself an accident. Hence, diseases, which, when they attack a workman, do so because of his trade and incidentally to it and to the processes which he uses in it, would not be within the words above quoted from the Act of 1897 without further legislation and could not be brought within its fundamental principle merely by calling them "accidents." Their peculiar character made much more extensive provision necessary. They come on gradually ; their first steps may not be perceptible for some time ; their rate of progress may vary widely ; they have their ups and downs. The patient sometimes makes a complete recovery and sometimes only an apparent one, and the periods during which they may be quiescent and latent may vary greatly. In the case of such diseases an applicant who had not been long in the employment of the respondent would naturally be met with the suggestion that his disease had been previously contracted and therefore did not arise out of it, and in meeting this defence by proof that it actually arose during and out of his employment by the respondent he might well find the difficulty insuperable. It appears to be common ground, and rightly so as far as I know, that this fatal disadvantage may often occur and that the Legislature must have been aware of it. If there was to be an effective remedy, much more had to be done than simply to declare the disease to be an accident. Means had to be found for enabling the workman to recover compensation from an employer even though he could not prove the precise time when the disease was contracted.

I will therefore examine section 8 (1) itself. The scheme, as applicable to the present case, is this. A workman, disabled from work through suffering from a scheduled industrial disease, of which it can be predicated that it is due to the nature of his employment within twelve months before his disablement, is to be entitled to compensation under the Act of 1906. How and on what conditions ? The manner of his compensation is to be as if the disease were a personal injury arising out of and in the course of the trade in which he was employed within the twelve months previous to the date of the disablement and to the nature of which the disease was due, the disablement being treated as being the accident. The conditions are these. The person from whom the compensation is to be recoverable shall be the employer who last employed the workman during the said twelve months, its measure is to be the workman's earnings under that employer, and it is to that employer that notice of the disablement is to be given. It will thus be seen that the modifications, subject to which compensation is to be recovered as if in the case of an accident under the Act of 1897, are considerable. They are intended to obviate the disadvantage, which would handicap the workman if he had to prove disablement by disease as if for an accident, under the Act of 1897 and its equivalent sections of the Act of 1906, and they provide a means, perhaps rough and ready, of enabling a suffering workman to get compensation from someone certain in respect of a disease contracted at a wholly uncertain time.

Provisos are finally added to mitigate the hardship of exacting compensation from an employer whose employment may not be shown to have had and may not actually have had anything to do with the onset or the progress of the disease or with the ultimate disablement of the workman. He is to have the opportunity of recovering over part or even the whole of the compensation from others, whose employment of the workman during the twelve months in question in processes, from the nature of which such a disease arises, may have been its source in fact. To enable this employer to bring such other employers into the proceedings and to have his own claim over disposed of at the same time as the workman's, the latter is to give him information as to the names and addresses of such other employers, failing which, or if, though given, his information is insufficient to enable the proceedings mentioned to be taken against them, the employer sued is to be allowed to negative any liability to pay compensation by proving that the disease was not contracted while the workman was in his employment.

My Lords, I think that a scheme is thus disclosed for bringing industrial diseases into the Act of 1906, which substantially meets their peculiar features mentioned above. The way in which this is done sufficiently meets the objection that, unless shown in the clearest words, an intention cannot be imputed to the Legislature to make one employer pay for what was entirely due to the service of others. This objection was pointedly phrased by saying that "the last employer" named in the section must mean "the last relevant employer," the last employer in point of time, out of and in the course of whose employment the disease had wholly or partly arisen. I think that the scheme of the section is on its face such that the last employer cannot be thus limited. The ground for making him the person from whom compensation is to be recoverable is that he is a person certain and designated, upon whom the workman may claim without being sent from pillar to post. It is contemplated that contribution may be recovered over to a substantial extent, and for the rest the employer must protect himself by insurance, the cost of which will form part of his trade outgoings. The paternal benevolence of the Legislature towards workmen is well known, and if the price of that benevolence is paid by the last employer, who thus has to bear others' burdens, there is nothing new in that in this kind of legislation, nor is it done to an extent that need surprise anyone who has fully digested the position in which the Act of 1897 had already placed employers.

Turning now to particular expressions in the section, I would observe :—

(a) In construing the Act effect must be given to the words "to the nature of." Their meaning cannot be the same as if the section had simply said "is due to" any employment. I think they are inserted because this part of the section is not concerned directly with something arising out of the particular service of the particular employer sued, but with results, which are incidental to the class of employment, in which the workman has served several employers. If the disease is incidental to that class of employment, so that it can be attributed to service therein, then he is to be compensated, as if something could be proved, which ex hypothesi may not be proved, namely, as if an accident had arisen out of and in the course of that employment under a particular employer and at a particular time and had been proved to have so arisen. The difficulty of proving the date when the disease was contracted is met by treating the date of the disablement as the date of the happening of the accident. This is in favour of the workman. The employer, per contra, gets the provision that the proof of the disease is to be given by the certificate of the certifying surgeon, and if the surgeon cannot determine when the disease was contracted, the date of his certificate is to be taken as arbitrarily fixing the time of that event. If the suggested limitation on the relevancy of the last employer were adopted, the anomalous result would be that the date of the accident would be fixed, but its connexion with the employment, then or last previously subsisting, would be at large, and the workman's difficulties, arising in any case from the gradual appearance of the symptoms of his disease, would be aggravated by his being tied to a date for the accident, which might be long after the time when the disease was really contracted.

(b) The workman's proceedings are imperatively fixed by the words "compensation shall be recoverable." No power to implead other employers for his compensation is given to him, but, on the contrary, express power to bring in other employers and prove them liable is given to the last employer, and to him alone. The section treats the statutory compensation as one compensation, recoverable by the workman from the last employer, unless, by the action of that last employer in joining a prior employer and in proving his allegation in the terms of proviso (ii), such compensation becomes recoverable in the proceedings already begun by the workman from that prior employer, who has thus become the employer from whom the compensation is to be recoverable.

(c) The words in section 8 (1) (b) and those at the end of proviso (i) specify expressly the only events in which the compensation shall not be recoverable from the last employer, and thereby exclude any implication that it may also not be recoverable, if the workman fails to show that his disablement by disease arose out of that last employer's service. Except in so far as proviso (ii) applies, where one set of proceedings originally begun by the workman against the last employer is clearly contemplated, the only cases in which compensation is not to be payable by the last employer are where the workman has given insufficient or no information and the employer has then proved that his employment of the workman had nothing to do with the disease and the case of the wilfully false representation made by the workman to which section 8 (1) (b) refers.

For these reasons I think, on the construction of the Act itself, that the appeal succeeds, and it follows that the contrary view expressed in Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (supra), is one that, with all respect to the Court of Appeal, I cannot accept. It has already been criticized (McTaggart v. Barr [1915] S.C., at p. 231), and departed from (Docherty v. Archibald Russell, Limited [1918] S.C., 115) in the Court of Session. I think that the crucial error in the judgments in Dean's case (supra) may be found in the view that the nature of the employment mentioned in subsection 2 means the nature of the particular employment with the respondents (p. 220), and that proof, that the disease was not in any degree due to the nature of the employment under the respondent, means not caused or produced in his employment (pp. 223 and 225). I think that the appeal should be allowed, that the award made by the arbitrator should be set aside, and that the case should be remitted to him to find the amount of compensation due to the applicant and, if necessary, to deal with any claims over against any other employer which may be substantiated by the respondents. I would gratefully add that I have felt myself much indebted to the very clear arguments of the learned and experienced counsel who addressed us on behalf of the respective parties. I move your Lordships accordingly.

I am desired to say that my noble and learned friend Lord Carson concurs in this opinion and motion.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : This is an appeal from an order of his Majesty's Court of Appeal in England, dated the 9th day of February, 1926, dismissing an appeal by the present appellant from an award made by His Honour Judge Higgins at the County Court of Newton Abbot, Devon, in favour of the present respondents in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906 to 1923, dated the 18th day of December, 1925, whereby the said Judge awarded that the present appellant was not entitled to receive compensation from the present respondents in respect of incapacity from lead poisoning, and further ordered the present appellant to pay to the present respondents the costs of the arbitration.

An application for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906 to 1923, dated August 24, 1925, was filed in Newton Abbot County Court of Devon by Alfred James Blatchford, the present appellant, against Staddon and Founds, the present respondents.

The relevant facts in the case to which it is most important to have close attention are clearly set forth in the judgment of the County Court Judge, and are repeated with accuracy and all necessary fullness in the judgment which the Master of the Rolls delivered in the Court of Appeal. He set them out as follows :—

The applicant, who is a painter, claims compensation from the respondents, who are builders and decorators, in respect of disablement caused by lead poisoning. The applicant is 53 years old, and was in the Navy until 1918 as a painter. During his service there he contracted lead poisoning, a definite symptom whereof, namely, drop wrist, showed itself during that period. Since his discharge from the Navy the applicant worked as a painter during 1920. From the beginning of 1923 until July, 1924, he was in the employment of Mr. Battershill. From July to mid-September, 1924, he was out of work, and from mid-September to mid-October, 1924, he was employed by Messrs. Woolacot and Son. After ten days' unemployment the applicant entered the respondents' employment on October 23, 1924, and remained therein until December 12, 1924, when he left owing to illness. He then saw his panel doctor, who diagnosed his condition as being due to cardiac weakness ; and the learned Judge held, upon evidence which was ample to enable him to do so, that the applicant was suffering, and had been suffering ever since his employment in the Navy, which ceased in 1918, from lead poisoning. On July 13, 1925, Dr. King, certifying surgeon, gave his certificate to the effect that the applicant was then suffering from the effects of lead poisoning. That means that after being absent from painting work, and absent from the employ of the respondents for seven months, he then got a certificate that he was suffering from the effects of lead poisoning.

Difficulties have arisen when dealing with cases similar in character to the present in construing a number of enactments aimed at engrafting on legislation designed to secure to workmen compensation for injuries by accident arising out of and in the course of their employment (accidents which necessarily happened at a particular point of time) incapacity for work caused to a workman by certain industrial diseases, which, in most instances, develop slowly, abate often in virulence, and frequently recur with disabling effects. There is nothing similar in the events which bring these two species of disablement or injury into effect. To repeat : In 1920 the appellant worked as a painter for a Mr. Williams. From early in 1923 to July, 1924, he worked as a painter for a Mr. Battershill. From that date in July, 1924, till September in that year he was out of employment. From September 15, 1924, till October 13 he worked as a painter for Messrs. Woolacot and Son, during which time he stated he was in normal health. On October 23, 1924, he started to work as a painter with the respondents. In close on two months afterwards, namely, on December 12, 1924, when he was afflicted with "general debility," which affected his hearing, he left that employment, but he only obtained a certificate from a certifying surgeon on July 13, 1925, that is, seven months after he had ceased to work for the respondents. He obtained a certificate from the certifying surgeon, Dr. Colin King, certifying that he was suffering from the effects of lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he had been employed—no date is mentioned in the certificate as to when this disablement commenced. The commencement of the appellant's disablement must, therefore, under section 8, subsection 4, be taken to be July 13, 1925.

The respondents appealed against this certificate to the medical referee, Dr. J. Ragan Thomas, who, on August 21, 1925, dismissed the appeal and certified that Blatchford was then suffering from lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed. Section 8, subsection 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, evidently does not apply to this case, as the workman was "not at or immediately before the date" of this certificate, July 13, 1925, employed with the respondents. That event took place seven months before the date of disablement, and therefore cannot be said to have taken place immediately before that date. The onus of proof mentioned in that subsection did not exist (Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 283 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 213).

The County Court Judge, the proper judge of fact, found that on December 12, 1924, the day on which the appellant left the respondents' employment and also the day upon which the panel doctor found he was suffering from general debility affecting his heart, the evidence satisfied him that there was nothing exceptional in the nature of the work that the appellant was called upon to perform while in the respondents' service. The evidence, he says, failed to satisfy him that there was anything in the nature of his employment to aggravate or accelerate the process of the disease from which the appellant had probably been suffering for a considerable number of years, so that he could not find that it was due to such employment that the lead poisoning became so acute as to cause the applicant to be disabled.

It is clear that the employer can, under section 8, subsection 1, protect himself from liability (despite the conditions mentioned) by proving that the workman's disease was not due to his employment under the defendant. But it is contended that the employer never can free himself from liability under section 8, subsection 1 (c), by proving, no matter how conclusively, the fact that the workman's disease was not contracted while he was in the employer's employment, but proving nothing more.

That result, which at first sight looks strange and rather unjust, is necessitated by the provision in section 8 (1) (c) to the effect that compensation shall be recoverable from the employer who last employed the workman during the 12 months antecedent to the latter's disablement. If he, the employer, were permitted to protect himself by proving simply the fact that the workman's disease was not contracted while he was in his employment, the workman would be placed in this difficulty, that he could not sue any of the other employers he might have worked under during the 12 months preceding his disablement, inasmuch as section 8 (1) (c) provides that compensation shall be recoverable from the employer who last employed the workman during the aforesaid 12 months. This provision necessitates that this last employer shall be kept before the Court as respondent until he is released from liability under the contribution scheme in section 8 (1) (c) (iii). If the employer succeeds in proving, in addition to this fact, that the disease was contracted while the workman was in the employment of some employer other than himself, he may join that other employer as a party, who shall thenceforth be treated as the employer by whom compensation is to be paid, but it seems to be clear that except through the operation of the compensation provisions and independently of section 8 (1) (c) (ii), which does not touch this case, the mere proof by an employer that the disease from which his workman suffers was not contracted while he was in the former's employment will not apparently per se relieve him from liability. If the last employer proceeds to avail himself of the contribution provisions, he may obtain considerable relief in many cases. And it may well be that, taking the general body of employers, this relief is not inadequate, and operates on the whole in their true interest.

The workman, therefore, is only bound under section 8 (1) (c) to prove that he was last employed by this employer during the 12 months immediately preceding his disablement in employment of the nature to which the disease was due; that was, in this case, lead painting.

The County Court Judge held that the onus of proof lay upon Blatchford to show that the lead poisoning from which he was suffering was, so to speak, brought to a head owing to the nature of his employment, and that he had failed to discharge this onus.

The learned Lords Justices took apparently, to some extent, if not altogether, the same view. With all respect I do not think that it was necessary for the workman to prove that it was the employment with the last employer which, in fact, caused his disablement or suspension. It will, I think, be sufficient for him to prove that his work with his last employer during the 12 months immediately preceding his disablement was of the same nature and character as the work to which his disease is due. I think, therefore, that the appeal succeeds, and that the decision appealed from should be reversed and the decision of the County Court Judge set aside and this appeal allowed.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords: I have found the construction of section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, so difficult that after perusing it again and again I am not sure that even now I can accurately state its effect. The difficulty arises, I think, from the fact that, as it appears to me, the draftsman, when he sat down to draw the section, cannot have had present to his mind any clear idea as to the test which he was going to impose to determine whether any particular employer was to be liable or not. Was the test to be that the workman was in the employer's service during the contraction of the disease so that the employer could be regarded as having contributed to its development, or was the test to be that the workman has been in the employer's service within some period of 12 months from a definite date fixed by a definite event such as suspension? Was it to be a defence that it was found as a fact that the workman suffered from the disease when he entered the particular employer's service and did not contract it in that service? The section oscillates among all of these. I have to find the test which I am to apply and have to reconcile as best I can the conflicting provisions which the section contains.

The Act of 1897 and the first section of the Act of 1906 had to do with the case of an accident properly so called. An accident, in most cases at any rate, happens at a point of time easily identified, and there is no difficulty in stating who is at that point of time the employer. In that class of case the statutory liability is quite plainly imposed upon the employer in whose employment the accident was suffered. The word used is "compensation." That word in general conveys that if one has injured another he is to compensate him for the injury. In the case in question the employer, it is true, has not injured the workman, but the injury has been suffered in the employment of the employer and has, so to speak, been suffered for his benefit. It was an essential factor for allocating liability that the accident was suffered in the employment of the employer.

In drawing section 8 the draftsman was going to provide, not for an accident properly so called, but for an industrial disease as if it were an accident. The contraction of the disease was presumably to be attributed not to any one point of time, but to a gradual development over a long period of time—during which there might be many employers. Under these circumstances section 8 does not provide new machinery, but creates the new liability referentially by the words "as if the disease or such suspension as aforesaid were a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of that employment" being an employment during a statutory period of 12 months provided for by the statute. [I may here interpolate that although there are three things which might be relevant in this context, viz. (1) "the disease," whatever that means, (2) suspension within section 8 (1) (ii), and (3) a certificate of disablement within section 8 (1) (i), two only of these are here mentioned.] The referential words above mentioned carry me back to section 1, which requires that the accident be in the employment, and if the matter stopped there I should be able to say "Ascertain the 12 months—the accident must be taken as happening every day during that time and every employer in the dangerous trade during that time is liable." But this is not what the Act says. It says that the disease or suspension is to be considered as the personal injury by accident. Does this mean that the contraction of the disease is the accident, or does it mean that the ascertainment in a defined way of the fact of the disease having been contracted is the accident? On the whole from that which I have to say further, I think it must mean the latter. For section 8 (1) (iii) (a) provides in express terms that the disablement or suspension shall be treated as the happening of the accident. Perhaps here "disablement" means certificate of disablement. Whether it means disablement in fact or certificate of disablement this is not a period of time over which the disease may have been contracted, but some particular point of time. So here I get back to a case similar to that of the accident properly so called, and the liability created by section 1 attaches (if the referential words are to have effect) only to the employer who was employer at that moment. But obviously that will not do; the liability attaches at any time within the statutory 12 months, that is to say, attaches to any person who was employer during that time, although he was not employer at the date of the accident.

But when I look further, I find that it is not enough to say that the employer was employer during the 12 months. He may escape under section 8 (1) (c) (ii) if he can find another employer within the 12 months and can prove that the disease was contracted whilst the workman was in the employment of that other employer and not whilst in his employment, in which case that other employer is to be the employer from whom the compensation is to be recoverable. Must this other employer have been an employer during the statutory 12 months? It seems to me that he must, for otherwise no liability has by anything which precedes been created in him. If this is so, this extraordinary result ensues. Suppose A has employed the man for 10 months and B had employed him for the preceding two months, A may by proper evidence escape and may pass on the liability to B. But if A has employed the man for 13 months he cannot do so, for B is not liable in any case, and, however exhaustively A may prove that the disease was contracted in B's employment and not in A's employment, A is liable.

The considerations upon which I have last dwelt show that contraction of the disease in the employment is in some cases at any rate relevant to the question of liability. If the principle of section 1 (viz., accident in the employment) is to have effect, it plainly ought to be relevant in all cases. But I cannot find that the Act says so.

In this particular case it is found as a fact that the disease was contracted in 1918, that the man then suffered from drop wrist, a definite symptom of lead poisoning, that there is no doubt that when he entered the respondents' service he was suffering from lead poisoning, and that there was nothing in the nature of his employment by the respondents to aggravate or accelerate the disease. In other words the respondents were no parties to the contraction of the disease. But on July 13, 1925, the workman was certified to be suffering from the disease and to be disabled, and by virtue of section 8 (4) this is to be taken to be the date of disablement, and by virtue of section 8 (1) (iii) (a) the disablement is to be treated as the happening of the accident, and the employment by the respondents was within the statutory 12 months, so that I am driven to say contrary to the real facts as found that the statute has rendered liable an employer whose service had nothing to do with the workman's unfortunate state of health.

I therefore find myself compelled to assent to the motion proposed.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords: It was in this case found by the learned arbitrator that the appellant, when he left the respondents' service on December 12, 1924, was suffering from lead poisoning, and it was given in evidence by the appellant himself that when he was working for the respondents on some houses he used pure lead paint which he himself mixed and that he used the same paint when working for them on other houses. He was duly certified on July 13, 1925, as suffering from the effects of lead poisoning and as being thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he had been employed, and, being in no way in fault under section 8 (1) (b) or (c) (i) of the Act, he claimed compensation from the respondents as his last employers under subsection 1 (c).

That the respondents' business is of such a nature that lead poisoning may probably enough overtake those engaged in its processes is not disputed, no rebutting evidence was given, and in these circumstances it might well have seemed that the appellant, in proving what he did, had established within the meaning of section 8 (1) that his lead poisoning was due to the "nature of the employment" in which he had been employed within the prescribed period of 12 months, so that the liability of the respondents to make compensation to him as his last employers within that period followed almost as of course. But it was contended by the respondents, and hitherto successfully, that they were under no liability in the matter. Not because the appellant's lead poisoning had not been contracted in "any process involving the use of lead or its preparations or compounds." The appellant's disease had been so contracted, but had been contracted some years before—when he was employed in the Navy—and the respondents' contention was that in respect of his consequential disablement they were not bound by the section to provide compensation for the reason that the appellant had not succeeded in showing, as, in the words of the Master of the Rolls, he was required to show, that the poisoning "was brought to a head or caused by or aggravated by or accelerated by the employment by the respondents." The main question on this appeal is whether the appellant was under any obligation to establish a further case of that kind as the condition of success in his present claim.

My Lords, the history and exceptional position of section 8 in this statute has already been brought to your Lordships' notice. It is a new enactment dealing, as a code, with a new subject-matter for compensation—industrial diseases—upon conditions and with limitations peculiar to itself, both as regards the workman entitled to claim compensation and as regards the employer or employers chargeable with its provision. The section is, and it should, I think, be regarded as being, sui generis, different, and, in view of the scheme of compensation embodied in it, necessarily different, both in its character and incidents from those provisions of the statute which provide, according to another arrangement of liability, compensation for accidents more appropriately so called. I believe myself that most of its supposed difficulties have resulted from a misplaced endeavour to torture the provisions of the section into a correspondence with these other provisions of the Act to which I have referred, when there is not, and there was never intended to be between them, any correspondence at all. If the section in its entirety be read free from any such prepossessions and in accordance with the natural and ordinary meaning of the words employed in it, its terms, as it seems to me, are reasonably explicit.

In the present case, the immediate question is as to the true meaning of the words in subsection 1: "due to the nature of any employment in which the workman was employed at any time within the twelve months," &c. It has been held by the Court of Appeal in Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 283; [1914] 2 K.B., 213) that these words are the equivalent in the present case of the words "due to the employment under the respondents," and that accordingly the appellant cannot here succeed unless he makes against the respondents such a case as the Master of the Rolls has paraphrased in the words I have taken from his judgment.

My Lords, if a conception so very simple as that imputed by this construction of it is alone intended to be conveyed by the expression in debate, it is permissible to ask why the Legislature should have chosen for use in the section no less than six times a phrase so oblique as that selected when the appropriate words of directness were so immediately at its hand. And this question has point added to it when another consideration is borne in mind. The word "employment" is not, as I think, in this phrase used immediately to describe the relation between employer and workman, a sense in which it is so frequently utilized throughout the Act and the sense in which the Court of Appeal in Dean's case (supra) supposed it to be used here. In this phrase, as it seems to me, the word very clearly refers to the work or process in which the workman had been engaged and not to his contract with an employer to engage in it. If so, the non-appearance in the clause of the direct words is explained. They would have conveyed a sense which was not intended.

But, my Lords, one must face the reason why the Court of Appeal in Dean's case (supra) adopted the construction which it did. It adopted that construction, forced as it was, because thereby the Court was enabled to bring section 8 into line with the rest of the Act in this, that it made liable to provide compensation in respect of these diseases only an employer responsible in some sense for the workman's breakdown. And Dean's case (supra) has received the imprimatur of two of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal in the present case in that such is its result or at all events its tendency.

My Lords, it is, I think, clear that such is not the intent of the section. It is demonstrable that such could not be its result if its paramount purpose to provide compensation for the disabled workman by the limited class made responsible for it was to be achieved. And it is the necessary effect of provisions in it which are quite free from ambiguity that the "last employer" in cases which may be not infrequent is alone liable to provide compensation for a workman's breakdown for which, in terms of the section itself, he is regarded as having no responsibility whatever.

My Lords, there are two classes of disease dealt with in the section. There are, first of all, diseases which are definite in origin. There are, secondly, diseases which are described as being "contracted by a gradual process." Lead poisoning is in the second class. With regard to each class of disease the right to compensation arises only where the workman is disabled or suspended from work or dies as a result of it. There is no limitation of time in respect of the date at which a disease of the first class originated or as to the date at which the gradual process in a disease of the second class commenced. That date in each case may have been years before the consequential disablement or suspension or death. The workman or his dependents are not by any such lapse of time deprived of compensation on disablement or suspension or death supervening. But it can be recovered only if within 12 months the workman has been employed in an employment to the nature of which the disease is due, and then only from the employer who last within that period so employed him. All this is clear.

And, my Lords, it is, I think, equally clear that in the event of disablement due to a disease definite in origin where in a case like the present the workman is not in default under section 1 (1) (b) or (c) (i), the last employer's only answer to the claim is under subsection 1 (c) (ii) to shift the responsibility on to the shoulders of some other employer by showing that the workman's disease originated when he was in the employment of that employer and not in his own. If he fails to show so much, or if the other employer had not employed the man within 12 months, the last employer's liability under the section to make compensation remains unrelieved, although he is himself free from all responsibility for the so-called "accident" on the hypothesis of section 1 (1) (c) (i) itself.

This instance is alone sufficient to dispose of the supposed correspondence in this respect between section 8 and section 1 of the Act which Dean's case (supra) purported to confirm. But such an instance is confined to diseases definite in origin. Is the position different as regards diseases contracted by gradual process? In no way, as I think. There, however, the result is reached by a different process of reasoning.

And first, my Lords, it follows from a very simple consideration. The workman, who has to prove that his disease was "due to the nature of" some employment in which he was engaged, may be a workman suffering from a disease contracted by gradual process as frequently as from a disease of sudden onset. What he has to prove is the same in each case. But in the one class of case there can, as has been seen, be no question of the applicant being under any obligation to make against the "last employer" what would then be the entirely inappropriate case outlined by the Master of the Rolls. Why, under the same words, should such an obligation be implied in the other class of case?

But again, my Lords, while in this second class of cases, as in the first, the last employer is the only person from whom the compensation is recoverable, he may, in a case of gradual progress under section 8 (1) (c) (iii), obtain contribution from any other employers who during the 12 months employed the workman "in the employment to the nature of which the disease was due." Now, my Lords, it has not been suggested that under this subsection there is any obligation on the part of the employer seeking contribution to make against the employers against whom it is sought any such case as is outlined by the Master of the Rolls in the passage already quoted; and that there is no such obligation has been held, and I think rightly held, by the Court of Appeal in Mallinder v. J. Moores and Sons, Limited ([1912] 2 K.B., 124). That is to say, in a question of contribution the section takes no concern with the fact or time of contraction of disease; it takes no heed of aggravation in the service of one employer or of another. But if that be so, why, under identical words, should there be imposed upon the claimant as against the only employer he is permitted to sue—the last employer—an obligation which is not in turn and by the same words imposed upon that employer in a question with contributors to his liability? And the difficulty of finding any other than a negative answer to this question is enhanced by the fact, so often already insisted upon and clear on the section, that while in the case of these diseases all the employers within the year are as between themselves under a corresponding liability to contribute to the compensation awarded, it is only as against the last employer that the claimant can, in any case, proceed. If he fails against him, he fails entirely.

Whether, therefore, the disease in question be of the first class or of the second it appears to me to be clear that a claimant is under no obligation to prove more than in the present case the appellant proved. His claim to compensation is thereby established.

My Lords, the result, it may be admitted, is arbitrary. But it becomes inevitable, so soon as it is seen that merely by the accident that the disabled workman had, more than 12 months before, left the employment of the employer in whose business his disease originated, a later employer may be made, without recourse, responsible for the entire consequences. Although, however, the result is arbitrary, it cuts both ways. If in this case the respondents are made liable, although they are not shown to have been directly responsible for the appellant's disablement, in another case they may be free of all liability even if the claimant's disease, even one definite in origin, was contracted in their own works.

And this leads me to my final observation, one which has struck me throughout this case as highly pertinent, although I must confess I was quite unable to persuade Mr. Dale, who argued the appellant's case so ably, that it helped him at all.

My Lords, I see in subsections 7, 8, and 9 the strongest confirmation of the view as to the effect of this section which, apart altogether from these subsections, I have already expressed. As is well known, a workman has under this Act a very exceptional interest in insurances entered into by his employer in respect of liabilities under the Act—see section 5—and in these subsections I find machinery provided for bringing into existence by provisional order in respect of employers' liability under this section 8 a compulsory system of mutual insurance throughout an industry at risk under it. I can myself find no explanation for the element of compulsion, peculiar to this section, being introduced into this insurance, and at the instance of any employer or workman engaged in the industry, except this, that the Legislature, impressed by the arbitrary and it may sometimes be heavy liability imposed as a result of the section's scheme of compensation, was careful to provide some machinery under which the risk might, over all employers subject to it, be as fairly and accurately averaged as is possible under a scheme of mutual insurance sanctioned by Parliament.

On the whole case, my Lords, I am of opinion that the case of Dean (supra) proceeds upon a wrong principle, and I think it should be definitely overruled. With the rest of your Lordships I am for allowing this appeal.

DE FREVILLE v. DILL.*

Practice—Jury—Verdict for plaintiff before hearing all the evidence for the defence—Discharge of jury—Discretion of Judge.

Where a jury, before hearing all the evidence for the defence, finds a verdict for the plaintiff, it is in the discretion of the Judge to decide whether the jury should be discharged or whether the case should be continued before the same jury.

This was an application by the plaintiff in the action of De Freville v. Dill reported in The Times of March 30 and 31 and April 1 and 2, to have the jury, who had formed a premature opinion adverse to the defendant and who had been discharged by Mr. Justice Avory, re-summoned and re-empanelled to hear the rest of the evidence.

The action was one brought by Mrs. May de Freville, of Lowther-road, Wokingham, Berkshire, the wife of Mr. Geoffrey Philip Herbert de Freville, claiming from Dr. Alfred Vincent Dill, a medical practitioner, of The Bourne, Brinscombe, Stroud, Gloucestershire, damages for his alleged negligence in certifying her to be a lunatic on June 9, 1926. Damages were also claimed for alleged assault and false imprisonment.

The defendant pleaded that he signed the certificate in good faith and that he acted with reasonable care. He said that his conclusions regarding the plaintiff's condition at the time of her certification were correct.

Mr. Cremlyn appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. W. H. Gattie for the defendant.

Mr. CREMLYN, in making the application, said that he would ask the Court to say that the Judge did not, in the circumstances, exercise his discretion judicially. There were one or two admitted facts. The defendant only saw Mrs. de Freville for about ten minutes on May 12, 1926, and she was then of sound mind. On May 15 her husband called on the defendant and asked him if she were certifiable. He said that she was not, but suggested that she should be induced to go into a private home for a time.

The plaintiff called 14 witnesses, and had closed her case. The defendant had given his evidence in chief and had been cross-examined for about an hour and a half when, the cross-examination not being completed, the foreman of the jury asked Mr. Justice Avory whether the jury could stop the case. The Judge said : "It depends entirely what views you take as to the evidence." He then told the jury to put their message to him in writing. The foreman did so and handed it to the Judge, who said that it was a finding by the jury that the defendant had been negligent, and returning a verdict for the plaintiff. He then referred to section 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and asked Mr. Singleton, for the defendant, if he had any application to make.

Mr. Singleton made no application for the jury to be discharged, but said that he could not consent to judgment in the circumstances. Thereupon the Judge said that the proper course for him to do was to discharge the jury, as they had given a verdict without having heard material evidence for the defendant.

The foreman said that the jury had simply asked for advice and had taken the advice given to put their opinion in writing. He (counsel) submitted to the Judge that such a note sent to him was not enough to prevent the case from being continued, and the jury might have subsequently heard evidence which would have persuaded them that they had come to a premature conclusion. Mr. Justice Avory had referred to the well-known saying that "a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still."

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It should be, "He that complies against his will."

Mr. CREMLYN said that the Judge was entitled to discharge the jury only if he had come to the conclusion that they had misconducted themselves and had formed a dishonest or corrupt opinion. He referred to an unreported case of Kent and Sussex Railway Company v. Hanbury and Co., tried at the Kent Summer Assizes in June, 1924. In that case counsel for the defendant in similar circumstances refused to go on, and the Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs. He also referred to Campbell v. Hackney Furnishing Company (22 The Times L.R., 318), where Lord Alverstone, C.J., said that a premature expression of opinion by a jury in favour of the plaintiffs was not sufficient by itself to justify counsel for the defence in refusing to go on with the case. He submitted that the Judge was bound by the same rule as counsel. Almost the same thing happened in the case of Harnett v. Fisher (42 The Times L.R., 486). The jury wanted to stop the case, but Mr. Justice Horridge said that they could do so only if they were in favour of the defendant, and so the case went on. Here the jury only asked the Judge for advice.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This was not a mere indication of what was passing through the jury's minds. Mr. Justice Avory said to them : "Write down on a piece of paper what you want to do, and then I will tell you whether you can do it." I have here the book containing the Judge's order and the original slip of paper. On the slip are written the words : "We are all agreed that negligence has been proved and we return a verdict for the plaintiff." What can you have more conclusive of a final decision than this paper ?

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—It need not be dishonesty to entitle a Judge to discharge the jury ; incompetence and ignorance are sufficient.

Mr. CREMLYN.—No doubt we should very much prefer to have our cases tried by the Judges of the Court of Appeal, but people are entitled to have a jury to decide them.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—Yes, a jury which has heard all the evidence on both sides.

Mr. CREMLYN.—I agree that the learned Judge has an absolute discretion, but he must exercise it judicially. He could not, for instance, discharge a juryman because he did not like the look of him. I do not say that the grounds were not grounds on which the Judge could act, but that in the circumstances he ought not to have acted as he did.

Counsel contended that mere ignorance on the part of a jury was not sufficient to entitle the Judge to discharge them.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS referred to the case of Ural Caspian Oil Corporation, Limited v. Hume-Schweder (The Times, July 31, 1913). In that case, which eventually went to the House of Lords, almost the same thing happened. The jury handed up to the Judge, before hearing the evidence for the defence, a note which stated that they were all satisfied that the plaintiff was entitled to the commission which he claimed. That showed that justice could not be done by them. It was justice turned topsy-turvy. His Lordship read a passage from the judgment of Lord Shaw in the House of Lords.

Mr. CREMLYN said that that case could be distinguished on the ground that there were two questions for the jury to decide, and they found on one of them only. The House of Lords did not say that the jury ought to be discharged, but that they should be warned not to come to any conclusion until they had heard the whole of the evidence. Here the Judge could not find that the jury could not have come to a proper conclusion on the whole evidence.

Counsel for the defendant were not called upon to argue.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the notice of motion was a most unusual one. Having stated the facts, his Lordship said that the words used by the jury went far beyond a mere indication of a view passing through their minds. They were only consistent with an intention to stop the case without having heard the rest of the evidence for the defendant. It was plain that such a verdict must be bad. It was contrary to the oath taken by the jurors themselves well and truly to hear the case and to decide it in accordance with the evidence. That meant the whole of the evidence and not a part of it only. The intervention offended against the basic principles of justice.

It was argued that Mr. Justice Avory had not exercised his discretion judicially and ought to have allowed the case to go on. In his (the Master of the Rolls's) opinion he acted quite correctly. The Divisional Court in Campbell v. Hackney Furnishing Company, Limited (22 The Times L.R., 318) held that it was for the Judge who tried a case to decide, in similar circumstances, what to do when such a question arose.

It was quite plain from the observations of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Ural Caspian Oil Corporation, Limited v. Hume-Schweder (The Times, July 31, 1913), that it was for the Judge to decide whether to go on or to stop the case because it was not right for proceedings to continue before a jury which had returned a premature verdict. He (his Lordship) would be very sorry to say anything which might have the effect of limiting or impairing the discretion of a Judge to discharge a jury in similar circumstances. The application must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON agreed. The case raised a question of not infrequent occurrence and of some difficulty. The slip of paper handed in by the jury showed that they were entirely ignorant of the most elementary principles of the administration of justice. It placed the Judge in a difficulty. On the one hand, the jury had expressed their definite opinion in favour of the plaintiff ; on the other, the case had been going on for four days and considerable expense had been incurred, which it was not desirable to waste altogether.

In his view the question of primary importance was what the Judge who tried the case and had the witnesses and jury before him thought ; whether he thought that in such circumstances the case could go on in justice to the defendant. In some cases perhaps it could proceed, in other cases it could not. If the Judge was satisfied that the case could go on, then it appeared that counsel for the defendant could not object. It would take an extraordinarily strong case to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretion of the Judge in such circumstances and no such case had arisen here.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT.—I agree.

REX v. MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—EX PARTE H.C. MOTOR WORKS, LIMITED.*

Hackney Carriages—Licensing of omnibuses—Imposition of undertaking as to fares—Appeal to Minister of Transport—Roads Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 72), s. 14 (3).

The Corporation of H. refused to grant licences for the applicants' motor omnibuses unless the applicants gave an undertaking to charge fares within the City of H. higher than those of the corporation tramways. Their reason for requiring this undertaking was that the omnibuses were only needed for through passengers from H. to points outside the city ; and that it was not in the public interest that revenue should be diverted from the tramways which provided an adequate service within the city, or that short-distance passengers should occupy the seats in the omnibuses to the exclusion of the long-distance passengers for whose benefit alone the omnibus service was permitted. The Minister of Transport made no order on an appeal by the applicants, considering that it was in the public interest that passengers should be discouraged from using the applicants' omnibuses for short distances, and that the only legal way to secure that result was some arrangement as to fares.

Held, that the Minister had not taken extraneous matters into consideration merely because he proposed, by the regulation of the fares, to secure an object which he considered in the public interest.

These were two rules nisi, (a) for a certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Minister of Transport contained in a letter dated November 19, 1926, making no order upon an appeal by the applicants, H.C. Motor Works, Limited, from a refusal of the Hull Corporation to grant to the applicants licences to ply for hire with motor omnibuses in the City of Hull; (b) for a mandamus to the Minister to hear and determine the matter of the said appeal according to law.

By an agreement made in 1923, the applicants purchased from the Hull Corporation certain omnibuses together with the goodwill of an omnibus service between the City of Hull and the Urban District of Hessle. The route was about 4¼ miles in length, about three miles of it within the city, and the rest in the urban district. The part of the route within the city lay almost entirely through streets in which the corporation had tramways. From 1925 the corporation began to require, as a condition of granting licences to the applicants, an undertaking that they would charge fares within the city exceeding by at least a penny those in force on the corporation tramcars. The view of the corporation was that the omnibus service was required only for the convenience of passengers going from Hull to Hessle and vice versa, and would not have been licensed at all for the sake of the traffic within the city, for which the corporation tramways provided an ample and convenient service. They further thought that it was not to the public interest that the efficiency of the tramways should be impaired by depletion of revenue through omnibus competition, and also that it was desirable, in the interests of the through passengers for whom the omnibus service was intended, to discourage short-distance passengers, who could be equally well served by the tramways, from filling up the omnibuses to the exclusion of those who had no alternative mode of transport.

After negotiations which it is not material to set out in detail, the applicants in July, 1926, refused to renew the undertaking which, on legal advice, they had broken, and the corporation refused to renew their licences. The applicants appealed under section 14 (3) of the Roads Act, 1920, to the Minister of Transport, who held a local inquiry and eventually wrote to the applicants on November 19, 1926, that he had decided to make no order on their appeal.

These rules were then obtained upon the grounds that the Minister of Transport, in deciding or purporting to decide the said appeal, did not properly exercise or exceeded his jurisdiction in that he considered and acted upon extraneous matter—namely, the fares charged and intended to be charged by the H.C. Motor Works, Limited. In an affidavit filed on behalf of the Minister it was stated: "In the circumstances of this case the Minister considered it essential in the public interest that some arrangement should be made to discourage the use of the prosecutors' vehicles for the carriage of short-distance passengers on that portion of the route which is served by the tramway system, and in the absence of an arrangement which would have that effect he would not be prepared to order the issue of licences. The Minister is not aware of any arrangement other than an undertaking, on the lines of that required by the licensing authority in this case, which would legally secure this effect."

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Minister of Transport; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Paley Scott appeared for the Hull Corporation; Mr. G. R. Mitchison supported the rules.

Mr. Justice Avory.—These are two rules, one for mandamus and one for certiorari, addressed to the Minister of Transport, calling upon him to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this Court a decision contained in a letter of his dated November 19 last, and why a mandamus should not issue directed to him commanding him to hear and determine, pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, the matter of an appeal by the H.C. Motor Works, Limited, against the refusal of the Hull Corporation to grant to the company licences to ply for hire with omnibuses. In each case the rule is moved for upon the ground that the Minister of Transport, in deciding or purporting to decide the appeal, did not properly exercise or exceeded his jurisdiction in that he considered and acted upon extraneous matter—namely, the fares charged and intended to be charged by the H.C. Motor Works, Limited, upon the omnibuses referred to, and that he did not hear and determine the appeal according to law. For the purpose of my judgment and of the view which I take it is not necessary to determine whether any distinction should be drawn in this case between the remedy by certiorari and the remedy by mandamus. The only ground upon which either of these applications can succeed is that the Minister in coming to his decision was influenced by extraneous considerations, that is, by matters which he had no right to take into consideration in determining the appeal. That is really the only question before this Court.

The Hull Corporation in this case had refused to grant licences, and it appears that they refused to grant them because the applicants refused to give an undertaking that they would charge certain fares upon their omnibuses which were running in Hull along the route upon which trams were running, and the only question with regard to the fares was limited to the fares charged upon the route which was already served by the trams. Upon the refusal of the Hull Corporation to grant the licences except upon that undertaking there was this appeal to the Minister of Transport. He came to his decision only after an inquiry had been held by an officer authorized by him for that purpose, and we have in this case the benefit of the grounds upon which the Minister came to his conclusion set out in an affidavit before us. In that we are told that in the circumstances of this case the Minister considered it essential in the public interest that some arrangement should be made to discourage the use of the omnibuses for the carriage of short-distance passengers on that portion of the route which is served by the tramway system, and "in the absence of an arrangement which would have that effect he would not be prepared to order the issue of licences. The Minister is not aware of any arrangement, other than an undertaking on the lines of that required by the licensing authority in this case, which would legally secure this effect." It is said that that affidavit of itself shows that the Minister has taken into his consideration the question of fares to be charged upon these omnibuses. In a sense no doubt that is true. It was impossible that he could consider the matter of this appeal without in some sense taking into consideration the question of fares which it was proposed to charge upon these omnibuses, and it is said by Mr. Mitchison that in doing that he was acting contrary to a decision of this Court in the case of Rex v. Farnborough Urban District Council (36 The Times L.R., 22 ; [1920] 1 K.B., 234). That case was decided in October, 1919. It had reference to something which had been done by the Farnborough Urban District Council in May of 1919, and undoubtedly it was a decision that a local authority, in considering an application for licences for omnibuses to ply for hire in its district, is not entitled to refuse to grant the licences on the ground that the fares charged or proposed to be charged are excessive. It appears that in that case the council had refused to renew the licences on two grounds, first, the refusal of the company to reduce its fares, and secondly, its refusal to adopt penny stages, and the Court came to the conclusion that, in view of the provisions of the Towns Police Clauses Acts of 1847 and 1889, the local authority, while they had power to make by-laws fixing the fares to be paid in hackney carriages, had no power to make by-laws fixing the fares to be charged in omnibuses. If matters had remained as they were in May of 1919, there might have been much greater difficulty in determining this present question, but we have now to determine the question in the light of the provisions of the Roads Act of 1920, particularly section 14 (3), which provides : "Where, upon application for a licence to ply for hire with an omnibus, the licensing authority either refuses to grant a licence or grants a licence subject to conditions, in either case the applicant shall have a right of appeal to the Minister of Transport from the decision of the licensing authority, and the Minister shall have power to make such order thereon as he thinks fit, and such order shall be binding on the licensing authority. An order made by the Minister under this subsection shall be final and not subject to appeal to any Court. . . ." When the application was made in this case for the rule nisi Lord Hewart, C.J., having been referred by Mr. Mitchison in making his application to the decision in Rex v. Farnborough Urban District Council (supra) said, after reading section 14 (3) which I have just read : "Therefore you have these four elements. The licensing authority may grant a licence subject to conditions. Upon appeal to the Minister he shall make such order as he thinks fit. The order made by the Minister is to be final, and it is not subject to appeal to any Court. That was not the law when the Farnborough case (supra) was decided." The Lord Chief Justice was there pointing out by anticipation that the question of the effect of the decision in the Farnborough case (supra) would have to be considered in the light of the provisions of section 14 (3) of the Roads Act of 1920. There was a further observation made by the Lord Chief Justice in the case of Rex v. Minister of Transport, decided in this Court on January 13, 1927, of which we have been furnished with a shorthand note, but which is not elsewhere reported. It was a case which certainly was determined upon the ground of the undue delay in making the application, but in the course of his judgment the Lord Chief Justice said : "With regard to the question, which becomes in these circumstances a question of less importance, whether it is true to say that the Minister of Transport did in fact refuse to hear and make an order upon the company's appeal, it seems to me to be quite clear that he did, at any rate, entertain the appeal. He sent a representative to hold a local inquiry at which witnesses on the one side and on the other were heard for a period of two days. If after making that inquiry, and equipping himself with that information, the Minister of Transport had written in plain terms that he had considered the appeal, that he had ascertained the facts, and that he had considered the conditions which were complained of, and then dismissed the appeal, there would not have been a word to say." The question is whether the passage in that judgment does not equally apply in this case. The Minister of Transport has held the inquiry, has heard the appeal, has considered the conditions upon which the local authority were willing to grant the licences, and without which they refuse to grant them, and he has given his decision in the words which I have quoted from the affidavit. The question is : Is there anything here which justifies us in saying, or which compels us to say, that in coming to this decision he has taken into consideration matters which were extraneous, and which he ought not to have considered ? In my view the Minister of Transport in this case was considering the public convenience in view of the fact that there was an existing tramway on this route, and while it is clear that both the corporation and the Minister were doing nothing to interfere with the through journey of these omnibuses from Hull to Hessle, all that they had in mind, and all that the Minister had in mind, was to provide that the public convenience should not be interfered with by these omnibuses running alongside the tramways in the city of Hull in such a way as would in the opinion of the Minister be in conflict with the public interest. If incidentally to the consideration of that question he could not shut his eyes to the question of the fares, I do not think it can properly be said that he was influenced by any extraneous consideration in determining what was best in the public interest. On that short ground I think that both these rules ought to be discharged.

Mr. Justice Swift.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. The appeal to the Minister from the refusal of the corporation to grant the omnibus company their licences was based, apart from the particular matter of the agreement between the corporation and the company (as to which I need say nothing), upon the contention that the corporation had no legal right, directly or indirectly, to fix or control fares in respect of any of the company's omnibuses plying for hire within the city. It was quite clear that the corporation had refused to grant or renew the licences on a ground connected with the fares charged by the omnibus company, namely, that they had failed to comply with the condition upon which they had previously held licences, which was to charge a minimum fare of not less than a penny in excess of the tramway fare on the Hull and Hessle route, and their refusal to comply with any such condition. Upon that appeal, brought upon that ground to the Minister, the Minister informed the company that he had decided to make no order, and in the affidavit sworn by a gentleman in the office of the Ministry of Transport the ground was made clear upon which he had so decided. The affidavit says that "In the circumstances of this case the Minister considered it essential in the public interest that some arrangement should be made to discourage the use of the prosecutors' vehicles for the carriage of short-distance passengers on that portion of the route which is served by the tramway system, and in the absence of an arrangement which would have that effect he would not be prepared to order the issue of licences. The Minister is not aware of any arrangement other than an undertaking, on the lines of that required by the licensing authority in this case, which would legally secure this effect."

That matter arises in this way : The route along which these omnibuses ply from Hull to Hessle consists partly of a section in the urban district of Hessle outside the city of Hull, and partly of a longer section inside the city of Hull along the greater part of which is laid a tramway belonging to the corporation. The corporation (and the Minister agrees with them) are of opinion that there is needed along this road a service for persons wishing to go from Hull to Hessle, and from Hessle to Hull, but that there is not needed a service of omnibuses along the part of the road in which the tramway of the corporation is laid ; not only is such a service not needed, but it would have an injurious effect upon the provision of traffic facilities for the public by depleting the revenue of the corporation tramway ; and not only that, but it would diminish the facility which passengers intending to travel along the whole of the road would get, because part of the accommodation which would otherwise be available for them would be occupied by short-distance passengers. In those circumstances the corporation and the Minister had to consider some way by which it could be secured that the long-distance passengers should be provided for, and that the service which provided for them should not be used for short-distance traffic. As the Minister explains in the affidavit which I have read, it appeared to him that the only way—at any rate, it is the only way which has been suggested—and the most effective and reasonable way of doing that is by means of fares. It had been suggested apparently, for some time, that the object could be attained if a pecuniary inducement was given to passengers to travel by tramway so far as the tramway was available, because the fare on the tramway was less than the fare by the omnibus ; and it was with that object, and that only, that the corporation, in the first place, and the Minister on appeal, have purported to deal with this matter of fares. That order having been made by the Minister on appeal, these rules were applied for on the ground that the Minister, in purporting to decide the appeal, did not properly exercise, or exceeded, his jurisdiction, or declined jurisdiction, in that he considered and acted upon extraneous matter, namely, the fares charged, and intended to be charged, by the H.C. Motor Works, Limited, upon the omnibuses referred to, and that he did not hear and determine the said appeal according to law. The words of section 14 of the Roads Act, 1920, have already been read, and I need not repeat them. They are in the widest possible terms, and the Minister is there given power to make such order on the appeal as he may think fit. But what is said is that an object which certainly, so far from being extraneous, is in the closest degree appropriate in the exercise of this jurisdiction, namely, the provision of an omnibus service to the extent, and to the extent only, that it is needed by the public, becomes extraneous because it is to be attained by the machinery of the differential fare to which the Minister refers. The argument in support of that contention is based, and having carefully listened to the very full and careful argument of learned counsel in support of the rule, I think based only, upon the case of Rex v. Farnborough Urban District Council (36 The Times L.R., 22 ; [1920] 1 K.B., 234). It is said that that case has laid down a binding rule of law to the effect that in no case is an authority which has to consider the question of a licence for a public vehicle, or an omnibus, to consider any question of fares at all, or to do anything which will have any direct effect in regulating fares. Speaking for myself, if I thought that was a fair and just representation of the effect of that decision, I see in the Roads Act, 1920, nothing which would cut down or impair it. I do not think that the language of the Roads Act, 1920, either in respect of conditions, or in respect of the powers given to the Minister on appeal, would avail to allow either the corporation or the Minister to consider the question of fares at all, if that case had laid down such a binding rule of law as is suggested. Speaking for myself, it appears to me that that is quite an illegitimate way of using this decision. The question there was a totally different one. An omnibus company wanted licences within the urban district of Farnborough, and what the district council tried to do was this : They tried to make the grant of the licences conditional on the fares not exceeding a certain maximum scale which they prescribed. That was, of course, solely in the interests of the passengers by the omnibuses in order to enable them to travel by the omnibuses at as cheap a rate as the district council thought could be secured. It was said that they had no power to do that upon one ground, and it is upon this ground only that the Court decided the case. It was said : You are, in effect, doing that which you can do with regard to hackney carriages, that is to say, limiting the fares which those carriages can charge. When you look at the power which the Towns Police Clauses Acts, regulating these matters, give to local authorities with regard to hackney carriages, and under which the fares of those carriages are limited, you find that Parliament has deliberately abstained from extending those provisions to omnibuses, and that when the question of the licensing of omnibuses was dealt with by Parliament they deliberately refrained from extending the powers, or giving powers such as were given in respect of hackney carriages. It was said : You are trying, by your action, with regard to these licences, to do that indirectly which you cannot do directly, namely, fix the fares to be charged by omnibuses. Speaking for myself, I think that that decision, like all decisions, should be read in the light of, and according to, the subject-matter which was there dealt with. The whole object of the action which we are discussing here, first of the corporation, and secondly of the Minister of Transport on appeal, is altogether outside that case, and altogether outside the purview of the enactments of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, which regulates the fares of hackney carriages. It is simply a piece of machinery in order to accomplish that which the Minister says cannot otherwise be accomplished, and which, in his opinion, and in the opinion of the corporation, is in the public interest. It is emphatically one of those matters which the corporation and the Minister have to consider under the Roads Act, 1920, namely, to secure that the omnibus service for which a licence is sought shall be such as provides in the most efficient way for the convenience of the public so as to give the public an additional facility which is needed, without interfering with and injuring other public services which exist, and that it should be so managed and arranged as to confine its operation, so far as possible, to the provision of that for which it is needed, and should provide it in the best possible way. It seems to me quite impossible to say that the decision in the case of Rex v. Farnborough Urban District Council (supra), given upon a totally different subject-matter, and with reference to totally different considerations. can be a binding rule of law such as is suggested, namely, to constitute an exception to the power to make orders, and to grant licences, or to refuse to grant licences, conferred by section 14 of the Roads Act, 1920 ; in other words, to impose upon that statute a fetter derived from a decision which obviously was pronounced without reference to any question of the kind. In my opinion that is not a reasonable way of construing either the Act of Parliament or the decision, and I agree, therefore, that both these rules ought to be discharged.

LEWIS v. GUEST, KEEN, AND NETTLEFOLD, LIMITED. WATKINS v. SAME. TUCKER v. SAME. INGRAM v. CRAWSHAY BROTHERS (CYFARTHFA), LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Award—Incapacitated or partially incapacitated workman doing light work—Cesser of employment from economic causes—Revival of right to compensation—Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1897 to 1925.

Where a workman, partially incapacitated by an accident during the course of his employment, obtains work in lieu of compensation, the cesser of that work entitles him to an award, even in cases where the cesser is due to the state of the labour market and would have resulted in his being unemployed in any event.

These were four appeals from decisions of the Judge of the Merthyr Tydfil County Court sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

The appeals were by workmen from decisions refusing to award compensation, and were heard together as involving the same questions, although upon slightly different facts. Those facts were stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls as follow :—

John Lewis, now 64 years old, had been employed by the first respondents since he was 12 years of age, and was at the date of his accident on October 6, 1904, a haulier at the respondents' coal mine. Through the accident he lost his left arm, which was amputated above the elbow joint. He was out of employment for 12 months, and thenceforward was employed by the respondents in oiling machinery until September 22, 1924, when the pit was closed for economic reasons.

On September 25, 1925, the applicant commenced proceedings for an award, claiming compensation as from September 22, 1924, based on partial, but permanent, incapacity. By their answer the respondents disputed liability and claimed that the applicant was not incapacitated for his ordinary work. The hearing was delayed until the case of Palmer v. Crawshay Brothers (Cyfarthfa), Limited (42 The Times L.R., 490) had been decided, which it was supposed would govern the claim of Lewis. That case was decided by this Court on April 28, 1926. On October 20, 1926, the cases of Lewis and the others were heard, and on January 19, 1927, the learned Judge delivered judgment deciding against the workmen in all four cases upon the ground that the employment had terminated owing to the state of the labour market, and from that judgment the workmen appeal.

The Act under which this case is to be decided is the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and not that of 1906, which the learned Judge appears to have followed. It is this later Act that contains the words in Schedule I. (3), first introduced into it, on which stress is laid by the learned Judge.

In Watkins's case the workman, while working in the first respondents' steel works, suffered an accident on February 16, 1908, which necessitated his right leg being amputated at the thigh. He was paid compensation, and on April 28, 1910, an agreement with his employers was reached and recorded, whereby he was paid half wages, 16s. 1d., as compensation, in supplement to the wages which he earned on light work which the respondents gave him. On May 3, 1926, the works where he was employed were stopped, and since then he has been unemployed. The workman shortly afterwards commenced proceedings for a review of the weekly payments made to him. The respondents contested their liability on the ground, "that the applicant is out of work owing to industrial conditions and that he is in receipt of unemployment benefit," and they claimed that "the applicant is not incapacitated by reason of his accident from earning wages equal to or in excess of his pre-accident earnings."

The learned Judge held that there was no loss then due to the incapacity arising from the accident and dismissed the application. The Act under which this case and the two following cases are to be determined is the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

In Tucker's case the workman was a hitcher employed at a mine of the first respondents, and on August 12, 1913, suffered an accident whereby his hip was injured and rendered rigid.

He was in the Army for two years, and then was given work by the respondents as a signaller in the pit—this being of the character of a "compensation job." On April 30, 1924, the colliery was closed down for economic reasons, and so Tucker's employment ended. On September 23, 1924, he took proceedings against the respondents, but abandoned them on work being found for him at a pump at Nantwen. On February 17, 1925, this work came to an end, and Tucker again commenced proceedings. His claim was dismissed, but a declaration of liability was granted him. On November 23, 1925, he commenced the present proceedings, the hearing of which was adjourned for the same reason already stated. Ultimately the case was heard and determined on October 20, 1926, when the Judge dismissed the application for the reasons given in his judgment of January 19, 1927. The same points were relied upon in this case by the respondents as in the case of Watkins.

In Ingram v. Crawshay Brothers Ingram was injured by an accident on September 12, 1917, whereby some fingers on his left hand were crushed. Light work was given him until the pit closed in October, 1924. On June 25, 1925, at a time when he was out of work, an agreement was reached under which he was to be paid 4s. a week, and he has been paid that sum continuously. In May, 1926, he commenced proceedings for review. The case was heard in October, 1926, and the same judgment dismissing his application was given in this case also.

The four workmen appealed.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the appellants, and submitted the following propositions :—

(1) A workman whose injury no longer prevents him from earning full wages in the open market cannot have compensation merely because industrial conditions prevent him from obtaining employment.

(2) If he is no longer prevented from earning some wages, but is unable to earn his old wages, he is not deprived of partial compensation merely because industrial conditions terminate his employment.

(3) A workman whose injuries prevent him from obtaining any employment is not deprived of compensation because industrial conditions would have prevented him in any circumstances.

(4) A man whose injuries are such that he is unemployable, unless his old employers choose to employ him, is, if they do not employ him, not deprived of full compensation merely because industrial conditions would have prevented him from obtaining employment if he had been uninjured.

Mr. Wingate-Saul, K.C., Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Langman appeared for the respondents in the various appeals and submitted that the question was one of fact for the County Court Judge. If men were out of work for economic reasons, not because they had been injured, but because there was no work for them to do, they were in no better or worse position than workmen who had not been injured.

The further arguments of counsel and the numerous authorities referred to are set out in the judgments.

The Master of the Rolls delivered the following considered judgment:—The first case, that of Lewis, is a request for an arbitration and award. The other three cases are requests of the workmen for reviews of the agreements recorded on awards made. The County Court Judge has made a note that it was agreed that, but for industrial and economic conditions which caused the pits to close down, all the workmen would have continued in the work on which they were last employed. [His Lordship stated the facts, as set out above, and continued.]

The four cases thus raise the question how far the compensation payable to the workman is affected by economic or industrial conditions and the possibility of the workman's obtaining employment under them. The learned Judge asks what, if any, compensation ought to be given to Lewis in respect of his injury under the conditions of the labour market that he describes. He adds that in order to answer that question he must deal with the question of rate of compensation at some length.

It is, in my judgment, necessary to begin at an earlier stage, and to decide what are the basis and nature of the compensation granted to the workman. Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1897 is as follows : "If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act." The effective words of this section are the same in the Acts of 1908 and 1925. In the Act of 1897, the employments to which it applied were limited by section 7, and in the subsequent Acts that limitation was abandoned. Upon the happening of an accident, therefore, the employer became liable to pay compensation to the workman to be ascertained at that time, and upon the facts as they then stood, during the incapacity ; subject to the right of review expressly given both to employer and to workman under the Act. See Lysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 156 ; [1901] A.C., 79), where Lord Halsbury makes it plain that this right is given by the Act and is not cut down by the schedule which directs how the quantum payable is to be measured. See also per Lord Dunedin in Woodilee Coal and Coke Company v. M'Neill (34 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1918] A.C., 43). The nature of the compensation given to the workman was pointed out clearly by Lord Sumner, then Lord Justice Hamilton, in Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 290 ; [1913] 2 K.B., 158) and was contrasted with the damages that are recoverable for injury caused to a plaintiff workman by the tortious negligence of the employer or his servants. "The object of the Act," he said ([1913] 2 K.B., at p. 170), "is to give an injured workman a livelihood so long as an injury arising from the accident incapacitates him from getting his living." He pointed out that the Act makes no reference to the possible supervention of other causes of incapacity. "The Act," he said, "is a guarantee of workmen against the risk of accident. It is not founded on indemnity, and the ideas of retribution for wrongdoing and of restitutio in integrum are foreign to it."

Interpreting the Act upon that principle, the Court of Appeal in that case held that the workman was entitled to compensation for incapacity arising from a permanent injury to his knee, and not less so because heart disease had supervened, which would have made it impossible for him to do his work if his knee had been sound. Lord Wrenbury, then Lord Justice Buckley, said (at p. 165) that "the compensation which the Act gives is not a compensation for the injury, but a compensation for the consequences resulting from the injury, such consequences disclosing themselves in the form of inability to earn wages due to the injury sustained." That case, binding upon this Court, decides that it would be wrong to read "solely" into the Act ; that a supervening physical infirmity does not vary the rights given to the workman under the Act ; that the consequences which form the basis of the measurement of the damages are to be found in the inability to earn wages due to the injury sustained ; and that the date of the application for the compensation is the critical date.

The decision in that case has been followed in a number of others where a supervening cause of incapacity has been disregarded. In Stowell v. Ellerman Lines, Limited (128 L.T., 823), old age and other intervening causes were held not to disentitle the workman to such an assessment of compensation for incapacity as could be traced and attributed to the accident. Indeed it has been applied in the case of McNally v. Furness, Withy and Co., Limited (29 The Times L.R., 678 ; [1913] 3 K.B., 605), where a workman was imprisoned for theft and was therefore disabled from earning wages, while his employers were prevented from giving him light work. This last decision is binding upon this Court ; and, if it is held to be sound in the House of Lords, it carries the irrelevance of a second cause to the limit that, even if it is due to the act of the man himself, it ought nevertheless to be disregarded. I have laid emphasis upon the words of Lord Justice Buckley quoted above—"inability to earn wages due to the injury sustained," for they appear to me to be the keynote of the measure of the compensation recoverable. The injury sustained by the accident is what is to be regarded. He had expressed the same view in Radcliffe v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (26 The Times L.R., 319 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 685), where he said that fluctuations in the (labour) market ought not to be taken into consideration, and in Cardiff

Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 1,009) his words were ([1911] 1 K.B., at p. 1,027) :—"Inability to earn for the purposes of Schedule I., paragraph 3, is inability to get employment owing to some incapacity for work personal to the workman to the exclusion of inability to get employment owing to the state of the labour market." Further, in Gafney v. Chorley Colliery Company, Limited (92 L.J., K.B. 1), it was decided by this Court that the condition of the labour market was not to be taken as a factor into the problem. Lord Sterndale, M.R. (92 L.J., K.B., at p. 4), said : "The Judge must be careful to see that any loss of earnings is due to the physical condition of the man and not to the state of the labour market." Lord Justice Scrutton said (92 L.J., K.B., at p. 5) : "I think this case must go back to the Judge, not to be dealt with on the footing of total incapacity, but to assess the compensation due by reason of the partial incapacity, the loss of earning capacity. He is not to reckon this as due to the fall in the labour market, especially as this is largely due to the action of the miners themselves in letting the pits be flooded."

The rules thus laid down appear to be these :— The workman is entitled to compensation if the accident disables him from earning wages such as he was capable of earning previously to the accident ; the compensation is to be measured by the disability that is due to the injury sustained, and that compensation is to be turned into money value according to the state of the normal market at that time, without taking into account abnormal and ephemeral conditions ; and particularly the workman ought not to be allowed to rely upon conditions of the labour market which he has contributed to produce, or upon absence of employment due to his own act, or to the acts of those associated with him, for which he shares responsibility. This latter statement appears justified by Bromley and Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company, Limited (129 L.T., 620), and by Hamilton v. Shelton Iron, Steel and Coal Company, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 97), decided in this Court on November 24, 1926. In the case of Portland Colliery Company, Limited v. Murray (39 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1923] A.C., 566), Lord Dunedin repeats (at p. 575) what had been said in Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Company, Limited (supra) that "the right of compensation rests not on the schedule, but on the first section of the Act." The schedule deals with the fixing of the amount of the compensation and provides the limits between which it is to be paid. "It is not," he says, "a statutory termination or interruption of the state of incapacity. When the words can no longer be applied, then there is no bar to the right which the injured man has to be compensated for partial incapacity." The workman is affirmatively entitled to compensation for partial incapacity, as shown above, and is not deprived of it merely because industrial conditions prevent him from obtaining any employment.

There is another factor to be borne in mind. The measure of the compensation is on a statutory and artificial basis. The state of the labour market is not to be taken into account ; but a rise of wages, as in Woodilee Coal and Coke Company v. M'Neill (supra), or a fall, as in Black v. Merry and Cunninghame, Limited ([1909] S.C., 1150), and in Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Company (28 The Times L.R., 27 ; [1912] 1 K.B., 63), is to be taken into account in adjusting the amount between the maxima for the purpose of correcting and adjusting the figures apparent at the time when the award is made. For under the Act of 1906, Schedule I. (3), the words are introduced that the weekly payment is to "bear such relation to the amount of that difference [between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is actually earning] as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper." By this means a discretion is given to the Judge to prevent too large or too small a figure from being reached owing to a difference—it may be a temporary difference—in the true figures of what the workman "is earning or is able to earn."

The learned Judge, after taking full time for consideration, delivered a careful and thoughtful judgment ; but I cannot accept his reasoning or his conclusions. The questions that he propounds appear to me to be contrary to the basic conception of compensation to the workman as laid down in Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Co., Limited (supra), Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496), Lord Dunedin's judgment in Woodilee Coal and Coke Company v. M'Neill (supra), and in Portland Colliery Company v. Murray (supra). His second, or alternative, statement of the question involves holding that the judgments of Lords Justices Moulton and Buckley in Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (supra) were wrong, and that the judgment of Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., was right. On page 29 of his judgment he definitely adopts this view, and says that the true principle of compensation is that the actual loss of wages resulting from the incapacity for work caused by an accident, as distinct from the mere amount of personal or physical incapacity for work resulting from it, is the true criterion for the assessment of compensation.

This criterion is, in my opinion, not right. It is in conflict with the cases already cited. Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (supra) has been accepted as good law and has been acted upon many times in the Court of Appeal, and was definitely approved by Lord Loreburn and Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (supra). It was followed in this Court in the recent case of Palmer v. Crawshay Brothers (Cyfarthfa), Limited (42 The Times L.R., 490), which is binding upon this Court and upon the learned Judge whose decision is now under review, and not less so because it was his decision that was appealed from in Palmer v. Crawshay Brothers (Cyfarthfa), Limited (supra). Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (supra) stands as an authority that the compensation to which the workman is entitled is that which is to be apportioned to his injury, in a normal market, apart from the difficulties superadded by industrial conditions.

The learned Judge has been careful to express his finding that none of the workmen was an "odd lot," in the sense that he was to be treated as totally incapacitated, unless the employer discharged the onus which in such cases lies upon him of proving that there was work available for the workman which the latter refused to accept and do. Not being "odd lots," and having been employed until their work ceased owing to supervening, that is to say economic, causes, the workmen must be considered as workmen capable of being employed under normal conditions. Indeed, of Lewis the learned Judge says : "He is now a partially disabled man : he is physically able to do the form of light work he has been doing—a well-known and necessary form of light work at a colliery—and, in my opinion, he is able to do other forms of light work necessary at a colliery. . . . Lewis is therefore a class of man who is able to do established forms of light employment, and, under ordinary industrial conditions, has a good market for his labour with his old employers ; but under exceptional industrial conditions he is apt to lose this market, and to find himself in the position that there is no other market for such established lines of work as he is able to do."

The case of Lewis must go back for reconsideration by the learned Judge, who must direct himself in accordance with what was said by the majority in Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (supra) and the other cases to which I have referred. Upon the facts found by him, Lewis is entitled to compensation for partial loss of capacity on the basis that he is still employable, even if at the present time it is not easy for him to find employment.

The other three cases are applications for review. These applications appear to be not unfounded, for there has been a change of circumstances since the weekly payments were awarded, or agreed to, within the wide interpretation of that phrase now permitted. See Macdonald or Duris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 431 ; [1912] A.C., 513), Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (supra), and McAlinden v. James Nimmo and Co., Limited ([1920] A.C., 39). I have some doubt whether there has been a change of circumstances in Ingram's case. But as I disagree with the basis of the learned Judge's judgment, which embraced all four cases, it will be better that Ingram's case should be reconsidered. It may be that there has not been any change of circumstances entitling Ingram to a review. That is a question of fact for the County Court Judge. His task in these cases, as in so very many cases under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, is not an easy one, but the cases to which I have referred, and particularly Gafney v. Chorley Colliery Company, Limited (supra) and Portland Colliery Company, Limited v. Murray (supra), mark out the lines that are to be followed.

The appeals will be allowed in all four cases, with costs, and the cases will be remitted to the learned Judge for reconsideration.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—These four cases raise the troublesome question of the amount of compensation to be paid to a man who has been physically injured so as to affect his earning capacity, and who is also affected by labour conditions reducing employment and, apart from any accident, affecting his earnings. The County Court Judge has refused all four applicants any compensation, and they appeal.

The cases are not made any easier by the way in which the County Court Judge has dealt with them. He has given a very long and careful judgment in the case of Lewis, and has added short passages dealing with the other three cases. But he has treated the case of Lewis entirely under the Act of 1906 and referred repeatedly to Rule 3 of Schedule I. of that Act as justifying his action. He has overlooked the fact that, as Lewis's accident happened in 1904, the Act of 1906 does not apply to it at all. The Act of 1897 is the relevant one ; and Schedule I., paragraph 2, of that Act is in quite different words from paragraph 3 of the Act of 1906, and in particular does not contain the words on which he relies in his judgment. These words were probably inserted in 1906 as a result of the judgment in James v. Ocean Coal Company (20 The Times L.R., 483 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 213) ; and decisions under the Act of 1906—see especially Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Company (28 The Times L.R., 27 ; [1912] 1 K.B., 63) and per Lord Dunedin in Woodilee Coal and Coke Company v. M'Neill (34 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1918] A.C., 43) —call pointed attention to the change of language. The result is that the whole of the principal judgment is based on the wrong Act. Its main conclusion is that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in the well-known case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 1,009), being inconsistent with two decisions of the House of Lords in 1917, namely, Heathcote v. Haunchwood Collieries, Limited ([1918] A.C., 52) and Woodilee's case (supra), is no longer law, and has not been law presumably since 1917. As the majority judgment in the Cardiff Corporation case (supra) was expressly approved by Lord Loreburn and Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496), and the case was not cited or referred to in the two cases in the House of Lords which are supposed to have made it "no longer law," and as it has been repeatedly followed and acted upon in the Court of Appeal since 1917, it seems to me it is hardly the function of a County Court Judge, or even of the Court of Appeal, to declare it no longer law. Further, in his exhaustive inquiry into the authority of the Cardiff Corporation case (supra), and incidentally into the validity of a decision of the Court of Appeal in Palmer v. Crawshay Brothers (Cyfarthfa), Limited (42 The Times L.R., 490), reversing a decision of his own, the County Court Judge seems to have omitted to consider a very important series of decisions of the Court of Appeal beginning with Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 290 ; [1913] 2 K.B., 158) and ending with the group of Scotch cases in the House of Lords, of which Portland Colliery Company, Limited v. Murray (39 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1923] A.C., 566) is the first, in which the effect of independent causes, each producing the same result, in whole or in part, is considered, with the result that an incapacity in fact from the accident is not rendered sterile of compensation by the fact that another independent cause would produce the same result. These deficiencies and errors in the judgment below excuse me from criticizing its argument closely, and I propose to deal with the matter independently.

The three applications to review must be decided under the Act of 1906 ; the original application of Lewis under the Act of 1897.

Under either Act it is necessary to appreciate the nature of the compensation to be awarded. As pointed out by Lord Justice Hamilton in Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Company, Limited (supra), it is not indemnity but a kind of insurance. The employer, who has to pay the workman something in respect of accidents for which he, the employer, is not blameable, has to pay an amount which does not represent the workman's loss, but only part of it, a part quantified by certain statutory rules, subject to some discretion in the arbitration. The workman has to bear part of his loss himself. If the compensation were indemnity, and there were no statutory rules, and the compensation were to be fixed from time to time, one would expect the assessment to proceed on these lines. An undamaged man can earn, say, 60s. a week ; this damaged man can by reason of his damage earn only 40s. a week ; his loss is 20s. a week. If conditions improved so that an uninjured man could earn 80s. a week, and this damaged man only 50s. a week, his loss would be 30s. a week. But the Act does not proceed on these lines. To deal only with partial incapacity, the matter involved in the present four cases, the weekly payment is (1) not to exceed 50 per cent. of the workman's average weekly earnings during the 12 months before the accident, (2) not to exceed £1, (3) not to exceed the difference between (a) the amount of the average weekly earnings before the accident, and (b) the average weekly amount which he is earning or able to earn in some suitable employment after the accident. The result is that, however much wages rise, he cannot get more than 50 per cent. of his pre-accident wage, and if wages rise so that as a damaged man he is making after the accident as much or more than as an undamaged man he was making before the accident, he can get nothing, although the damage from the accident is preventing him from earning considerable sums. The rise of wages relieves the employer from liability, and the fall of wages similarly may involve him in liability.

But the arbitrator, while he has regard to these maxima, under the Act of 1906 may, within them, vary the compensation, which "shall bear such relation to the amount of that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper." In particular the House of Lords has decided in the Woodilee case (supra) (a case of rise of wages), approving Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Company (supra) (a case of fall of wages), that the arbitrator, in fixing compensation, may have regard to the general rise and fall of wages. In Bevan's case (supra) the man earned before the accident 59s.; after the accident only 36s.; but if undamaged he would only have earned 40s. The Judge held that he was not entitled to consider the general change of wages and gave 11s. 6d., half 23s. (59s., less 36s.); the Court of Appeal said that he had ignored the direction to give effect to the circumstances of the case, and should have given 2s., being half the difference between undamaged wages 40s. and damaged wages 36s. Why half the difference was applied to this comparison is not clear, except in the view that the employer and the workman are each to bear half of the loss, and 4s. was the proved amount of loss attributable to the accident. But the real loss would be the difference between 36s. damaged wages and the amount that an undamaged man would then earn, though the third maximum prevented the whole of this amount from being given. This was approved by the House of Lords in the Woodilee case (supra). I do not think, however, that Sir H. Cozens-Hardy, Master of the Rolls, was completely accurate when he said (at p. 68) that if wages are going up that is a provision which may tend very much to the benefit of the workman. No doubt he gets more wages than he would otherwise, but he may get less or no compensation if his new damaged wages are raised to the level of his old undamaged wages. In the Woodilee case (supra), the workman's pre-accident wages were 40s.; his post-accident wages (damaged) were 27s. 6d.; but if he was undamaged his wages would be 55s. The difference between the actual pre-accident and post-accident wages was 12s. 6d., and the arbitrator, considering what the workman had actually lost, the difference between 55s. and 27s. 6d., gave him the whole statutory difference, 12s. 6d. This was approved by the House of Lords. On these lines the workman in Bevan's case (supra) should have had 4s., the difference between 36s. and 40s., not 2s., as awarded. These cases seem to decide that the arbitrator may consider the actual damage to the man by the accident, and may award him the actual amount of the damage, so far as he can do so without infringing the statutory maxima. In both these cases the workman was "earning." Heathcote's case (supra), the other case referred to by the County Court Judge, raised the question of "able to earn." There the workman earned before the accident 35s. a week. After the accident he was in fact earning 30s. a week as a carter, and the Judge made a finding, on the meaning of which the whole case turned, that, working in a suitable employment as a packer or loader as he might have done, he would have earned 7s. 5d. a day; "he can now earn 7s. 5d. a day." The majority of the Court of Appeal took the view that this was a finding of ability to earn at least 35s. a week, and that consequently there was no difference between pre-accident and post-accident wages, and therefore no compensation. I understand the House of Lords to have taken the view that, if this were the true meaning of the finding, the majority were right; but to have held that the real finding was that the man could not earn 7s. 5d. a day, and therefore was not "able to earn"; in which case I am sure the majority in the Court of Appeal would have decided the other way. I do not understand what this case has to do with the question before us, but I gather that the County Court Judge has taken the view that these cases enable him to say, however damaged the man is, and however much his damaged condition would affect his ability to earn wages as compared with sound men of his class, that if some other condition, such as labour difficulties or the state of trade, would also prevent him from earning wages, he can have no compensation. In other words, though owing to the accident he would not be able to earn wages, yet if another cause also would prevent him from earning wages, he cannot have compensation for his damaged and loss of wage-earning condition through the accident.

This brings me to the class of case which the Judge below seems not to have considered, the cases where loss of wages would follow from either of two independent causes, of which damage from the accident would be one. The principle is firmly established by the Court of Appeal decisions and can only be altered by the House of Lords.

They begin with Harwood's case (supra), where a workman was permanently incapacitated by an injury to his knee, and after being paid compensation for some time he was discovered to be also permanently incapacitated from work by heart disease not due to the accident. The County Court Judge decided that the employers need pay no compensation, and his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who gave the workman full compensation, as the accident prevented him from working. Lord Justice Hamilton put it on the ground that the Act does not say "results solely from the injury," and it would entitle the workman to compensation if the accident by itself would cause the loss, even though another cause had not had the same result. This case has been followed where the concurrent inability was from old age, Jamieson v. Fife Coal Company, Limited (40 Sc. L.R., 704); Stowell v. Ellerman Lines, Limited (128 L.T., 823), and in a case of independent affection of the eyes (Walker v. Cadzow Coal Company, [1925] W.C. and Ins. Rep., 156). It has also been followed with severe logic, where the workman was interned as an alien, Cargo Fleet Iron Company v. Funck (9 B.W.C.C., 318), and even where he was sent to prison, McNally v. Furness, Withy and Co., Limited (29 The Times L.R., 678; [1913] 3 K.B., 605). It may be permissible to doubt whether in the latter case the imprisonment might not have been treated as a self-imposed disability, as in the case where a workman unjustifiably refuses to work. A voluntary strike deprives the workman of compensation (Bromley and Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company, Limited, 129 L.T., 620), and the same result appears to have followed where, though the man was willing to work, a rule of his trade union prevented him (Thompson v. Richard Johnson and Nephew, Limited, [1914] 3 K.B., 694, and Williams v. Oakwood Colliery Company, 88 L.J., K.B., 878).

These latter cases appear to have been decided on the ground that the man could physically do the work and the reason why he did not was not the accident but the trade union action. He was "able to earn." Lastly, in the Scotch cases reported under the heading of Portland Colliery Company, Limited v. Murray (supra), the House of Lords gave the workman compensation to the extent of his physical incapacity, though there was also a heavy fall of wages due to economic causes which had the same result. A similar order was made by the English Court in Gaffney v. Chorley Colliery Company (92 L.J., K.B., 1). See also Bromley and Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company (supra). These cases appear to establish that, if a physical disability due to the accident would in the absence of any other cause effect a loss of wage-earning capacity, the fact that an independent cause would have the same result does not deprive the workman of compensation.

The case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339; [1911] 1 K.B., 1,009) has been obscured by the prominence given in subsequent cases to the observations contained therein about the effect of being an "odd lot," which, as the man in that case was held not to be an "odd lot," were all obiter dicta. The man was partially incapacitated by an accident, and 9s. 2d. compensation was paid to him. The corporation applied to review on the ground that his physical condition had improved. The Judge found that it had improved and that he was able to do any kind of light work, and that the improvement was a change of circumstances, and reduced the compensation to 8s. The workman proved that he had applied for some kinds of light work and could not get them. On these facts the Court were divided, Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., desiring to give the man compensation for total incapacity, because he could not get light work, and the other members of the Court holding that he was only entitled to compensation for the partial incapacity due to his injury, and, as he was fit for all kinds of light work, that if he could not get them the result was due not to the injury but to economic causes. They distinguished the case of a man so injured that he could never get employment in any circumstances, but only a compensation job from a compassionate employer, usually the employer liable to pay compensation. They labelled such a man "an odd lot," and said that in such a case, if an employer wished to avoid paying for total incapacity, he must prove that employment was available. In the three cases other than that of Lewis, the applicant must show a change of circumstances. If there is no change of circumstance in the sense explained by the House of Lords and referred to hereafter, the application is really an appeal from the original award and is therefore unjustified, Pope and Pearson, Limited v. Gamble (129 L.T., 684).

But the House of Lords has interpreted change of circumstance to include cases where, though there is no change in physical condition, subsequent events have rendered it possible to prove more clearly its effect on earning capacity. In M'Alinden v. James Nimmo and Co., Limited ([1920] A.C., 39) Lord Finlay said ([1920] A.C., at p. 42) that "the amount may be reviewed if there has either been a change of circumstances, or if further events have put a different complexion on the case"; in the case in question, if they had shown that the effect of the accident on wage-earning capacity was greater than had been supposed. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline said ([1920] A.C., at p. 44) "that there has been more light thrown by the applicant upon the results of his injury and upon the effects on the labour market which the having of such an injury causes to him." In Macdonald or Duris v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company (28 The Times L.R., 431; [1912] A.C., 513) there was no change in the condition of the workman, but his employers were reducing their staff for business reasons, and he could not get other suitable employment, and the House of Lords held, reversing the Courts below, that this gave rise to a claim to review. The decisions under the title of Portland Colliery Company, Limited v. Murray (supra) are to the same effect.

These being the principles to be applied, the facts in the three review cases are as follow (His Lordship stated them, and continued):—

No doubt the state of facts found by the Judge that men, not odd lots, because they are capable of any kind of light work, are yet only likely to get work from their old employers, because each employer keeps his compensation jobs for his own compensation men, deserves careful consideration, and it will be very useful if a superior tribunal, considering its own decisions and those of the Court of Appeal, can throw any light on the matter. Similarly the practice by which, when ordinary labour strikes, the light-job men, who used to come out on strike till they found that they lost compensation by doing so, have changed their course of action and stay in and demand work with the more readiness because they know there would be none for them, and then claim compensation for total incapacity, also requires consideration.

In my opinion all the appeals should be allowed with costs and the cases remitted to the Judge to assess partial compensation on the lines above laid down.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS stated that LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE, having read the judgments just delivered, expressed his full concurrence with them.

K.B. Div. (Avory, Swift, and Talbot, JJ.) 1927. Apr. 7.

REX v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE—EX PARTE PEGLER.*

Intoxicating Liquors—Tied house—Increase of duty—Apportionment by Commissioners of Customs and Excise—Tenancy entered into after the Act—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), s. 46.

Section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which provides for the apportionment between landlords and tenants of "tied" houses of the increased licence duties imposed by that Act, does not apply to tenancies entered into after the Act came into force.

So held by Avory and Talbot, JJ. (Swift, J., dissenting).

This was a rule nisi for a mandamus directed to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise at the instance of Mr. Frederick Pegler, the licensee of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, commanding them to hear and determine, pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, an application by Mr. Pegler to determine the proportion of the increased duty payable in respect of his licence, occasioned by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, upon the grounds (1) that the Commissioners were bound to determine his application under section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910; (2) that that section was not limited to such licences or licence-holders as existed at the date when the Act came into operation; (3) that the section applied whenever there was an agreement as mentioned in the section, whether the agreement was made before or after the date when the Act came into operation.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910:—

"Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons, the licence holder shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from or deduct from any sum due to any such person so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid."

Mr. Pegler originally became tenant of the City Arms from Messrs. Arnold, Perrett, and Co., Limited, under a lease dated August 31, 1911, containing a covenant by the tenant to pay

"all rates, tithes, taxes, charges, assessments, duties, and outgoings whatsoever, whether Parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed, charged, or imposed upon the said demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof, the landlords' property tax alone excepted."

There was also a covenant to purchase all liquor from the landlords. The lease was renewed to Mr. Pegler on April 15, 1912; to Mr. Pegler and his wife (owing to his war service) on November 4, 1916; and to Mr. Pegler on March 5, 1920, that being the subsisting lease and containing the same material covenants as the original lease.

The landlords' business was acquired in 1924 by the Cheltenham Original Brewery Company, Limited, who were now the landlords.

On April 28, 1926, Mr. Pegler, by his solicitors, applied to the Commissioners to determine the proportion of the increased licence duty payable under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The Commissioners declined to do so on the ground that the section only applied to agreements in existence at the date of the passing of the Act. Mr. Pegler then obtained the present rule.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Commissioners; Mr. Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., appeared for the landlords; Mr. Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Roland Burrows supported the rule.

Mr. Justice Swift.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of the Court, and I need hardly, under these circumstances, say with what diffidence I express my own opinion; but I hold a strong view upon this matter and I think it my duty to give my reasons for coming to the conclusion at which I have arrived.

In this case Mr. Frederick Pegler, the licensee of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, has obtained a rule calling upon the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to hear and determine pursuant to the statutes in that behalf the matter of an application by him to determine the proportion of the increased duty payable in respect of his licence of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, occasioned by section 43 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

The facts are that on August 31, 1911, Messrs. Arnold, Perrett, and Co., Limited, granted a lease to Mr. Pegler of the publichouse, the City Arms Inn, Bell-lane, Gloucester, for 12 months from September 29, 1911, and thereafter from year to year, at a yearly rental of £40 "to be paid without any deduction except for landlords' property tax by equal quarterly payments." Such lease contained covenants by the tenant (a) "to pay unto the landlords the yearly rent hereinbefore reserved at the times and in the manner aforesaid without any deduction (except as aforesaid) and will also at all times during the said tenancy pay and discharge all rates tithes taxes charges assessments duties and outgoings whatsoever whether Parliamentary parochial local or of any other description which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed charged or imposed upon the said demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof the landlords' property tax alone excepted"; and (b) "that the tenant will deal exclusively and directly with the landlords or their successors in business or nominees for any wines spirits cordials liqueurs ales beers porter and cider whether in cask or in bottle cigars and all mineral or aerated waters which he may require for sale under the licence or licences attached to or to be held in respect of the said demised premises or under any occasional licence granted to him for sale elsewhere than upon the said demised premises the purpose and intent being that the draught ales stout and aerated waters sold by the tenant shall be such as are brewed or manufactured by the said landlords and that the wines and spirits cordials liqueurs and other goods shall be of such description and quality as is usually supplied by the landlords to their tied tenants and that in all cases the landlords shall be at liberty if they think fit to select the same; and will not on any pretence whatever (unless the landlords shall give express consent in writing) purchase take in or receive or have in his possession or directly or indirectly sell or dispose of or permit the sale or disposal of or the consumption either upon or off the said premises of any such articles other than such as shall have been purchased from or taken of the landlords or their successors in business or nominees; and further that if and whenever the tenant shall commit any breach of this clause he shall forfeit and pay to the landlords the sum of £20 recoverable for every such breach as and for liquidated damages and not in the nature of a penalty."

That lease was replaced by others, one of March 5, 1920, now being in force, which contains the same covenants. The reversion was assigned to the Cheltenham Original Brewery Company, Limited.

On April 29, 1910, before the granting of the first lease, the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, came into force. Part II. of that Act deals with duties on liquor licences, and section 43 fixes the duties of excise to be charged, levied, and paid for liquor licences according to a scale set out in the first Schedule to the Act.

The effect of that Act was to increase the amount of duty payable in respect of liquor licences, and to prevent that increase falling unfairly section 46 provided for its distribution in certain cases amongst the parties interested in the trade done under the licence. That section provides : " Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons, the licence holder shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from or deduct from any sum due to any such person so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid."

From 1911 to 1926 Mr. Pegler paid the whole of the excise licence duty, receiving no part of it back from his landlords. Up to 1917 he appears to have been under the impression, now apparently agreed to be erroneous, that he was receiving back a portion of the increase imposed by the Act of 1910 ; but from 1917 on he certainly had no such impression. From then until 1926 he apparently from time to time discussed the matter with his landlords' agents ; but until April 28, 1926, he took no steps to enforce his rights, if any, in the matter.

On April 28, 1926, his solicitors wrote to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, Lower Thames-street, London. This is the letter : " We are instructed by a client to apply to you under section 46 of the Finance Act, 1910, to determine the proportion of the licence to be payable by him and the proportion to be paid by the brewers. We shall be glad if you will kindly let us have the necessary forms for the application together with information as to the procedure before you.—Yours faithfully, Lane, Martin and Co."

In reply to that letter they received a communication from the Surveyor of Taxes at Gloucester on May 15, 1926, who said : " Your letter of April 28 last with reference to the determination of the amount of licence duty payable under section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, by a client of yours, addressed to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, has been referred to me with directions to report the facts. In these circumstances please submit the full particulars of this case, with any representation you have to make, through me. I might mention that this section 46 does not apply to cases in which an agreement has been entered into after the passing of the Act."

In reply to that letter, Messrs. Lane, Martin and Co. wrote, on May 17, 1926, fully setting out the facts, and they received a reply dated May 18, from the Surveyor at Gloucester, saying : " I am in receipt of your communication of the 17th inst. respecting the licence of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, which I am forwarding to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. The view already communicated to you that section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, does not apply to cases in which an agreement has been entered into after the passing of the Act is the opinion of the Commissioners as advised by their solicitors. My personal opinion may not be of much value, but it seems to me this section deals solely with existing licensees whose licence duty was increased by the Act. Persons becoming licence holders after the passing of the Act would be presumed to know the amount of licence duty payable in respect of the licensed premises, and their agreements would be based accordingly, and the question of increase in licence duty would not arise. There has been in fact no increase in licence duty so far as your client is concerned, as the rates have not been altered since he became the licence holder of the City Arms."

Messrs. Lane, Martin and Co. replied to that letter—I do not need to read it—and on June 14 they received a letter from the Commissioners of Customs and Excise stating : " The Commissioners of Customs and Excise have had under consideration the correspondence which has passed between yourselves and their Surveyor at Gloucester, relative to the construction applied to section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and they can only say that, while the point in question has not been subject to a decision of the High Court, they have been advised that the section does not apply to cases in which an agreement has been entered into since the passing of the Act."

This correspondence, in my opinion, amounts to a refusal by the Commissioners to determine how much of any increase in the duty payable in respect of the licence the applicant may, in accordance with the provisions of section 46, recover or deduct ; and it is with a view to obtaining an order that they shall so determine that this application has been made.

To the application for a writ of mandamus two answers are made : first, that on the facts of this particular case there is no duty imposed upon the Commissioners by section 46 ; and, secondly, that even if there were, the discretionary writ should not issue, having regard to the facts of this case.

With regard to the second of these points, it was contended on behalf of the respondents that there had been great delay in making the application to the Commissioners, and that the application, when made, was too vague and indefinite to amount to a request to determine.

As to this point, Mr. Birkett, for the applicant, made it clear that he only asks the Commissioners to determine the apportionment as for the year 1926. They could have no difficulty in doing that. The duty of the Commissioners did not arise, if at all, until the request from the solicitors in their letter of April 28, 1926, and from that date there has certainly been no undue delay in applying for the writ ; and looking at the correspondence, I am personally satisfied that the Commissioners knew quite well, or might have known quite well, what they were requested to do, but that they, acting perfectly properly upon advice, thought that they had no duty in the matter and pursued in this case the policy set out in paragraph 6 of the affidavit sworn in these proceedings by Mr. Bertenshaw, their assistant secretary, in which he says : " Since the passing of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the said Commissioners have consistently and steadfastly refused to determine under section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, between any licence holder and his landlord the proportion recoverable by the licence holder of any increase in licence duty occasioned by the said Act in cases where the licence holder holds the premises under a lease or agreement made after the passing of the said Act."

I think, therefore, that upon this point the respondents fail and that the real point to be decided is the first one—namely, does section 46 apply where the agreement is entered into after the passing of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 ? If it does, the Commissioners are under a duty to determine ; they have declined to do so, and the rule should be made absolute. If it does not, they are under no such duty, and in declining to consider the matter they have done nothing improper, and the rule should be discharged.

In determining whether or not an agreement made after the passing of the Act is outside the scope of section 46, the words of that section are, I think, the only matters which can properly be considered. We have to ascertain the intention of the Legislature in regard to the matter, but we have to ascertain that intention from the language used. As Lord Haldane said in the case of Watney, Combe, Reid and Co. v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449; [1915] A.C., 885, at page 891), "The intention must be found in the language finally adopted in the statutes under construction, and in that language alone. No doubt general words may in certain cases properly be interpreted as having a meaning or scope other than the literal or usual meaning. They may be so interpreted where the scheme appearing from the language of the Legislature, read in its entirety, points to consistency as requiring the modification of what would be the meaning apart from any context, or apart from the purpose of the legislation as appearing from the words which the Legislature has used, or apart from the general law. In the statutes before us Parliament has thought fit, in the first place, by section 46 of the Act of 1910, to enable the licence holder of a house in respect of which a tie exists to claim over for a deduction against the person entitled to the benefit of the tie."

Considering the language of this section, I find nothing to limit its operation to agreements made before the Act was passed. It says: "Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons." I read these words to mean no more and no less than this: where a person is a tied tenant or the tied occupant of a house, not necessarily tied to his landlord, but where he is under some obligation to take his liquor from a particular person, then the section becomes operative.

Now here we have clearly got a tied tenant; the covenant that I have read from the lease in explicit terms binds him to take the whole of his intoxicating liquor, and indeed the whole of the liquor of any sort which he sells upon the premises, from his landlords. It seems to me to come expressly within the first four lines of the section, and he being a tied tenant, the section goes on to provide that he, being the licence holder, shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt or deduct from any sum due from him to the person to whom he is tied a proportion of the increase, a proportion which either may be agreed upon between the parties or in default of agreement shall be fixed by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Now it appears to me that if the respondents' contention is right in this case, it is necessary to read into that section some words which are not there; some words such as "Where the licence holder is at the time of the passing of this Act bound by any covenant"—that is to say, to read into the words of the description of the person who shall be entitled to recover a portion of the increased duty the words "who shall be a tied tenant at the time of the passing of this Act and he shall not be entitled to relief unless he is a tied tenant at that time"; or, if the words are not read in there, then in order to support the Solicitor-General's contention they must be read in after the word "agreement"; and then it would read: "A licence holder shall be entitled notwithstanding any agreement made before the passing of this Act to the contrary." But the Legislature has not inserted these words, and I find no warrant for adding such words. If the Legislature had wished to do so, nothing could have been more simple than to have put them in. In the Finance Act of 1912, dealing not with the case of the tied tenant but with the different case of the holder of a lease who was not tied, and desiring to grant relief to such persons, the Legislature gave a measure of relief to them, but it expressly limited it to those leases which were in existence in the year 1910, and the fact that in this section 46 it leaves it at large seems to me to show that there was no intention on the part of the Legislature to limit the person who holds the licence on an agreement under which he buys the liquor to any particular date or to the date at which the Act was passed.

Section 2 of the Act of 1912 is relied upon as showing that Parliament thought that section 46 only applied to agreements made before 1910. I cannot think so. It shows that when dealing with non-tied houses Parliament thought it proper to relieve only those which had leases before 1910. To my mind it shows nothing as to what they meant to do in 1910 with quite a different class of tenant, with whom they were dealing in quite a different way. If agreements made with tied tenants after 1910 are excluded from the operation of section 46, the design of the Legislature could be easily defeated. Tied tenants, in the vast majority of cases, are tenants on short leases, and there would be nothing easier, when the Act of 1910 passed, than for brewers to have given tied tenants all over the country notice to quit their tenancy and require a new agreement to be made which would have excluded them from the benefit of the relieving provisions of section 46.

I think that section 46 means what it says, and that a tied tenant is entitled to the relief it gives "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary," the word "any" applying as much to the date as to the form, consideration, duration, or other incidents of the agreement.

I am to some extent fortified in my view by the facts in the case of Watney, Combe, Reid and Co. v. Berners (supra). I am far from saying that the speech of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords is a binding authority upon me, because I do not for a moment suggest that it was intended to decide this point. But it is helpful to me to realize that the exact point, so far as the facts could raise it, was raised by the statement of facts by the Lord Chancellor. In that case "The publichouse was, by an agreement dated January 4, 1911, sublet by the appellants to one Saile at a slightly increased rent. Saile agreed to purchase the liquor he required for his business as a publican from the appellants, so that the house which in their hands was free became as between them and him a tied house. Saile holds the licence. The duty payable by the licensee was, prior to the Finance Act of 1910, £30. It is now £64." Then the Lord Chancellor says this: "Under section 46 of the Act of 1910, Saile, being bound by the tie to the appellants as to supply of liquor, could recover from them so much of the increase of his licence duty as was proportionate to the increased rent of the licensed premises, or the increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or any other benefit obtained by them from the tie. No question arises as to the appellants' liability under that section to their sub-tenant, Saile."

No question arose, and therefore I do not for a moment suggest that the Lord Chancellor was deciding the question, but it is helpful to me to know that he dealt with facts similar to those I am now discussing, and I cannot conceive that it would not have been present to his mind, if there had been any substance in it, that Saile in fact was not entitled to the benefit of section 46 because the agreement which he entered into was after the passing of the Act of 1910.

For these reasons I think the Commissioners were wrong when they declined to determine the proportion in this case because the agreement between Pegler and his landlord was made after the passing of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910; and, in my opinion, this rule should be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—In this case a rule was obtained by Frederick Pegler for a mandamus to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise calling upon them to show cause why they should not be commanded by mandamus to hear and determine the matter of an application by him to determine the proportion of the increased duty payable in respect of his licence of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, occasioned by section 43 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

The Act of 1910 brought into operation a new schedule of duties of excise licences for the sale of liquor, involving in many, if not all, cases substantial increases. By section 46 a licence holder bound by what is commonly called a tie, who is entitled to the benefit of the section, is given a right to recover, either by action or deduction, a proportion of any increase of the licence duty occasioned by the Act, from the person to whom he is tied—that is, the person from whom he is bound by any obligation, direct or indirect, to buy liquor.

Mr. Pegler is, and has been, either alone or with his wife, since August, 1911, the licence holder in respect of the City Arms, Gloucester. He, or he and his wife, have held the house under four successive leases from the brewers, the first of which is dated August, 1911, each of which binds the lessee to buy liquor from the lessors.

The Commissioners have intimated to Mr. Pegler that they have no power to make an apportionment under the section, inasmuch as he was not bound by a tying obligation when the Act came into operation in April, 1910; and the question is whether this is right. I assume that there has been a sufficient application and refusal to justify a mandamus if the refusal is wrongful.

In my opinion, though I recognize that the point is one of considerable difficulty, the Commissioners are right. The question depends on the first words of section 46. The words "is bound" are words ambiguous, capable of meaning "is hereafter bound," or "is bound now," that is, at the passing of this Act, as the Commissioners contend, or "is bound now or at any future time," as the prosecutor contends. Which meaning is right is to be determined by the context and by the opinion to be derived from a perusal of the Act as to the scope and object of the section. The object appears to me to be to protect a licence holder who has made a contract with his landlord as to rent, and as to the terms on which he is to buy liquor from him, on the footing of having to pay licence duty of a certain amount, from having an increased duty put upon him while he remains bound by the terms of his agreement.

Parliament appears to have thought that the lessor who benefited by the fact of his tenant being also his customer for the liquor, or that a person from whom the licence holder was bound to buy liquor, ought in fairness to bear part of the increased cost of the licence which enabled the tenant to sell, and therefore to buy, the liquor. I see no reason, other than the fact that the tenant is bound by a lease made before the increase, for making the lessor share the increase and not the whole of the licence duty; but as to any contract entered into after the passing of the Act I see no ground for making the landlord bear a share of the increase which would not equally justify making him share the whole. It is not to be presumed that the lessor and lessee, when they know the amount of duty, are not capable of making or have not made a fair bargain.

The design of the section is to prevent one party only from being burdened by a new impost which neither party could foresee and with reference to which they did not contract. I think the words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" refer primarily, I do not say exclusively, to the ordinary lessee's covenant to pay the licence duty, which appears in the leases of these premises.

The opinion which I have formed from a consideration of section 46 gets some support from the language of section 2 of the Finance Act, 1912, since repealed. That section gave similar, though not identical, protection to lessees of licensed premises which are not tied, and it did so only in the case of premises held under leases or agreements made before the passing of the Act of 1910. No satisfactory reason for this has been suggested other than that Parliament, believing that section 46 of the Act of 1910 related only to licence holders bound by tying agreements in force at the passing of that Act, intended to put lessees of free houses, who were equally caught, if I may so put it, by the increased taxation of 1910, under like protection.

I feel, I need scarcely say, the force of the argument that the insertion of a very few words would have put what I conceive to have been the intention of Parliament beyond a doubt; but after all, this is not the only statute of which the language is ambiguous, and in all such cases the Court is obliged to interpret the words by what appears to be the reason and purpose of the enactment. Moreover, it is for the party who claims the benefit of the section to show that he comes within its terms.

I do not think that the case of Wooler v. North Eastern Breweries (26 The Times L.R., 129; [1910] 1 K.B., 247) has any real bearing on the case before us. That was a case on the construction of section 3, subsection 3, of the Licensing Act, 1904, relating to the compensation charge imposed by that Act. The subsection is as follows: "Such deductions from rent as are set out in the Second Schedule to this Act may, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, be made by any licence holder who pays a charge under this section and also by any person from whose rent a deduction is made in respect of the payment of such a charge." The decision was that the words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" covered agreements whether made before or after the passing of the Act. It was quite clear there that any person who at any time made the payment mentioned was entitled to make the deduction; and the words preventing the defeat of this protection by agreement were held to operate so long as this protection itself endured.

The question which we have to decide, which is not as to the meaning of the same words, "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary," in section 46 of the Act of 1910, but of earlier words by which the whole operation of the section is governed, is obviously quite different.

In the circumstances it is not necessary to refer to the other points raised. Upon the ground which I have stated I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—The question to be determined in this case is whether section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, is to be construed as applying only to licence holders who, at the time of the coming into operation of that Act, were under agreement or obligation to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person, usually called tied tenants, or whether it applies to licence holders who thereafter come under such an obligation.

It appears by the correspondence exhibited that the Commissioners of Customs and Excise have, since the passing of the Act, consistently acted on the view that the section does not apply to licence holders who thereafter enter into such agreement or obligation, and that view has not hitherto been challenged. This is not in any sense conclusive ; as Mr. Birkett has reminded us, something more than courage is required to litigate a new question of law with a Government Department.

I do not think that we derive any assistance from the decision in the cases which were quoted of Wooler v. North Eastern Breweries (26 The Times L.R., 129 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 247) and Watney, Combe, Reid and Co. v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449 ; [1915] A.C., 885). In the former case the words in the Act, "any licence holder who pays a charge under the section," clearly referred to the future ; and in the latter case the point now in question under section 46 was not in issue.

It must be admitted, I think, that the initial words of section 46, "Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant," &c., are capable of either construction ; but having regard to the context and the circumstances in which the Act was passed, I have come to the conclusion that the intention of the Legislature was to give relief to a licence holder who is called upon under the Act to pay an increased duty beyond that which he had paid before the Act, and that the words "as may be agreed upon" contemplate a tenancy agreement prior to the Act, because it may be assumed that any tenant who becomes such after the Act, knowing the amount of duty which will have to be paid, will make terms accordingly with his landlord.

This view is, I think, confirmed by reference to section 2 of the Finance Act, 1912, which appears to me to have been intended to put the free tenant on the same footing with regard to the duty as the tied tenant had been put in the Act of 1910. The fact that the Act of 1912 was repealed by section 18 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, does not, in my opinion, affect the construction of it.

It is also, I think, worthy of observation that section 47 of the Act of 1910, which empowers the Commissioners to allow a reduction from the duty in cases where a capital sum has been paid for monopoly value on the grant of a new on-licence, apparently applies only to cases which have arisen before the Act. The words in that section, "Where a capital sum has been paid," in my view clearly refer to cases where a new on-licence has been granted and a monopoly value fixed before the Act came into operation.

Further, I think that the observations of Baron Parke in the case of In re Knight (1 Ex., 802), observations which are quoted in the case of Wooler v. North Eastern Breweries (supra), although under a different statute, are applicable here and afford support to the view which I have expressed on the construction of section 46. In that case of In re Knight (supra) Baron Parke was dealing with a statute which provided for the rebuilding of a church and empowering trustees to levy rates upon all houses in the parish, one half to be paid by the landlord and the other half by the tenant, and providing that the tenant was to pay the whole rate in the first instance and to take a moiety out of the rent, the landlord being required to allow such deduction notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary. Baron Parke said: "The words in the local Act may be reasonably construed to mean notwithstanding any agreement subsisting between the parties at the time of the passing of that Act. The parties could not foresee that the expense of building a church would be imposed upon the parish. But if the agreement is made after the passing of the Act then the party who enters into the agreement has no good ground for not paying these expenses." These observations appear to me to apply to this case, to the case of a tenant who has entered into an agreement before the passing of the Act.

For these reasons I think the rule should be discharged ; and having come to that conclusion upon the main question, I need not consider whether there was in this case any demand made upon the Commissioners of Customs and Excise sufficiently explicit to found this application ; nor is it necessary to consider whether the delay which has undoubtedly taken place since the year 1917 would have been fatal to it.

I agree with my brother Talbot, therefore, that the rule should be discharged.

Trustees—Profit from trust—Rule prohibiting—Valuation of estate — Work performed by trustee's employers — Resulting profit to trustee.

The defendant, who was in the employment of a firm of stockbrokers, on the terms of half-commission for work introduced, was one of the two trustees of a will, and on the death of the testator these stockbrokers were employed, at the suggestion of the defendant, to value the testator's securities, and they paid to the defendant half the fees so earned by them, the defendant not taking, however, any part in the work or in fixing the fees. In an action against the defendant by the other trustee to make the defendant accountable to the trust estate for the money so received,

Held, that as the defendant, though he honestly believed himself to be entitled to do what he had done, had increased his remuneration by virtue of his trusteeship, the rule that a trustee may not make any profit out of his trust applied to the case, and the action succeeded.

HIS LORDSHIP delivered judgment in favour of the plaintiff in this action brought by Mr. Coventry

* Reported by J. B. B. MACMAHON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Williams, one of the two trustees of the will of the late Sir John Roper Parkington, against his co-trustee, Mr. George Henry Barton, by which it was sought to make the latter accountable to the trust estate for moneys received by him from a firm of stockbrokers. The basis of the claim was that in retaining such moneys the defendant was making a profit out of his trusteeship.

Although holding that the defendant was accountable, MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL said that it was conceded that the defendant was not guilty of any moral obloquy, and that he had done nothing which he did not honestly believe he was entitled to do.

Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. R. M. Pattisson appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. F. McMullan for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL, in the course of his considered judgment, said:—The defendant was formerly a stockbroker, but ceased to be a member of the Stock Exchange in 1919. In 1920 he entered the employ of a firm of stockbrokers, George Burnand and Co., and has continued in such employment to the present time. The terms of his employment are that, on his side, he is bound to give the firm his services in connexion with Bank of England transfer work; on the firm's side, they agree to pay him half the commission earned by the firm on all such work introduced by him to the firm as the firm is willing to carry out.

On the death of the testator, Sir John Roper Parkington, in 1924, it became necessary to have his securities valued, and it was at first proposed to employ for this purpose a firm of stockbrokers who had usually acted for the testator, but, as I gather from the correspondence, at the instigation of the defendant George Burnand and Co. were in fact employed to do the work. On the subsequent death of the tenant for life a similar valuation became necessary and was in fact done by George Burnand and Co.

For the work so done the stockbrokers charged fees which were paid to them out of the testator's estate, and, in accordance with their contract with the defendant, they paid over to him one-half of the fees so earned and paid to them. The defendant took no part in making the valuations or in fixing the fees to be charged. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the moneys so paid over to the defendant and any half-commission which may have been paid to him in respect of sales and purchases of trust investments must be paid to the estate.

It is a well-established and salutary rule of Equity that a trustee may not make a profit out of his trust. A person who has the management of property as a trustee is not permitted to gain any profit by availing himself of his position, and he will be a constructive trustee of any such profit for the benefit of the persons entitled to the property. On the same principle a trustee has no right to charge for his time and trouble. The rule is thus stated in Bray v. Ford (12 The Times L.R., 119; [1896] A.C., 44, at p. 51):—

"It is an inflexible rule of a Court of Equity that a person in a fiduciary position . . . is not, unless otherwise expressly provided, entitled to make a profit; he is not allowed to put himself in a position where his interest and duty conflict."

It was argued for the defendant that the case was altogether outside that rule of Equity because the sums received by the defendant were merely parts of his salary paid to him by his employers under the contract of service and were not of a character for which he was liable to account.

The point is not an easy one, and there is little, if any, authority to assist in its determination. The situation is an unusual one and the contract of service presents the following peculiar features. The remuneration has no relation to the services which the defendant has to render to his employers. The defendant, while bound to render the services, might get no remuneration at all if he introduced no work or introduced none which was acceptable to his employers. The amount of his remuneration depends (subject to his employers' acceptance of orders) upon his own efforts, but upon efforts not in relation to the work which he is engaged to do. Any increase of his remuneration rests with him.

From this it seems to me evident that the case falls within the mischief which is sought to be prevented by the rule. The case is clearly one where his duty as trustee and his interest in an increased remuneration are in direct conflict. As a trustee it is his duty to give the estate the benefit of his unfettered advice in choosing the stockbrokers to act for the estate; as the recipient of half the fees to be earned by George Burnand and Co. on work introduced by him his obvious interest is to choose or recommend them for the job.

In the event that has happened they have been chosen, and chosen because the defendant was a trustee, with the result that half of what the estate pays must necessarily pass through them to the defendant as part of his remuneration for other services rendered, but as an addition to the remuneration which he would otherwise have received for these self-same services. The services rendered remain unchanged, but the remuneration for them has been increased. He has increased his remuneration by virtue of his trusteeship. In my opinion this increase of remuneration is a profit made by the defendant out of and by reason of his trusteeship, which he would not have made but for his position as trustee.

Much reliance was properly placed on the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Dover Coalfield Extension Limited (24 The Times L.R., 52; [1908] 1 Ch., 65), but that case seems to me very different. At the request of the Dover Company Mr. Cousins had entered into a contract with the Kent Company to serve them as a director, the Kent Company paying him remuneration for his services. The necessary qualification shares were provided by the Dover Company, and in respect of these shares he became a trustee for the Dover Company. He had not, however, used his position as a trustee for the purpose of acquiring his directorship. He had, in fact, been appointed a director before he became a trustee of the shares. The profit which he gained was not procured by him by the use of his position as trustee, but was a profit earned by reason of work which he did for the Kent Company and which would not have been earned by him had he not been willing to do the work for which it was the remuneration. It was not (as in the present case) a profit acquired solely by reason of his use of his position as trustee and a profit in respect of which no extra services were rendered.

The plaintiff is entitled to the declaration asked for. If necessary, an inquiry must be directed, but if the amount can be agreed it may be inserted in the order and an order made for the payment of the agreed amount.

DE VRIES v. SPARKS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Agreement to surrender—Whether a notice to quit—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 4.

An agreement made by a tenant with his landlord for good consideration to give up possession cannot constitute a notice to quit within s. 5 (1) (c) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (as substituted for the original section by s. 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923), so as to entitle a landlord, who on the strength of the agreement has contracted to sell the premises, to recover possession of the same.

This was the defendant's appeal from the Brentford County Court.

The defendant, Mrs. Mary Sparks, had for many years occupied a dwelling-house, No. 38, Dale-street, Chiswick, upon a weekly tenancy. In May, 1926, her husband and one of her sons died and she then became minded to leave the house. She wrote a letter in which she stated that she would give up possession in or about September, 1926, and the landlord, Mr. Ysbrand De Vries, then agreed to give her £30, £10 to be paid forthwith and £20 upon her giving up possession. He told her that she might occupy the house rent free in the meantime. The £10 was paid and the defendant signed a receipt in the following terms :—

"May 31st, 1926.

"Received £10, on account of £30 for giving up possession of 38, Dale-street, Chiswick, on or before September 25, 1926.—M. SPARKS."

The landlord thereupon contracted to sell the house. The defendant subsequently changed her mind and refused to give up possession. The landlord brought an action to recover possession and the defendant relied upon the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts.

The county court Judge held that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby the defendant undertook to give up possession on or before September 25, 1926, although inoperative to deprive the defendant of any of her rights under the Rent Restriction Acts, was nevertheless operative as a notice to quit ; that in consequence of such notice the plaintiff had contracted to sell the premises ; and that he would be seriously prejudiced within the meaning of section 4 (1) (c) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, if he could not obtain possession. The county court Judge accordingly made an order for possession.

The defendant (the tenant) appealed.

Mr. C. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. H. S. Schultess-Young appeared for the appellant ; Mr. W. E. P. Done for the respondent.

Mr. DOUGHTY submitted that there had been no notice to quit given by the defendant. The document of May 31, 1926, was nothing more than an agreement between the parties. It could not be regarded as a notice to quit because it was not certain, in that there was no date fixed for the determination of the tenancy. He referred to Barton v. Fincham (37 The Times L.R., 386 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 291) and Standingford v. Bruce (42 The Times L.R., 122 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 466).

Mr. DONE contended that there had been a valid notice to quit. There had been a definite indication by the tenant of her intention that the tenancy should expire on September 25, 1926, accompanied by a permission from the landlord that she could leave on an earlier date if she wished. In Gilbert v. Jordan ([1920] W.N., 309) a notice of an intention to quit resulting in an agreement between landlord and tenant had been held to be equivalent to a notice to quit.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER, in giving judgment, said that the question for the determination of the Court was whether there was before the county court Judge any evidence on which he could rightly find that the tenant had given notice to quit. It was plain that under section 4 (1) (c) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, the notice to quit might be either a notice by a common law tenant given while the common law tenancy still subsisted, or a notice by a statutory tenant given after the relation of the parties had become statutory.

It was not necessary to consider the kind of notice to quit that had to be given by a statutory tenant, because here the tenant, if she gave a notice to quit at all, gave it while she was still a common law tenant. A notice to quit within the meaning of section 4 (1) (c) was one that would be valid at common law and one which would have the effect of determining an existing common law tenancy against the will of the landlord.

In the first place, there did not appear to have been a notice to quit at all, but merely an agreement between the parties that the subsisting common law tenancy should determine, at the latest, on September 25, 1926. A notice to quit and an agreement to surrender or determine a tenancy were essentially different in their nature. An agreement depended on the consent of the parties, while a notice to quit was a notice given by one party to the other of an intention to exercise a right given by the contract, whether the other party liked it or not.

The case of Gilbert v. Jordan ([1920] W.N. 309) was very briefly reported. It was true that when the facts were looked at reliance had been placed on circumstances which somewhat resembled an agreement to determine the tenancy on a certain date. Lord Trevethin, then Mr. Justice A. T. Lawrence, however, did not treat those circumstances as constituting an agreement, but as a notice to quit. That might have been an inaccurate view of the facts, but it was far from laying down the proposition that an agreement between the parties could of itself constitute a notice to quit.

Further, if the agreement in the present case was to be regarded as a notice to quit, it was invalid for two reasons—first, because the notice was not one to determine the tenancy on any fixed date, the words used being merely "on or before September 25" ; and secondly, because there was no evidence to show that the notice expired on the day of the week on which the tenancy began.

For those reasons the county court Judge had been in error in law, and the appeal must succeed.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON concurred.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) } 1927. Apr. 8.

B. LIGGETT (LIVERPOOL), LIMITED v. BARCLAYS BANK, LIMITED.*

Bankers—Cheques—Company's cheques to be signed by two directors—Payment of cheques not so signed—Negligence—Trade creditors of company—Equity for bank to stand in place of creditors.

The defendant bank negligently and in breach of the instructions given by their customer, the plaintiff company, paid cheques drawn on the company's account signed by one director only. All the cheques were paid to the company's trade creditors.

Held, (1) that the bank being put on inquiry and being negligent (as the jury found) were not entitled to rely on the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 E. and B., 327) and assume that a signature purporting to be that of a new director was that of a person duly appointed ; (2) that whether the plaintiff company's account was in credit or in debit at the time of the payments to trade creditors the bank were, on the equitable doctrine under which a person who has in fact paid the debts of another without authority is allowed to take advantage of his payment, entitled to credit for the cheques paid in discharge of the debts of the plaintiff company.

An inquiry was ordered into the circumstances of payment of each cheque.

This was the further consideration of an action tried at Liverpool Assizes before Mr. Justice Wright and a special jury. The facts appear from the judgment.

Sir Walter Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. N. B. Goldie appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. J. E. Singleton, K.C., Mr. Wooll and Mr. Moelwyn Hughes for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Wright.—This case comes before me on further consideration. I tried it with a special jury at the last Liverpool Assizes and the jury gave certain findings of fact. The question I have to determine now is, What is the result which follows from the facts before me and which flows from the findings of the special jury ?

The action was brought by B. Liggett (Liverpool), Limited, against Barclays Bank. It is a company which was registered on October 4, 1923, and which was formed to carry on the business of retail provision merchants in Liverpool. The business had been carried on by Mr. B. Liggett as his own business, but a Mr. Melia had bought a half share in the business for £5,000 in cash and thereupon a company was formed, and according to the Articles of Association of the company there were to be not less than two nor more than three directors. The first directors were to be George Frederick Benjamin Liggett and Edward Melia, and the directors were to have power at any time to appoint any other qualified person to be a director of the company either to fill a casual vacancy or as an addition to the board. The qualification for each director was to be a holding of not less than £500 nominal value of shares. That qualification was to be acquired in one month from the appointment of a director, and it was provided that the quorum of directors for transacting business should, unless otherwise fixed by the directors, be two. These are the provisions of Articles 23 to 28, which, as will appear later, are material for the purposes of this case.

Now the company, according to the evidence heard at Liverpool, was not solvent when it was registered and was at no subsequent period solvent. Mr. Melia did not take an active part in the management of the business. He was not only appointed as a director, he was also secretary, Mr. G. F. B. Liggett being not only a director but chairman. Mr. Melia, so far from taking any active part in the conduct of the business from 1924, does not seem to have concerned himself in the management of the affairs of the company ; what, however, he did was to keep the control of the banking account of the company. When the company was formed Barclays Bank, Limited, were appointed as bankers to the company and they were instructed to honour cheques or bills provided that they were signed by any two directors for the time being. These instructions of the directors were dated October 19, 1923. They were signed on behalf of B. Liggett (Liverpool), Limited, by Mr. Liggett and Mr. Melia, and specimen signatures of those two gentlemen were appended to those instructions. The branch of the defendant bank at which the company's account was opened was at Walton-road, Liverpool. With the appointment and the instructions there were enclosed the certificate of the incorporation of the company for inspection by the bank manager and a copy of the Memorandum and Articles of Association. Mr. Jones, the bank manager, read those documents. As I have said, Mr. Melia, while leaving the conduct of the business to Mr. Liggett, kept control over the banking account. His signature was necessary to any cheque before the bank would honour it. In the course of 1925 he became doubtful about the way in which the business was being carried on and consulted his solicitor and an accountant ; and he already had reason to think that demands were being made to induce the bank to pay out moneys on cheques without his signature. For that reason, about July 19 or 20, 1925, he interviewed the bank manager. According to his evidence he told the bank manager that he was having trouble with his fellow director, who was not doing his duty, but what he did insist upon and made clear to the bank manager was that no cheques were to be paid unless they bore not only the signature of Mr. Liggett but his own signature. By a letter which is undated but which is said in fact to be of July 20, 1925, he reiterated those instructions. The letter is in these terms, addressed to Mr. Jones, Barclays Bank, Walton-road, Liverpool, and signed by Mr. Melia : "By way of confirming our interview I would state that I wish no cheques to be paid out of the above account unless duly signed by Mr. Liggett and myself, as called for in the original authority. Thanking you sincerely for your kind attention to me," and then he signed it. He was occasionally absent from Liverpool, but either at that date or possibly at some earlier date he gave to the bank manager his address and his telephone number in Liverpool so that if any question arose about the payment of cheques he could at once be communicated with, and that was entered in the bank ledger where the company's account was entered up. From time to time cheques were drawn and issued by Mr. Liggett signed only by himself, and about the time with which I am now dealing, the end of July or August, it was arranged that if these cheques were presented they should not be paid until Mr. Melia had been communicated with, and had been consulted about them, and on a number of occasions about the end of July Mr. Melia did attend at the bank, having been notified by telephone, and there he affixed his signature to cheques which had come in with only one signature attached, and those cheques were thereupon met. The last occasion, according to Mr. Melia, when he followed that course was August 27 or 28. Mr. Melia at that date had just come back from Ireland, and on August 27 and the first days in September he was at his Liverpool address. The bank manager, as I have said, was Mr. Jones. He went away on his holiday in the early part of August and he was absent on holiday until September 9. During his absence the affairs at the bank were in charge of the assistant, a Mr. Hicks, who, according to his evidence, was fully conversant with the arrangement which had been made with Mr. Melia. Mr. Hicks was in charge from August 11 to September 9. According to Mr. Hicks's evidence, about the end of August Mr. Liggett came down and saw him and said that Mr. Melia had gone to Ireland, and that he had trade cheques which had to be met, and he said to Mr. Hicks : "Meet them, and I will get Mr. Melia to sign them." Mr. Hicks said : "I will pay them and I will get the duplicates properly signed for the other cheques," that is to say, cheques not properly signed which had come back through the Clearing House. In fact that course was adopted as regards three cheques respectively dated August 20, 25 and 25, 1925. These amount in all to a sum of £661 12s. 9d., and they were paid on August 27 and 28. Mr. Melia, having come down, signed the cheques ; these three cheques formed the first item claimed in the action, and that part of the claim has been withdrawn and I need say no more about it. In addition to that, certain cheques were paid by the bank with only one signature. They are three cheques, two dated August 25, 1925, and one dated August 26, 1925, amounting in all to a sum of £470. These were paid on August 27, 28, and 31, and were paid on one signature alone. Mr. Hicks had been asked to do this, and he was willing to do it apparently because Mr. Liggett had pointed out to him a difficulty that would arise if trade cheques were not honoured, a number of cheques in rotation, and he would be obliged by Mr. Hicks obtaining the second signature later, which at that time Mr. Hicks must have thought was the signature of Mr. Melia. On September 1 Mr. Hicks received at the bank a notice. It is written on the plaintiff company's paper dated September 1, 1925, addressed to the manager of Barclays Bank at Walton-road, Liverpool, and signed per pro B. Liggett (Liverpool), Limited, (signed) B. Liggett, chairman, and it is in these terms : "I have to inform you that (Mrs.) Eleanor May Liggett has been appointed an additional director of the above company and we accordingly enclose herewith the new director's specimen signature. The instructions with reference to the regulation of the bank account will remain the same as hitherto, viz., 'That cheques should be signed by any two directors for the time being.'" That was received by Mr. Hicks, and without any further inquiry he accepted it as a binding notice and acted upon it. He said that he looked up the Articles of Association and then thought that it covered all that was necessary. The article required not less than two nor more than three directors, and he said that he presumed that the new director had been appointed by the chairman. It did not occur to him to ask whether a quorum was present, and he thought that Mr. Melia was in Ireland and was in Ireland at the time when he paid the three cheques which I have just referred to as having been paid on one signature. That being the position Mr. Hicks went on honouring cheques, and when the manager returned he followed the same practice and cheques were honoured from time to time bearing the signature of Mr. Liggett and Mrs. Liggett. No inquiry was made of Mr. Melia : he was not told what the bank were doing or that they were deviating from the practice which he had established, namely, that no cheques should be paid if they came in with one signature, and if they came in he should be communicated with and his signature obtained before the cheques were met. Cheques were accordingly paid with these signatures between the period of August 27, and, practically speaking (except two small cheques which were paid in October), till the end of September. At the end of September Mr. Melia's accountant came to the bank and said that he had ascertained that cheques were being paid on the signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Liggett, and pointed out that that was entirely improper ; and thereupon, except in a few isolated instances of two small cheques which had been drawn in September and which apparently were not presented until the end of October, the bank made no further payments. In addition to the cheques dealt with in this way there was also a bill accepted by Mr. and Mrs. Liggett which was drawn on September 12, 1925, and was paid on September 15. Two bills were paid in August, one on August 14 and the other on August 21, on the signature of George Frederick Benjamin Liggett alone. It is admitted by the defendants in this action that they are liable in any case upon those bills, and they have paid into court without a denial of liability the amount of those two bills, which is £106 5s. 7d., and no question arises in this action as to those two bills.

The question which does arise is with reference to all the cheques paid on the signature of George Frederick Benjamin Liggett and Eleanor May Liggett. These cheques, which are considerable in number, amount in all to £5,981 2s. 1d. As regards the first three cheques, they, as I have said, were drawn on August 25 and 26, and they were paid, one on August 27, one on August 28, and one on August 31, and when they were paid they bore no signature but that of Mr. Liggett. I do not see how there can be any answer on the part of the bank to the payment of those cheques, because they were clearly paid without any authority or any pretence of authority. As regards the three cheques, the further event which happened was obviously most irregular, because when Mrs. Liggett came to the bank on September 2 Mr. Hicks, who was, as I have said, in charge of the bank, obtained her signature to those three cheques. They had been both drawn and paid before there had even been a semblance of an appointment of her as director. In addition to those cheques there was another cheque drawn on August 29, and certain others, seven in number, drawn on August 31, 1925. These were paid, one on the 2nd, and the others at various dates between September 4 and 9, and in each case either before they were paid or immediately after they were paid, having been originally signed by only George Frederick Benjamin Liggett, the signature of Mrs. Liggett was obtained to those ; and the bank thereupon treated them as being in order ; in other words, she signed cheques, or purported to sign cheques, as director which were drawn at a date before she was appointed a director. The remaining cheques had various dates from September 1 to 30, and they all bore the signature of Mr. and Mrs. Liggett.

Now the action is brought by the plaintiffs for money had and received and they claim that they are entitled to have repaid to them the amount of those cheques on the ground that the defendant bank had no authority to pay those cheques and, therefore, could not debit the plaintiff company with the amount of those cheques as they were claiming to do. That is the issue. The main defence, the primary defence set up by the defendant bank, is one based upon an application of the well-known rule which is often referred to as the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 E. and B., 327), a rule which has been applied in a great many cases to which I have been referred, for instance in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Company (L.R., 7 H.L., 869); County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Steam and House Coal Colliery Company ([1895] 1 Ch., 629); and quite recently discussed in the case of Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, Limited ([1927] 1 K.B., 246), and even more recently in the case of Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers, Limited, and Others (43 The Times L.R., 237). The rule as relied on by the defendant bank is that the defendant bank having had the Articles of Association were entitled to assume that the notice of September 1, 1925, sent to them by the chairman was a valid and proper notice because according to the Articles of Association it was possible, if the proper steps in the matter of internal management had been taken by the directors of the company, that Mrs. Liggett might have been duly appointed an additional director as the notice stated. I am relieved from any examination of the exact definition of this very respectable but perhaps somewhat ambiguous rule of law because the plaintiff company in answer to that contention have alleged that the defendant bank in any case is not entitled to the benefit of that rule by reason of the fact that the defendant bank were put on inquiry by the circumstances of the case and were negligent in not investigating the position before they accepted and acted upon the notice of the appointment of a new director. On that issue I put two questions to the jury, and the questions were these: "Was the bank put on inquiry as to whether the appointment of Mrs. Liggett was in order?" The jury answered: "Yes"; "Secondly, whether the bank was guilty of negligence in paying the bills and cheques complained of," and again the jury answered "Yes." Whatever may be the exact scope of the rule in Turquand's case (supra), I think it is quite clear on the authorities to which I have already referred that it can never be relied upon by a person who is put on inquiry. The rule proceeds on a presumption that certain acts have been regularly done, and if the circumstances are such that the person claiming the benefit of the rule is really put on inquiry, if there are circumstances which debar that person from relying on the prima facie presumption, then it is clear, I think, that he cannot claim the benefit of the rule; and if, therefore, the answers of the jury to the questions which I put to them stand, it is clear, I think, that this defence will not avail the defendants here.

Mr. Singleton has submitted that there was no evidence upon which the jury could give the answers which they did give. He also submitted when the plaintiffs' case ended that there was no evidence to go to the jury at that stage and that I ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury. I did not think so, nor do I think that the contention is sound that there was no evidence to go to the jury on the questions which I asked them. I should even go further. If I had been trying the case without a jury I should myself have come to exactly the same conclusion as the jury arrived. Mr. Singleton, in the course of his argument, gave as one of the reasons why effect should not be given to the answers of the jury, this circumstance, that when I was summing-up to the jury I drew their attention to the fact that the directors according to the Articles were to be not less than two nor more than three, that I drew their attention to the fact that the quorum of directors for transacting business should be two, but that I did not draw their attention specifically to the fact that there was a term in the Articles that that quorum might be otherwise fixed by the directors. The special jury had the Articles before them and they heard the addresses of counsel, and I have no doubt that that point was present to their minds. So far as I am concerned, I did not attach for this purpose any importance to that matter. The substantial ground on which the jury must have held, and I think have properly held, that the defendant bank was put on inquiry was this: that Mr. Melia was known to them to be a shareholder and a director of the company and he was known to be very anxious that no cheques should be paid without his signature. He had given special directions to that effect and had taken steps to ensure that his signature should be obtained, if it was not originally on cheques, by arranging that the bank could communicate with him. I think under those circumstances the defendant bank ought, before they acted upon an instruction such as that contained in the letter of September 1, 1925, to have communicated with Mr. Melia and ascertained if his concurrence had been obtained to the change, because he had been at the bank as recently as August 26 or 27, and this notice was only dated September 1, and, indeed, it was sent at a time when it was thought that Mr. Melia was actually in Ireland. The point to which the attention of the jury was directed was this, that the defendant bank ought to have taken steps to ascertain whether Mr. Melia was concurring in the appointment of a new director. Whether that concurrence was given by his voting for the appointment with the other director, Mr. Liggett, or whether it was given in the more indirect way first by his voting that the quorum of directors should be one instead of two and thereby vesting the power in Mr. Liggett, was a matter of minor importance for practical purposes because if the change was going to be made it could only be made in either way by the concurrence of Mr. Liggett and Mr. Melia. Indeed, I have very grave doubt whether a new director could be appointed without the direct concurrence of both the existing directors. However that may be, the jury had all the circumstances before them and they came, as I think, to a clear and proper conclusion, and I entirely dissent from the argument that there was no evidence on which they could come to the conclusion to which they did come. That being the position, I think the defence based upon the rule to which I have referred fails, and, if the matter stopped there, there would be judgment for the plaintiffs for the whole amount claimed.

But a further and somewhat difficult point is then raised by the defendant bank, and that point I have now to decide. The various cheques and the bills were originally all drawn in favour of ordinary trade creditors of the plaintiff company and the proceeds of those cheques were all applied to the payment of goods supplied to the company. The position was as from the end of August, 1925, that

Mr. Melia withdrew completely from any active part in the management of the business. He had already withdrawn substantially, but his final withdrawal took this form : that he told Mr. Liggett that he would not sign any more cheques. He seemed to have thought that that would put a stop to the conduct of the business altogether. The business, as I have said, was insolvent from the outset, and Mr. Melia and his advisers were anxious, if possible, to close it down. They might, however, have taken a much more definite step for that purpose. In particular Mr. Melia received on the morning of September 1 a notice that a directors' meeting of the plaintiff company was to be held at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 4th, and on the agenda one of the matters mentioned was the appointment of an additional director. Mr. Melia had been advised by his solicitor that it was unnecessary for him to take any action on that notice, obviously on the view that as there were only two directors and a quorum was two, unless otherwise ordered by the directors, it could not be done without Mr. Melia's concurrence, and after he had absented himself nothing could be done in his absence ; technically that was very sound advice. He took no notice of the meeting, and, indeed, he apparently took no further action or cognizance of what was being done. Mr. Liggett, however, who had conducted the business up to that time, continued to do so. He continued to order goods for the purposes of the business, which was a retail provision business, and those goods were delivered, and they had to be paid for, and they were in fact paid for from time to time by the cheques in question and the bills in question, so that every cheque represented a legal liability incurred by the company because the people who supplied the goods had no notice that the position had in any way been changed. Mr. Liggett was conducting the business, and not only were the company liable, but the company received the goods, which were paid for and which were supplied to them for the purposes of the business. Under those circumstances it is contended by the defendant bank that they are entitled to credit for the amounts so paid—that is to say, for all those cheques—in discharging the debts of the company, and they rely upon the equitable doctrine under which a person who has in fact paid the debts of another without authority is allowed to take advantage of his payment. I take the statement of that equitable doctrine in these terms from the language of Lord Justice Scrutton in the case of A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (40 The Times L.R., 302 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 775). The question which has been debated, and which is not at all an easy question, is whether on the facts of this case that equity applies. It was said by Sir Walter Greaves-Lord and Mr. Goldie that in law the position here would simply be this, that the bank for this purpose is in the position of a stranger who without the authority of the plaintiff company has paid off the debts of the plaintiff company, and that being so the payment was a purely voluntary payment so far as the company was concerned, and hence the company, even if it took the benefit, could not be in any way made responsible for the payments so made. For that rule of common law, which is a rule that no one questions, reliance is placed, amongst others, on the authority of Exall v. Partridge (8 Term Rep., 308). But the matter must now be decided in a Court which takes cognizance of principles of both law and equity, and the question now is whether the equitable principle does apply to the facts of this case. The equitable principle has been applied beyond question over and over again to cases where an agent not having the authority of his principal has borrowed money as on behalf of his principal. Under those circumstances at common law the principal cannot be sued and cannot be made to repay the amount so borrowed, but in equity it has been held that to the extent to which the amount so borrowed has been applied in payment of the debts of the principal, the quasi lender is entitled to recover from the quasi borrower. The rule is very clearly stated by Lord Selborne in the case of Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks and Co. (22 Ch.D., 61). At page 71 the noble and learned Lord says : "And I think the consistency of the equity allowed in the Cork and Youghal Railway Company's case (L.R., 4 Ch., 748) with the general rule of law that persons who have no borrowing powers cannot, by borrowing, contract debts to the lenders, may be shown in this way. The test is : has the transaction really added to the liabilities of the company ? If the amount of the company's liabilities remains in substance unchanged, but there is, merely for the convenience of payment, a change of the creditor, there is no substantial borrowing in the result, so far as relates to the position of the company. Regarded in that light, it is consistent with the general principle of equity, that those who pay legitimate demands which they are bound in some way or other to meet, and have had the benefit of other people's money advanced to them for that purpose, shall not retain that benefit so as, in substance, to make those other people pay their debts. I take that to be a principle sufficiently sound in equity ; and if the result is that by the transaction which assumes the shape of an advance or loan nothing is really added to the liabilities of the company, there has been no real transgression of the principle on which they are prohibited from borrowing." That principle is well established in respect of borrowings made without authority, and I may refer to the cases of Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Company (3 The Times L.R., 603 ; 19 Q.B.D., 155) and Bannatyne v. MacIver ([1906] 1 K.B., 103), where the principle was applied to a case where the agent who had purported to borrow without authority was the agent, not of a company, but of a private individual, and in that case the equitable right of the lender to recover to the extent that I have stated was fully recognized. The ground is sometimes put in this way, that the lender or the quasi lender is subrogated to the rights of the creditor who has been paid off. That, obviously, is not precisely true, because no question of subrogation to securities can arise in such a case. The principle has also been applied in Reversion Fund and Insurance Company, Limited v. Maison Cosway, Limited ([1913] 1 K.B., 364) to the case where the plaintiff, the quasi lending company, actually knew that the quasi borrowing company had no authority to borrow. If this were a case in which the plaintiffs' account was in debit throughout to the defendant bank, then each of the cheques in question when presented would constitute a request for a loan and the payment of that cheque would constitute the granting of that loan, and as the cheque and the request were unauthorized the case would be precisely within the authorities to which I have just referred. There was some evidence in this case that at the relevant dates the position of the plaintiff company's account at the defendant bank was that it was in debit and that there was an overdraft ; to the extent that that is so, the position will be, in my judgment, exactly as in the cases to which I have referred, and the position will be precisely covered by the authority of those cases. But it is not clear that that was so throughout or, indeed, at all. I have to consider, therefore, what the position is if when any one of these cheques was presented the account was in credit. The position then would be that in paying one of these cheques without authority the defendant bank was taking money which belonged to its customer and paying that away without authority. In other words, the defendant bank would be in possession of a credit balance belonging to the customer, and without the customer's authority it would be misapplying that credit balance. The question is : Does the equity to which I have referred extend to a case of that character ? There is only one authority to which I have been referred, and I know of no other, which seems to throw light on this question, and that is the case of A. L. Underwood, Limited v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins (supra). The claim by the plaintiff company there was for conversion of cheques. The plaintiff company was a one-man company, and the one man, the sole director, endorsed certain of the company's cheques and then paid them to his own account with the defendant bank. The learned Judge and the Court of Appeal held that that constituted a conversion because they were not entitled to collect the proceeds of those cheques and to appropriate the proceeds to the personal account of the sole director, and that being so they were misapplying the property of the plaintiffs and were liable for conversion. But it was either shown or indicated with sufficient clearness to justify an inquiry that the proceeds or some of the proceeds of those cheques were used to discharge the liabilities of the company, and the Court of Appeal ordered an inquiry to ascertain if that was so. The Court of Appeal did not expressly say, as I read their judgment, what would be the position if that were so ; but as I read their judgment they were disposed to the opinion that in such a case the equity, to which I have already referred as being well established as between quasi lenders and quasi borrowers, would apply. Lord Justice Scrutton states the position in this way : " But I am not sure that the learned Judge had in his mind the equitable doctrines under which a person who had in fact paid the debts of another without authority was allowed the advantage of his payments," and he refers to Bannatyne v. MacIver (supra) and Reid v. Rigby and Co. (10 The Times L.R., 418 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 40). That statement of the equity is, I think, wide enough to cover the question which I have to decide in this case, and although there is and must be a technical difference between a claim in conversion and a claim for money had and received such as I have to deal with in the present action, I do not think that that distinction is of such a nature as to prevent the application in the case before me of the same principles as would apply if the claim had been a claim in conversion. The relationship of a banker and customer, as Mr. Goldie very clearly and forcibly pointed out, is that of debtor and creditor ; that is, when the customer's account is in credit the banker is the debtor of the customer and, therefore, it is only by a figure of speech that the banker misapplies money of his customer which he has in his possession. That statement would be perfectly true if what the banker had in his possession was a bag of valuable coins or a bundle of notes and if acting upon an authority which was invalid the banker quite honestly although erroneously took a number of coins out of a bag or a number of notes out of a bundle and paid them on the faith of such an authority he would be guilty of conversion and, if I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Underwood's case (supra), in that event the banker would be entitled to the benefit of the equity. If that be so, and in principle it seems to me that it ought to be so, I cannot see why the same result should not apply in a case like the one before me, where the banker does not handle actual cash or notes, chattels capable of conversion, but by reason of the present system of banking facilities everything is done by way of credit or debit balances. In such a case there is obviously no conversion, but there is misapplication, under an honest mistake as to the validity of the authority, of the credits which constitute the medium of exchange in place of cash. Under these circumstances I think that the equity to which I have been referred ought to be extended even to the case where the cheque which was paid was paid out of the credit balance, and was not paid by way of overdraft. If that is so, the banker will be entitled to the benefit of that payment if he can show that that payment went to discharge a legal liability of the customer. The customer in such a case is really no worse off, because the legal liability which has to be discharged is discharged, though it is discharged under circumstances which at common law would not entitle the bank to debit the customer.

There are in this case two further factors which I have to notice. It is said that the company, which was insolvent throughout, went into liquidation on September 2, 1925, and some of the payments which have been made to customers might amount to undue preference, but I see no reason for thinking that that would be so. The payments were made by the company, which was a going concern, in respect of current deliveries of goods, and the particular suppliers who were paid were people who supplied goods from time to time in the ordinary course of business and, in fact, with three small exceptions, are creditors, I understand, of the plaintiff company in respect of goods supplied towards the end and not paid for.

Then there is a further point which does appear to be too remote. It is said that the desire of Mr. Melia was that the company should close down its business operations and that that would have been inevitable if the bank had not honoured those cheques in the way in which it did, but as the result of further trading the financial position of the company was prejudiced and was worse at the end of September than it was at the beginning. I think that is too remote. Indeed, although it was mentioned, it has not been pressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff company.

The result is that I must order an inquiry because I have not the facts before me sufficiently to come to a conclusion whether the rule of equity which I have stated does apply, and if so to what extent. The inquiry that I order will be addressed to some referee who will report to me. I shall retain seisin of the case and shall deal with all questions of costs and make such final order as the report which follows on the inquiry may seem to require. The inquiry will be as to the exact circumstances under which each one of the cheques and bills complained of was paid, that is to say, what was the state of the plaintiff company's account with the defendant bank at the date of each payment ? Was it made in respect of goods supplied and was it made in the ordinary course of business ? I have said that I do not attach any importance to the suggestion that the position of the company is prejudiced. This case may go to another Court, and as there is an inquiry I think it desirable that the referee should also report on that question ; and if in the course of the inquiry, having regard to what I have said in my judgment, it appears to the learned counsel that there are other relevant facts which may assist the Court they will, of course, elucidate those facts as well as they can. I suggest that the inquiry should take place with as little formality as possible, that the matter should be laid before the referee as far as possible with documents and without regard to the strict rules of evidence, and that the report should come back to me at as early a date as possible, and I shall reserve all questions of costs. The only question remaining is to whom the inquiry is to be directed.

After discussion the order was for a referee to be agreed or in default of agreement the District Registrar at Liverpool.

CARLING v. LEBBON.*

Negligence — Damages — Amount — Claim by widow in respect of husband's death—Widow's contributory pension—Whether to be taken into account in assessing damages—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 and 10 Vict., c. 93)—Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 7), s. 1—Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 70), ss. 1, 3.

A contributory pension payable to a widow under the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, is not a "sum paid or payable on the death of" her husband "under any contract of assurance or insurance" within s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908, and the value of it must, therefore, be deducted from any damages to which she may be entitled in an action brought by her under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of the negligence which resulted in her husband's death.

Judgment was delivered in this action, tried at Leeds Assizes, in which Mrs. Vera Florence Eugenie Carling, of Middlesmoor, Lofthouse, near Pateley Bridge, Yorkshire, as widow of Walter Carling, claimed from the defendant, John William Lebbon, of Harrogate, damages in respect of her husband's death which, she alleged, was due to the negligent driving by Lebbon of a Post Office motor mail van.

Mr. William Stewart and Mr. H. H. Maddocks appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Mortimer, K.C., and Mr. Russell Vick for the defendant.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This was an action tried before me at Leeds Assizes on March 31, 1927. The plaintiff sued the defendant under Lord Campbell's Act for damages for the death of her husband through injuries received by him in being knocked down and run over by a van belonging to the Post Office and driven by the defendant, the accident being due to negligence on the part of the defendant.

The action was brought for the benefit of the plaintiff, of her son aged three years, and of her daughter aged nine months. It was abundantly clear that the death of the plaintiff's husband was caused by the negligent driving of the defendant.

The only question which remained for argument was whether, in computing the sum of the damages payable to the plaintiff, regard ought, or ought not, to be had to the pension to which, after the death of her husband, the plaintiff became entitled under the provisions of the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925. I have come to the conclusion that, strange as it may seem, that pension must be taken into consideration in the assessment of the plaintiff's compensation.

I think that that conclusion is made plain as well by the terms of Lord Campbell's Act itself as by the decision in Baker v. Dalgleish Steam Shipping Company (38 The Times L.R., 245 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 361). It is quite true that by the Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908, it is provided that "in assessing damages in any action, whether commenced before or after the passing of this Act, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as amended by any subsequent enactment, there shall not be taken into account any sum paid or payable on the death of the deceased under any contract of assurance or insurance, whether made before or after the passing of this Act." It was contended, not without ingenuity, that the contributory scheme of pensions provided for in the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, is, in substance if not in form, contractual. I have carefully considered the matter and I cannot take that view. I do not think that a widow's pension under the Act of 1925 satisfies either of the requirements of the Act of 1908. I do not think that it is accurate to describe it as a "sum paid or payable on the death of the deceased," nor do I think that it can truly be said to be a sum "payable . . . under any contract of assurance or insurance."

I am, therefore, driven to the conclusion that this contributory pension, whatever its true value may be, must be taken into account in the sense of reducing the damages which would otherwise have been payable to the plaintiff for herself and her infant children.

The result is interesting and anomalous. If a man who is insured for £20,000 is killed in a railway accident his widow and children can recover from the railway company damages which are not diminished to the extent of one penny piece by the circumstance that on the death of the deceased there became payable the large sum assured. But when a man dies in circumstances in which his widow and children become entitled to the little pension—to which the deceased man himself has contributed—under the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, the value of that pension must be deducted from any sum which the widow may recover in an action under Lord Campbell's Act. I should have decided the matter the other way if it had been possible for me to do so, but, in my opinion, as the law stands, there is no course open to me except to diminish the damages by taking that pension into account. Whether that is a desirable state of the law is a matter on which I am not called on to express any opinion.

It is exceedingly difficult to place anything like an accurate figure on the value of this pension. It is impossible to say how long it is likely to continue. I have to perform the kind of task which is habitually performed with great success by the members of a jury. I have come to the conclusion that a fair sum for the plaintiff to recover is £1,800—£900 for herself and £450 for each of the two infant children.

Judgment was entered accordingly, with costs.

Court of Criminal Appeal. (Lord Hewart, C.J., Sankey and Salter, JJ.) } 1927. Apr. 11.

REX v. CAIRNS.*

Criminal Law — Procedure Appeal — Notice of appeal — Complaint of summing-up — Particulars.

On an appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal substantial particulars of misdirection and of any other objections to the summing-up must be included in the notice of appeal or must be sent to the Registrar of the Court with the notice of appeal.

The Court refused the application for leave to appeal against his conviction of Alexander MacWilliam Cairns, who was convicted in March at Leeds Assizes of the murder of Stanley Dalton, a manservant, at Limestone Bank, Northumberland, on September 11, 1926, and was sentenced to death.

Mr. Osbert Peake, for Cairns, said that Cairns had been tried twice, the jury at Newcastle Assizes in February not having been able to agree on a verdict. It was a case in which it was open to the jury to accept the whole of the evidence for the prosecution and still to find a verdict of "Not Guilty."

It therefore became very important for the prosecution to show that Cairns's evidence could not be believed. He was cross-examined to show that he had told untruths in a letter written to his sweetheart (who was a witness at the trial) nine days before Dalton's disappearance. Those questions tended to show that Cairns was a man of bad character and was not to be believed, but cross-examination to credit was limited by section 1 (f) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, to matters which were relevant to the issue. Other questions tended to show that Cairns had matters in his past history which were to his discredit.

The Judge also misdirected the jury in not pointing out to them that there was no conflict of evidence, and that, if they accepted Cairns's evidence, he was entitled to be acquitted ; in not drawing attention to certain evidence as being strong corroboration of Cairns's story ; and in commenting on the fact that two men were not called by the defence, whereas it was Cairns's case that those two men had themselves committed the murder.

Mr. Mortimer, K.C., and Mr. J. Alan Bell, for the Crown, were not called on to argue.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving the judgment of the Court, said that Dalton disappeared on September 11, and on September 24 his body was found in a plantation about 1½ miles from Walwick Hall, where he was employed. It was clear that his death had been caused by the firing of a shot-gun followed by a heavy blow on the head.

The evidence against Cairns was of that valuable kind which was known as circumstantial ; it depended on the joint effect of a great number of circumstances, all pointing in the same direction. Cairns was seen wearing Dalton's overalls, and after his arrest he wrote two letters the object of which was to get another person to dispose of certain things which were in his lodgings, including a cartridge of the kind that had been mentioned in the case. The evidence against Cairns was ample.

The questions which had been asked by counsel for the prosecution were most proper. Their object was primarily not to test Cairns's credit, but to show that he was ingeniously engaged in covering his tracks. The criticism of the summing-up was rather ungrateful, for nothing could have been more advantageous to the defence.

Particulars of the alleged misdirection had not been given until last Thursday. As long ago as June, 1918, in Rex v. Wyman (13 Crim. App. Rep., 163) it was stated that substantial particulars of misdirection and of other objections to the summing-up must always be included in the notice of appeal or sent to the Registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal with the notice, and must not be kept back until a few days before the appeal. That warning had been repeated from time to time. In the future it would be acted on.

IN RE PAGET—EX PARTE OFFICIAL RECEIVER AND BOARD OF TRADE.*

Bankruptcy — Public examination — Refusal to answer questions — Answers detrimental to debtor—Whether sufficient ground for refusal —Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), s. 15 (8).

A debtor, on his public examination under s. 15 (8) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is bound to answer all such questions as the Court may put or allow to be put to him, and the mere fact that it would be seriously detrimental to the debtor to answer them is not a sufficient ground for refusal.

The Court allowed this appeal by the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy from a decision of Mr. Justice Clauson, which raised a question of some public importance.

An application had been made to the Judge to commit the debtor, known under the name of Richard Paget, for refusing to answer certain questions, in particular, what was his real name and under what name he had enlisted in the Army in 1916 and had continued to pass until 1919. The Official Receiver regarded the establishment of the debtor's identity as essential in order fully to investigate certain transactions. On the debtor's refusal to answer, the Official Receiver reported the matter to the Court.

Mr. Justice Clauson interviewed the debtor in his private room and on returning into Court said that there were reasons why it would be seriously detrimental to the debtor to answer the questions and that he was not satisfied that the disclosure of the name in which the debtor had enlisted in the Army in 1916 would lead to any further assets being secured to the creditors. He therefore refused to commit the debtor.

The Official Receiver and the Board of Trade appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Roland Burrows appeared for the appellants; the debtor appeared in person.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that he did not dispute that the Judge had a discretion either to commit or to refuse to commit the debtor to prison. But he had not really exercised his discretion; the reasons he had given—namely, that it would be seriously detrimental to the debtor to answer the questions and that he was not satisfied that the answers when given would lead to further assets being obtained for the creditors—were quite insufficient.

The debtor said that in private and in confidence he had given the Official Receiver all the information for which he had asked. He objected to any public use being made of it.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the appeal must be allowed. It arose on a matter of public importance, but too great significance should not be attached to it. The debtor came up for public examination in December, 1926, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the purpose of the examination being not only the collecting of debts on behalf of the creditors, but also the protection of the public. It would be a mistake to concentrate too much on the aspect of debt-collecting and distribution of assets.

His Lordship read section 73 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, showing that it was the duty of the Official Receiver to investigate the conduct of the debtor and to report the result to the Court. It was plain that the duty was a wide one and the correlative duty of the debtor, after the report had been made, was to show that he was entitled to his discharge, and he could not do so unless he made a full disclosure of all the facts. It had been decided by Mr. Justice Phillimore in In re Atherton (28 The Times L.R., 339; [1912] 2 K.B., 251) that a debtor was bound to answer all questions put to him, or allowed by the Court to be put to him, touching his conduct, dealings, and property, even though the answers might tend to incriminate him.

In the present case the debtor, under his name of Richard Paget, made certain answers in his earlier examination in December, 1926. In February, 1927, he made a statement in writing, in which he said that his full name was Vivian Percy Broughton and admitted his identity with a person of that name who was charged with an offence at Brighton in 1908 and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. He said that he had been known as Richard Paget for the last 25 years or so.

Inasmuch as his original statements were incomplete, inaccurate, and, as to some of them, untrue, it was very necessary for the Official Receiver to investigate the true facts, and it was alleged that the debtor was concerned in a large transaction, which required investigation, as to the sale of a ship.

He refused to produce any evidence that he was ever in the Army and said that the name under which he had enlisted was entirely his own affair. On those facts it would be quite impossible for a proper report to be made by the Official Receiver unless the gap in the history of the debtor's life from 1916 to 1919 was filled in. Mr. Justice Clauson, no doubt from motives of compassion, tried to see if the debtor could be excused from answering the questions and made some examination of him in the absence of the Official Receiver, who was not only entitled, but whose duty it was, to be there.

By section 15 (8):—

"The debtor shall be examined upon oath, and it shall be his duty to answer all such questions as the Court may put or allow to be put to him. Such notes of the examination as the Court thinks proper shall be taken down in writing, and shall be read over either to or by the debtor and signed by him, and may thereafter, save as in this Act provided, be used in evidence against him; they shall also be open to the inspection of any creditor at all reasonable times."

The Court thought that the Judge, who, apparently, had not had his attention called to the decision in In re Atherton (supra), failed to appreciate the situation. The reasons which he gave were not a complete survey of the rights and duties of the Official Receiver and excluded a side of bankruptcy law with which this Court was constantly dealing. It was not only the creditors but also the public that must be safeguarded.

The proper course was to remit the case back to Mr. Justice Clauson to be dealt with. It was quite plain that the questions ought to be answered, and the debtor could not rely on the reasons for refusing to do so which he had given before—namely, that it would inconvenience him or might even incriminate him to answer them. The Judge should allow a few days to elapse before the resumption of the public examination to give the debtor an opportunity of considering the matter and of making a full disclosure, such as was most desirable in the debtor's own interest, of all his proceedings.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT and LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

MERTZ AND OTHERS v. SOUTH WALES EQUITABLE MONEY SOCIETY, LIMITED.*

Moneylenders — Registered name — Taking security in another name—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 61), s. 2 (1) (c).

The defendant society, which had formerly been a loan society, became incorporated as a limited company and began to carry on business as moneylenders and were registered as such, and they made an advance to the plaintiffs, who signed a promissory note agreeing to pay the amount to the secretary of the defendant society, which was mentioned by name in the note as the society of which he was secretary. In an action for a declaration that the transaction was void on the ground that the defendants had taken a security in a name other than their registered name, contrary to s. 2 (1) (c) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900,

Held, that as no one could sue on the note except the secretary, the security had been taken in a name other than the defendants' registered name, and the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration claimed.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was the plaintiffs' appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright at the Glamorgan Assizes held at Swansea.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that a certain promissory note and all transactions arising thereout were null, illegal, and void.

The declaration was sought on the ground that the promissory note was taken by the defendant society as a security for money in the course of their business as moneylenders otherwise than in their registered name, in contravention of section 2 (1) (c) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, which provides that—

"A moneylender as defined by this Act . . . . (c) shall not enter into any agreement in the course of his business as a moneylender with respect to the advance and repayment of money, or take any security for money in the course of his business as a moneylender, otherwise than in his registered name."

The defendants, the South Wales Equitable Money Society, Limited, formerly a loan society, had been incorporated as a limited company, and they carried on business as moneylenders and were registered as such. On April 28, 1924, the plaintiffs and one Barry obtained an advance from the defendant society of £190, for which they signed a promissory note dated April 28, 1924, as follows :—

"Cardiff, 28th April, 1924.

"£190.

"On demand we jointly and severally promise to pay William Arthur Horey or other the secretary for the time being of the South Wales Equitable Money Society, Limited, the sum of one hundred and ninety pounds, value received.

"A. Pugsley (signed).
E. Mertz (signed).
Kate Anne Pugsley (signed).
John Walters (signed).
Charles Barry (signed).

"Witness to the signatures : L. W. Dean, 26, High-street, Cardiff."

Mr. Justice Wright held that as the registered name of the company appeared on the face of the promissory note, and the name of William Arthur Horey was coupled with the words "or other the secretary for the time being of the society," in truth and in fact it was the society which was taking the security —the promissory note—and was taking it in its own name within the meaning of the Money-lenders Act, 1900. He accordingly refused to make the declaration asked for, holding as a matter of law that there had been no infringement of the Act.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Richard O'Sullivan appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Vaughan Williams, K.C., and Mr. T. W. Langman for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that what the Court had to decide was the interpretation of a single sentence in section 2 of the Money-lenders Act, 1900. The question was whether or not this particular transaction came within the mischief aimed at by section 2 (1) (c) of the Act.

By that subsection a moneylender, as defined by the Act—

"shall not enter into any agreement in the course of his business as a moneylender with respect to the advance and repayment of money, or take any security for money in the course of his business as a moneylender, otherwise than in his registered name."

The moneylenders in this case were the South Wales Equitable Money Society, Limited, which began their business as a loan society registered under the Loan Societies Act of 1840. As long as they were registered under that Act they could use the form of promissory note set out in the schedule. The form of promissory note used by the society was the old form. But the society had entirely altered its character ; it had become a limited company and had registered as moneylenders under the Money-lenders Act, 1900.

The language of that Act was reasonably plain. It was impossible to say that the promissory note in this case was taken in the moneylenders' registered name. It was taken in the name of the holder of an office, namely, the secretary for the time being. No one was entitled to sue on the note except Horey, or, possibly, "other the secretary for the time being."

On the plain language of the subsection this was a case where a security had been taken in a name other than the company's registered name. Therefore the words of the subsection had been contravened. The appeal must be allowed and the declaration asked for must be made. The appellants must have the costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Atkin concurred.

WIGG AND ANOTHER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE IRISH FREE STATE.*

Irish Free State—Transfer of Civil servants—Retiring allowances—Action against Attorney-General of Irish Free State—Competency—Calculation of pensions—Basis.

This was an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Saorstát Eireann, dated April 1, 1925, reversing a judgment of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice of Saorstát Eireann, dated July 18, 1924, in an action in which the appellants were plaintiffs and the respondent was the defendant. The question was as to the basis upon which Civil Service superannuation should be calculated under the Irish Treaty.

Mr. A. Alfred Dickie, K.C., of the Irish Bar and a member of the English Bar, and Mr. James Henry of the Irish Bar appeared for the appellants ; Mr. A. K. Overend, K.C., Mr. Charles Bewley, K.C., and Mr. Cecil Lavery, all three of the Irish Bar, for the respondent.

The appellants were at the date of the passing of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, and at the date of the confirming of the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty, Irish officers of the British Government. They were transferred by virtue of the Provisional Government (Transfer of Functions) Order, 1922, to the Provisional Government, and the appellant Mr. Wigg was, on December 6, 1922, transferred by virtue of the Irish Free State Constitution to the Free State Government.

The appellants retired from the service of the Provisional Government. For the purpose of calculating the compensation they elected to have it calculated on the basis of superannuation under the Superannuation Act, 1859. The application came before the Committee appointed to advise the Minister of Finance in regard to claims for compensation under Article 10 of the Treaty. The decision of the Minister, grounded on the advice of the Committee, was sent to the Secretary of the Office of Public Works, in which department Mr. Wigg served, in a letter setting out the amount of his compensation and the scale on which it was calculated.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants did not agree with the mode of calculating the amount of their compensation, and they claimed that the compensation so granted was not fair compensation, and that, in any event, it was less favourable than that accorded by the Act of 1920. They issued a writ in the High Court of Justice of Saorstát Eireann claiming (a) a declaration that the compensation awarded to them respectively was not fair compensation inasmuch as part of it was put on a sliding scale ; (b) a declaration that bonus was part of the emoluments and salary formerly enjoyed by them, and that in calculating the superannuation allowance a fixed award should be made, and that no part of such allowance should be put on a sliding scale ; (c) a declaration that if any portion of the said allowance might be based on a sliding scale or cost-of-living figure the same should be based on the Irish and not the English cost-of-living figure irrespectively of the present residence of the plaintiffs or either of them ; (d) a declaration that in the computation of pension in respect of such bonus the same should not be limited by an overriding maximum, and that that limitation might be declared illegal ; and (e) a declaration that for the purpose of compensation and bonus April 1, 1922, was the date by reference to which a superannuation allowance or additional allowance should be fixed, and not the actual date of retirement.

The second appellant, Mr. Cochrane, claimed in addition a declaration that the supplementary additional allowance in respect of bonus awarded to the plaintiffs respectively was inadequate and had not been calculated in the proper manner ; that the award of such on 75 per cent. of the amount of bonus was contrary to law ; and that the same should have been awarded on the full amount of bonus.

The respondent contended :—(1) That no action could be brought under the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty ; (2) that the bonus claimed did not form part of the salary or emoluments ; and (3) that the decision of the Minister of Finance of the Provisional Government and of the Government of the Irish Free State respectively as to compensation payable was final and was not subject to review by the Courts.

Mr. Justice Meredith, before whom the action was heard, did not accept the contention of the respondent that the Court had no jurisdiction to decide the question, and gave judgment in favour of the appellants. He held that so much of the superannuation allowance as was attributable to the bonus was properly placed upon a sliding scale, but that such sliding scale should be based upon the Irish and not the English cost of living irrespectively of the present or future residence of the plaintiffs or of either of them. On appeal, the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State decided, by a majority, that no action lay and that no declaration could be given by the Courts on the questions arising in the action.

The Lord Chancellor, in delivering their Lordships' considered judgment, said :—This is an appeal by special leave from an order of the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State.

The appellants, who were formerly established Civil servants in the employment of the Crown in Southern Ireland, were, by the several instruments which effected or followed upon the establishment of the Irish Free State, transferred to the service of that State. They have since retired, and, being dissatisfied with the retiring allowances granted to them by the Minister of Finance, they brought this action in the High Court against the Attorney-General of the Irish Free State, claiming a series of declarations as to the allowances to which they are entitled. Mr. Justice Meredith, by whom the action was tried, granted part of the relief claimed ; but, on appeal to the Supreme Court, that Court, by a majority (Mr. Justice Johnston dissenting), held that the action would not lie, and dismissed it, with costs. Hence the present appeal.

On the argument of the appeal before this Board two distinct questions were discussed : first, whether the appellants are entitled to any legal rights in respect of which an action for a declaration will lie against the Attorney-General ; and, secondly, whether, assuming that such an action will lie, the appellants are, on the true construction of the statutes relating to superannuation or compensation for loss of office, entitled to the declarations which they claim.

The questions so raised are of considerable public importance, both as bearing on the effect to be given in the Courts of the Free State to the statutes and orders of 1922, and also as affecting the interests of a large number of former servants of the Crown.

Upon the first question the respondent relied in the first place on the decisions of the English Courts, which have laid it down that a servant of the Crown has no right under the Superannuation Acts to sue for his superannuation allowance ; and for this purpose reference was made to Cooper v. The Queen (14 Ch.D., 311) and Yorke v. The King (31 The Times L.R., 220 ; [1915] 1 K.B., 852). Their Lordships do not question the authority of those decisions, which, indeed, was recognized by the House of Lords in Considine v. McInerney (32 The Times L.R., 453 ; [1916] 2 A.C., 162) ; but those cases turned entirely upon the language of the Superannuation Acts.

Section 30 of the Act of 1834 (which has not been repealed) enacts that "Nothing in this Act shall extend or be construed to extend to give any person an absolute right to compensation for past services or to any superannuation or retiring allowance under this Act," and section 2 of the Act of 1859 provides that any question as to a claim for superannuation shall be referred to the Commissioners of the Treasury, "whose decision shall be final" ; and, in view of these enactments, it was clear that no action could be brought to set aside or vary a decision of the Commissioners of the Treasury. But the claim of the present appellants rests not upon the Superannuation Acts taken by themselves, but upon those Acts as modified and applied by the Agreement for a Treaty between Great Britain and Ireland and the statutes and orders of 1922. By Article 10 of the Agreement for a Treaty it was provided as follows :—

"The Government of the Irish Free State agrees to pay fair compensation on terms not less favourable than those accorded by the Act of 1920 to Judges, officials, members of police forces, and other public servants who are discharged by it or who retire in consequence of the change of Government effected in pursuance hereof."

This article, taken by itself, might not have been enforceable by an individual citizen in the Irish Courts ; but by a series of enactments following upon the Agreement for a Treaty, it has been made a part of the municipal law of the Free State. By the Provisional Government (Transfer of Functions) Order, 1922, Clause 7, it was provided as follows :—

" (i.) All officers who are on the day of transfer engaged or employed in the discharge of functions transferred under this order to the Provisional Government shall be transferred to and become officers of the Provisional Government. . . .

" (ii.) Where an officer is transferred to the Provisional Government under this order, he shall hold office by a tenure corresponding to his previous tenure, and if he is discharged by the Provisional Government, or if he retires in consequence of the change of Government effected by this order, he shall be entitled to receive compensation from the Provisional Government, and the terms of such compensation shall not be less favourable to him than such as are accorded in the like circumstances by the Government of Ireland Act, 1920."

By Act No. 1 of 1922—the statute by which Dail Eireann enacted a Constitution for the Irish Free State—it was enacted that the Articles of Agreement for a Treaty should have the force of law ; and Articles 77 and 78 of the Constitution provided as follows :—

" 77. Every existing officer of the Provisional Government at the date of the coming into operation of this Constitution (not being an officer whose services have been lent by the British Government to the Provisional Government) shall on that date be transferred to and become an officer of the Irish Free State (Saorstát Eireann), and shall hold office by a tenure corresponding to his previous tenure.

" 78. Every such existing officer who was transferred from the British Government by virtue of any transfer of services to the Provisional Government shall be entitled to the benefit of Article 10 of the Scheduled Treaty."

The effect of these enactments, and particularly of Article 78 of the Constitution, was to give to every existing officer who was transferred to the Provisional Government, and afterwards to the Free State, a right by Irish law to the benefit of Article 10 of the Agreement for a Treaty, with a corresponding title to enforce that right in the Courts of the Free State.

But it was argued on behalf of the respondent that, even assuming that the statutes conferred a right, they gave the appellants no more than a right to put forward their claim to the Minister of Finance (to whom the functions of the British Treasury in respect of superannuation have been transferred) and to receive such compensation as he might award to them. In support of this view it was pointed out that at most the effect of Article 10 of the Agreement for the Treaty and Article 78 of the Constitution was to give to existing Civil servants transferred to the Free State the rights accorded by the 8th Schedule to the Government of Ireland Act, 1920 ; that under that schedule a Civil servant retiring under the statutory conditions would only have been entitled to receive such compensation as the Civil Service Committee set up by that Act might award to him in accordance with the rules contained in the schedule ; and that by section 56 (6) of the Act the determination of the Civil Service Committee of any claim or question which was to be determined by them under the Act was to be final and conclusive.

In consequence of the establishment of the Free State the Civil Service Committee has, so far as Southern Ireland is concerned, never been set up ; and it was argued that, this being so, the right to make an award under Schedule 8 of the Act of 1920 has reverted to the Minister of Finance as the successor to the British Treasury.

Their Lordships do not agree with this reasoning. It is true that the Civil Service Committee for all Ireland has lapsed, and that by Section 7 of the Irish Free State (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1922 (Session 2), such a committee has been set up for Northern Ireland only ; but the effect is not to transfer the functions of that Committee as regards Southern Ireland to the Minister of Finance. The right of an existing officer retiring under the statutory conditions to receive compensation in accordance with the rules contained in Schedule 8 of the Act of 1920 remains, and is converted by Article 78 of the Constitution into a legal right ; and, the machinery provided by the statute for ascertaining the amount of the compensation having disappeared, the duty of ascertaining it falls, in case of need, upon the Courts.

In this connexion it is desirable to mention that, with a view to obtaining assistance in the duties falling upon him in this connexion, the Minister of Finance has set up a Compensation Committee whose duty it is to advise him as to the compensation to be awarded to retiring Civil servants. This Committee consists of a Judge of the Supreme Court, who is the chairman, two members appointed by the Minister and two appointed by the staff of Civil servants. The constitution of the Committee is eminently fair, and there can be no doubt that its advice is of value ; but it is an advisory committee only with no statutory powers, and it was not and could not be contended on behalf of the respondent that its conclusions have a binding effect.

Upon the first point, therefore, their Lordships are of opinion that the appellants have a legal right which may be asserted in the Courts of the Irish Free State. They see no objection to the form of the action which is brought against the Attorney-General for a declaration of rights and which is in accordance with the well-known decisions in Dyson v. Attorney-General (27 The Times L.R., 143 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 410 ; 28 The Times L.R., 72 ; [1912] 1 Ch., 158) and other cases.

Before dealing with the questions of amount it is desirable to state in a little more detail the position of the two appellants, the nature of the compensation awarded to them respectively, and the questions upon which disagreement has arisen.

Each of the appellants had many years of service to his credit, and each of them was entitled at the date of his retirement to a fixed salary and also to a supplementary salary (or bonus) varying with the cost-of-living figure. In each case the notice of retirement, which was given in accordance with the statutory conditions specified in the 8th Schedule to the Act of 1920, took effect after the passing of the Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Session 2). But there was this difference between the appellants : that whereas the second appellant, Mr. Cochrane, had elected to adopt the provisions of the Superannuation Act, 1909, the first appellant, Mr. Wigg, had preferred to remain subject to the provisions of the Act of 1859. Accordingly, while the first appellant was entitled, in accordance with the Act of 1859, to a superannuation allowance equal to one-sixtieth of his annual salary and emoluments for every completed year of service (subject to the notional increases of his salary and years of service prescribed by Part I. of the Rules contained in the 8th Schedule to the Act of 1920), the right of the second appellant was to a superannuation allowance equal to one-eightieth of his annual salary and emoluments for every completed year of service (subject to the notional increases above mentioned), together with an additional allowance of a lump sum equal to one-thirtieth of his annual salary and emoluments for every completed year of service, but not exceeding one and a half times the amount of such salary and emoluments.

In calculating the pensions to be awarded to the appellants the Compensation Committee, whose recommendations were adopted by the Minister of Finance, proceeded generally upon the above lines. They made the proper notional increases in the salary (both fixed and supplemental) and in the years of service of each appellant, and awarded to each of them a fixed pension representing the proper proportion of his fixed salary and a supplemental pension representing the proper proportion of his supplemental salary (or bonus) as so increased. But in each case they made it a condition of the award, (1) that the supplemental pension should be subject to reassessment quarterly with reference to the official cost-of-living figures from time to time declared; and (2) that at no time should the supplemental pension exceed its prescribed amount at the date of the retirement, which was referred to as the "overriding maximum." Further, (3) in calculating the lump sum allowance to be paid to the appellant Cochrane in respect of his supplemental salary or bonus, they calculated that allowance upon 75 per cent. only and not upon the whole of the bonus to which he was entitled at the date of retirement. It is with regard to these conditions numbered (1), (2), and (3) that the awards were questioned on this appeal.

In imposing the disputed conditions, the Advisory Committee followed the principles laid down in a minute of the British Treasury dated March 20, 1922, which was adopted by the Minister of Finance on May 11, 1922, and it is necessary to consider whether the minute is binding on the appellants. In their Lordships' opinion it is not so binding. The minute was the outcome of a long discussion between the Treasury and the British Civil servants as to the pensionable character of the bonus, and it is no doubt operative as to officers remaining in the service of the Crown in Great Britain; for, as to the pensions to be awarded to those officers, the Treasury has a wide discretion. But the minute cannot affect the rights of officers who at its date had been transferred to the Government of the Free State; nor could the Minister of Finance, who (as their Lordships have held) has no discretion as to the compensation to be allowed to officers in the position of the appellants, make the minute binding upon them by adoption. Their rights must depend upon the construction of the statutes without reference to any minute, and the question to be determined is whether and to what extent the disputed conditions are in accordance with the statutes.

As to the condition numbered (1), their Lordships are of opinion that upon a reasonable interpretation of the statutes dealing with superannuation allowances the supplemental pension can be made to vary (like the bonus on which it is calculated) with the cost-of-living figure. If a transferred officer were entitled on retirement to have his pension calculated upon his current bonus, without reference to any future variation, the effect might be that he would get more by way of pension than he could have claimed if he had remained in the British service, and their Lordships do not think that this was the intention of the Acts. The pension may be made to vary as the salary would have varied.

But on the same reasoning their Lordships do not think that the condition numbered (2) can be sustained. If the pension is made to fall with the cost-of-living figure it should also be capable of rising with that figure; and if the amount of the officer's salary at the date of his retirement is not conclusive for the purpose of preventing the application of the sliding scale under condition (1), neither should it be treated as an overriding maximum as prescribed by condition (2).

The condition numbered (3) raises a difficult question. The additional allowance payable under section 1 of the Superannuation Act, 1909, to an officer who comes within the provisions of that Act is to be "a lump sum equal to one-thirtieth of the annual salary and emoluments of his office, multiplied by the number of completed years he has served." There is an obvious difficulty in applying this formula to a salary which may vary up or down from year to year, and no doubt it was on this ground that the Treasury, in the minute above referred to, directed that this allowance should be calculated on 75 per cent. only of the current amount of the bonus. But in their Lordships' opinion there is no warrant in the statute for this rough-and-ready way of dealing with the matter.

The lump-sum allowance, as Mr. Justice Meredith pointed out, is not intended as a commutation payment for the purpose of investment, but as an allowance for meeting the increased temporary expenditure connected with the officer's retirement, and, accordingly, it is reasonable that it should be regarded as an accession to the first year's pension and be calculated on the same basis as that pension. Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that this condition cannot be sustained.

The result is that their Lordships find themselves in agreement on every point with the judgment of the trial Judge, and they are of opinion that the order of the Supreme Court should be set aside and the judgment of Mr. Justice Meredith restored. The respondent shall pay the costs of the appeal to the Supreme Court, but, as on the appeal to this Board the appellants contended unsuccessfully against the application of a sliding scale to their pensions, there should be no costs of that appeal. Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

MARBE v. GEORGE EDWARDES (DALY'S THEATRE), LIMITED.*

Contract—Theatrical engagement—Agreement to advertise the performer—Refusal by employers to allow performer to play the part—Payment of full salary—Action for breach—Implied obligation to allow performer to act—Damages for loss of reputation.

The plaintiff, an actress, was engaged by the defendants to play a certain part in a play for the period of rehearsal and for the run of the play, and there was a collateral agreement that the defendants would advertise her in a prominent position. The defendants refused to allow the plaintiff to play the part, but they paid her the whole of her salary down to the end of the run of the play. In an action for breach of contract the jury awarded to the plaintiff, over and above her salary already paid, damages for loss of reputation through her not being employed to play the part. The defendants contended that under the written contract they were under no obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for loss of reputation.

Held, that as there was an express agreement to advertise the plaintiff this necessarily implied an obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and the plaintiff was entitled, in addition to her salary already paid, to the damages awarded by the jury for loss of reputation.

This was an action in which Miss Fay Marbe, an American actress, claimed damages against George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited.

The plaintiff claimed £5,000 damages for loss of publicity and injury to reputation; loss of salary at £100 per week during the run of Yvonne at Daly's Theatre; and damages for libel contained in a letter written by the defendant company on July 29, 1926.

The special jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, awarding her £3,000 damages for loss of reputation and £100 damages for libel over and above the £3,200 already paid by the defendants in respect of salary at £100 per week.

Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. Richard O'Sullivan appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., for the defendants.

Sir Patrick Hastings argued that Miss Marbe was entitled to recover the £3,000 for injury to her reputation. Miss Marbe's contract was of a peculiar nature. What had been called the "surrounding circumstances" were unusual.

His Lordship said he did not suppose that Mr. Neilson would dispute that Miss Marbe was a prominent actress in America and that she was over here seeking an engagement which would give her a reputation in this country.

Mr. Neilson said that he was not prepared to go beyond the evidence, and they had only the plaintiff's own testimony as to her reputation in America.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that the defendants knew that Miss Marbe had her reputation to make here. She secured this engagement and said that she would not undertake it unless she was to be advertised in a prominent position.

His Lordship.—I do not think that if she did not play they were to advertise her. If she had been taken ill she could not have been advertised to play.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that the contract was that she was to rehearse and act the part of Lolotte in a West-end theatre at such times as the management directed, and the engagement was for the run of the play. There was also, in the schedule of regulations, the "barring" clause which contracted for her exclusive services.

His Lordship asked whether there was in the contract anything else which showed directly an obligation on the defendants' part to employ the plaintiff.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that there was nothing else. The four material things to consider were: (1) That this was a theatrical engagement in which public appearance was essential, because the future of the person employed depended upon her appearing regularly; (2) that Miss Marbe came to this country with an established reputation to establish a reputation here; (3) that her services were to be exclusive; and (4) that there was an agreement to "bill" her in a prominent position.

Mr. Neilson submitted that there was no evidence of malice on the issue of libel.

His Lordship said that he had made it as clear as possible to the jury that the writing of the letter did not in itself imply a motive of malice, but that he would have to rule that as far as the evidence of malice went there was sufficient to go to the jury.

Mr. Neilson said that on the subject of the £3,000 damages for injury to reputation he agreed with Sir Patrick Hastings that the foundation of the claim was the contract. The only term imposed upon the management was to pay Miss Marbe her salary within the prescribed dates, and if there was no contract expressly made to employ her his Lordship would be very slow to imply such a term. One could read the contract without importing or implying any right of the plaintiff to play the part. The Court had no right in a written contract to imply any stipulation unless the necessary implication arose.

The agreement in this case left the discretion in the manager of the theatre to say when the actress was to play, and he submitted that there was no implication that she had the right to play. Miss Marbe was not entitled to have the contract construed in her favour simply because she happened to be an actress. If, as he contended, she had no right to play, she had no right to be "billed." It was inconceivable that she should be "billed" in a prominent place if she were not playing. The obligation was to "bill" her only if she played, and if it were contended that there was an oral term to the effect that she was to be "billed" if she was not playing, it was so contradictory of the written contract that it could not stand. There was no right on the part of the plaintiff to play at all, and therefore there could be no right to recover damages.

Where there had been held to be a right to play there had been always an express condition to that effect, and it was not implied merely because the plaintiff happened to be an actor or actress. There was in the written contract in this case nothing which imported an obligation on the part of the defendants to allow the plaintiff to play, and any oral agreement must be consistent with the written document. This contract followed the standard form recognized by all the London managers. It could not be said, because there was an agreement to put an actress in a prominent position on the bill, that that changed a contract, from a contract with a liability to pay, but with no obligation to allow the actress to play, into a contract involving not only liability to pay but a liability for enormous damages. He submitted that no such construction could be placed upon the contract in the present case.

Sir Patrick Hastings, in reply, said that the defendants engaged Miss Marbe to play the part of Lolotte for the run of Yvonne and to advertise her in a prominent position during the currency of the play. He submitted that that implied an obligation on the part of the defendants to allow the plaintiff to play. He asked his Lordship to find that Miss Marbe was an artist of position in America; that this was an important engagement for her as being her first opportunity of making her reputation in this country, Daly's Theatre being known as the home of musical comedy in England; and that in these circumstances the right to play was of great importance. He also asked his Lordship to find that it was not only important to Miss Marbe to play, but that it would be disastrous to her to have an engagement in this form and then not to be allowed to play. Having given the plaintiff the contract and "billed" her, the defendants would not allow her to play.

His Lordship, in his considered judgment, said that the claim was for (1) damages for breach of contract; and (2) damages for libel. As regarded the claim for libel he had held that there was evidence of publication to the typist, but that that did not do away with the privilege which would otherwise attach to the occasion of publication, and he therefore directed the jury that they must decide whether the document was defamatory and whether it was written with malice. The jury gave an affirmative answer on both these matters.

At the close of the case he held (1) that the only evidence of malice was that which appeared from the evidence of Mr. Paget that he had no belief in the truth of the matters stated in the document complained of, and (2) that on the plaintiff's case there would have been no evidence of malice. He (his Lordship) declined, however, to enter judgment for the defendants, the jury having found that the writer of the letter was actuated by malice, although the evidence of that malice appeared only from the defendants' case.

The other question was as to damages for breach of contract, and as to that the defendants contended that, as they had paid the plaintiff the whole of the salary which she should have earned during the run of the piece, no damages could be recovered by her in respect of the loss of reputation occasioned by her not being employed. That, no doubt, was the rule in an ordinary case of employer and employed (see Addis v. Gramophone Company, Limited, [1909] A.C., 488).

The jury assessed the damages at £3,000, and the question was then argued before him whether, in law, there was any obligation on the part of the defendants to employ the plaintiff to act in the character in which she had been engaged to play.

The contract in question was dated June 2, 1926, and under the provisions of it the plaintiff was employed to play the part of Lolotte in Yvonne for the period of rehearsal and for the run of the play. In his view, on the construction of the written contract, there was no obligation on the defendants to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting. It was, however, contended before him that an agreement to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting was to be implied from the nature of the employment coupled with the circumstances of the case. In The Moorcock (5 The Times L.R., 316; 14 P.D., 64) Lord Justice Bowen, at page 68, said:—

"I believe if one were to take all the cases, and they are many, of implied warranties or covenants in law, it will be found that in all of them the law is raising an implication from the presumed intention of the parties with the object of giving to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have."

The following facts seemed to him (Mr. Justice Horridge) to have been admitted in the evidence for the defendants; but, if not, they were inferences of fact which he, by consent of both parties, was empowered to draw, and did draw, from the whole of the evidence:—

1. The plaintiff was, and was known by both parties to be, an American actress of position. 2. It was important, and known to both parties to be important, for her to have the engagement with the defendants at Daly's Theatre under the agreement. 3. It was important, and known by both parties to be important, for her to be played as Lolotte. 4. It would be disastrous, and it was known to both parties that it would be disastrous, to her, if, after its being publicly known that she was engaged to play the part, she was subsequently not allowed to do so.

In addition to the foregoing facts, the jury found that there was a collateral agreement that, in consideration of the plaintiff's entering into the agreement, the defendants agreed to advertise her in a prominent position.

Two questions seemed to him to arise—(1) Was there an implied agreement? (2) Did the agreement to advertise necessarily import into the contract within the authority of Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited (10 The Times L.R., 583) an obligation to employ the plaintiff?

In the case of Fechter v. Montgomery (33 Beavan, 22) Sir John Romilly, M.R., held that there was imported into the agreement an obligation to give the defendant, an actor, a reasonable opportunity of playing. It was rather difficult to ascertain exactly the ground of that decision, but at page 26 it was stated:—

"But having regard to the situation of the parties, having regard to the nature of a contract of this description, and having regard also to the previous letter of June 21, 1862, written to Mr. Barnett, and the conversation which took place prior to this agreement being entered into, with respect to which conversation there does not appear to be much difference on either side, I am of opinion that it was an agreement entered into by Mr. Fechter to employ Mr. Montgomery, during a reasonable time, to act at this theatre."

It seemed clear that, inasmuch as the contract was reduced into writing, these matters could not have been gone into unless there had been the following words at the end of the written contract:—"it being thoroughly understood that no advantage will be taken of the confidence you have reposed in Mr. Fechter." If he (his Lordship) was right in this view, then there was clearly an antecedent agreement, set out at page 22 of the report, by which the plaintiff, Mr. Fechter, employed the defendant, Mr. Montgomery, to act; and the case would then have to be regarded as one in which the antecedent agreement formed part of the subsequent agreement.

In the case of Turpin v. Victoria Palace, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 548; [1918] 2 K.B. 539) Mr. Justice McCardie, in a careful judgment, held that the mere fact of the employment of an actor did not import into the agreement any obligation to give an opportunity of playing.

At page 545 he said:—

"Now I can see no reason at all in law to prevent a plaintiff, if the contract and circumstances be appropriate, from securing damages for the loss of advantageous publicity caused by a defendant's breach of contract."

In Turner v. Sawdon and Co. (17 The Times L.R., 645; [1901] 2 K.B., 653) Lord Justice Stirling, at page 659, said:—

"On the other hand, in the case of an actor who accepts an engagement, it may be an important consideration with him to have an opportunity of displaying his abilities before the public, and it may be that there is an implied obligation on the part of the master to afford such an opportunity."

In the present case, however, in addition to the importance of being actually allowed to play, there was the express agreement, which was in fact carried out, to advertise the plaintiff in a prominent position. In his view, it was necessary, with the object of giving business efficacy to the transaction, to imply an obligation on the part of the defendants to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting.

He was further of opinion that the case was governed by the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited (supra). In that case there was a proviso that the name was to be announced in the Standard and Daily Telegraph and on bills and programmes. At page 584 Mr. Justice Stirling said :—

"It was expressly stipulated that the plaintiff's name should appear as musical director, and what was intended was, that such a state of things should exist that the defendants should be in the position truly to make such an announcement, or, in other words, that they should employ him in that capacity."

In the present case the jury had found that there was a collateral agreement that the defendants would advertise the plaintiff in a prominent position, and the defendants were therefore bound to employ her so that such an advertisement would be true. He thought that it was clear from what Mr. Justice McCardie said in Turpin v. Victoria Palace, Limited (supra), at pages 545, 546, and 551, that if an agreement to advertise had been proved in that case he would have followed the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited (supra).

In his (Mr. Justice Horridge's) view, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the £3,000, and the £100 damages for libel, these sums being in addition to the moneys already paid her in respect of salary during the run of the play. The plaintiff must also have the costs of the action, including the costs of the further hearing.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for £3,100, with costs. A stay of execution was granted.

AUTO-MART (LONDON), LIMITED v. CHILTON AND OTHERS.*

Restraint of Trade—"Stop" list—Motor Trade Association—Alleged infringement of price regulations—Publication of name of alleged infringers in "stop" list—Interim injunction refused.

The plaintiffs had been members of the Motor Trade Association, of which the members were not permitted to sell certain motor-cars except at certain prices. The association sent a person to buy a car from the plaintiffs, and, on the ground that their price regulations had been infringed by the transaction, and that the plaintiffs refused to pay a sum in the nature of a fine to the association's indemnity fund, the association caused the name of the plaintiffs to be published in their "stop" list so as to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining supplies of goods from dealers or manufacturers. In an action against the officials of the association the plaintiffs applied for an interim injunction to restrain them from publishing the name of the plaintiffs in the "stop" list.

Held, on the authority of Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association and Others (37 The Times L.R., 213; [1921] 3 K.B., 40), that there was no prima facie case for granting an injunction, and the action must go to trial.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, Auto-Mart (London), Limited, of Finchley-road, Hampstead, in an action against John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, Percy Ingram Denyer, and Motor Commerce, Limited, for an interim injunction to restrain the first-named defendants, officials of the Motor Trade Association, pending trial of the action, from publishing the name of the plaintiff company in a "stop" or "black" list, or from publishing any statement calculated to prevent any person, firm, or company from dealing with the plaintiffs.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Harold Simmons appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Harold Murphy opposed the motion.

Sir Henry Slesser, in support of the motion, read the affidavit of Mr. George Sims, manager of the plaintiff company, which carried on the business of motor garage proprietors and dealers in motor-cars and accessories. On or about January 27, 1927, the plaintiffs became members of the Motor Trade Association, which purported to encourage and protect the motor industry in the United Kingdom and throughout the world, and to watch over and protect the interests of manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and users of motor goods and the interests of all others having commercial relations with the motor industry. The deponent was informed that the business of the association was substantially owned and controlled by the defendants, Chilton, Bennett and Denyer, for their own benefit and profit.

On March 23, 1927, Mr. Sims answered a telephone call from a man who stated that his name was Mason. He asked the price of an Erskine motor-car which was offered for sale and was told that the price was £295, plus an extra charge for certain accessories. After some discussion he asked whether a reduction could be made and was told that it could not.

On March 25 a woman called and, referring to Mr. Mason's telephone call, asked to see the car. Mr. Sims showed it to her and told her that the price was £295, together with £12 10s. for extras. She said that Mr. Mason had stated that he was in a position to get a discount of 7½ per cent. from some other firm, but Mr. Sims told her that they could not allow that discount. She said that the other firm had offered 7½ per cent., but that they could not give immediate delivery and that she was most anxious to have the car at once as Mr. Mason was making her a present of it.

Ultimately, Mr. Sims agreed to make her a present of the cost of registration to December 31, 1927, and of the number plate, which totalled £13 13s. She called again next day and said that Mr. Mason had given her cash to pay the deposit. She accordingly paid £12 12s. and arranged to call on the following

* Reported by W. E. Hurt, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday with the balance and to take the car away. She signed the registration form in the name of Mrs. E. Gardiner, Flat E, 12A, Colville-square.

On the following Monday she paid the balance of the purchase price, £294 18s. A receipt was made out for that amount, but she asked for a receipt including the registration charge and the number plate and was given one for £308 11s. She thereupon accepted delivery of the car.

On the following day the plaintiff company received from the Motor Trade Association a letter which stated that facts had been brought to the notice of the association which would be brought before the Stop List Committee of the association. They were invited to attend a meeting of the committee on the following Wednesday to give an explanation and Mr. Sims went. The three first-named defendants were present and Mr. Denyer read out the charge against the company. Mrs. Gardiner was then called on and she testified as to the sale and purchase of the motor-car.

In reply to Mr. Sims's questions, she admitted that she was in the employment of the association and that the association had supplied her with the purchase-money. She also admitted that he had told her that he could not sell the car under trade price and had called her attention to the association's certificate hanging on the walls of the plaintiffs' premises.

On March 31 the plaintiffs received a letter from the association which said that the committee had fully considered the evidence and had come to the conclusion that the infringement of their recognized principles of price regulation was proved to their satisfaction.

"The committee under all the circumstances are prepared to recommend to the council that if you will pay a sum of £250 to our Indemnity Fund (which is applied towards expenses) to mark your regret and sign the enclosed undertaking for publication in Motor Commerce this shall be regarded on this occasion as a satisfactory ending of the matter.

"This recommendation will come before the council on Thursday, April 7, 1927, at 10.30 a.m., and if confirmed we will notify you. It is open to you to attend before the council if you so desire, in which case please notify us of your intention."

The signatory to the form enclosed in the letter undertook strictly to observe the protected prices of motor-cars. At the end were the words :—"We enclose herewith cheque value £250 as a contribution to your Indemnity Fund and the proprietors of Motor Commerce are hereby authorized to insert this undertaking once."

On April 2 the plaintiffs wrote to the association as follows :—

"We duly received your letter of March 31 which we read with astonishment. The matter was considered at a board meeting of the company yesterday and we quote you the resolution which was then passed :—

"'That the methods pursued by the Motor Trade Association for carrying into effect their object, as revealed to the directors of this company, at the meeting with the council of the Motor Trade Association on March 30, 1927, are repugnant to the directors of this company, and the company, therefore, resign their membership of the association forthwith.'

"We, therefore, give you notice that this company resign their membership of the Motor Trade Association as from to-day, and we must, therefore, ask you to take our names from the register accordingly."

The plaintiffs wrote again to the association on April 6 explaining that the person to whom they sold the car was in the employ of the association and acted throughout on its behalf, the sale, therefore, being really to a member of the association itself; further, that the whole thing was at most a technical offence into which they (the plaintiffs) were persuaded by the association's agent in order to catch them when off their guard. They contended that the car did not come within their agreement at all.

In reply the association wrote on April 9 that at its council meeting on the previous Thursday the recommendation of the committee was adopted and confirmed.

Upon receipt of that letter the plaintiffs put the matter in the hands of their solicitors, who wrote to the association on April 12 that it was not the intention of the plaintiffs to pay the £250 to the Indemnity Fund.

On April 30 Motor Commerce published a "stop" list in which the name of the plaintiffs was included. The effect of the publication was that the plaintiffs' business was practically at a standstill as it was impossible to get supplies of goods from dealers or manufacturers.

Mr. Sims added that the statements of Mr. Mason and Mrs. Gardiner were false and misleading and he submitted that the conduct of the defendants was fraudulent and illegal.

Mr. MURPHY, for the defence, read an affidavit of Mr. Percy Ingram Denyer, of 157, Great Portland-street, W., one of the defendants, and "stop" list superintendent of the Motor Trade Association, who said that the right of the association to publish the "stop" list had more than once been the subject of judicial proceedings, notably in the case of Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association and Others (37 The Times L.R., 213; [1921] 3 K.B., 40), when the Court of Appeal decided in favour of the association as to the right of the association to publish the list. He denied that the association was owned or controlled by the individual defendants and went on to explain the circumstances which led up to the name of the plaintiffs being placed on the "stop" list. When Mr. Sims attended before the committee he made no attempt to deny the charge, but said that the members round the table were a lot of hypocrites.

SIR HENRY SLESSER argued that, prima facie, interference with any man's right to carry on business was unlawful if the means employed were unlawful. In this case the placing of the plaintiffs' name on the "black" or "stop" list was not a direct result of real adjudication. If the plaintiffs had been willing to pay the sum demanded the protection of the defendants' business would not have required the plaintiffs' being put on the list. The action of the defendants was really a threat or menace which the law did not allow. To put the plaintiffs' name on the list was not a bona fide necessity for the protection of the trade; for the defendants were willing to waive doing so if they could get the £250.

The injunction was sought because if relief was not given immediately there would be no business at all left to the plaintiffs; for no one would supply them with goods. In the case of Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association and Others (supra) the point was not taken as to the employment of criminal means by the association; otherwise the decision of the Court of Appeal might have been very different. If the relief sought for now could not be granted he asked that the trial might be expedited.

Mr. Murphy said that he could not consent to the removal of the plaintiffs' name from the "stop" list in the interim.

His Lordship said that he appreciated the reason for that.

Mr. Justice Clauson, in giving judgment refusing the application for the interim injunction, said that the plaintiffs asked for an order that the defendants, their servants, and agents might be restrained until after the trial of the action from publishing the name of the plaintiff company in a "stop" or "black" list, or from publishing any statement calculated to prevent any person or company from dealing with the plaintiffs.

The notice of motion set out other matters in connexion with which relief was sought, but Sir Henry Slesser had agreed to stop at that point.

The circumstances quite shortly were that the plaintiffs had been members of the Motor Trade Association, which was a combination of persons under the Trade Union Acts, and which had for its object the protection of motor traders. In particular, they considered that traders required protection in the matter of keeping up prices. The members were not permitted by the association to supply certain motor-cars at other than certain prices. If the cars were supplied at less prices the consequence would be that the offending person would be brought up before the committee of the association, and if the committee considered it desirable so to do the offender would be placed upon what was called a "stop" or "black" list, and this meant that a notice would be published in the organ of the association stating that the person in question was not to be supplied with cars or dealt with by the remaining members of the association.

In the present case the association thought that they had reason to suppose that the plaintiffs were infringing the association's price rules. They therefore proceeded to arrange that what might be described as a "trap" order might be given to the plaintiffs. Someone was sent to offer to buy a car from them, and was sent with the cognizance of the association. It was said that the plaintiffs agreed to sell a car to that person in such a manner as to infringe the association's regulations. The plaintiffs were given an opportunity of a hearing before the committee. It was decided that the regulations had been infringed and that the plaintiffs should be put upon the "black" list.

In accordance with the practice of the committee an opportunity was given to the plaintiffs of obtaining a reversal of that decision if they were prepared to give an undertaking thenceforward to carry out the association's price regulations and pay a sum in the nature of a fine to what was called an indemnity fund. That opportunity was offered, but was not taken and, in the result, the plaintiffs' name appeared on the "black" list in Motor Commerce of last Saturday.

The facts as he had stated them were, for any purpose with which he had to deal, indistinguishable from those in Ware and De Freville, Limited v. Motor Trade Association and Others (37 The Times L.R., 213; [1921] 3 K.B., 40). In the present case the alleged breach of the price rules arose from a "trap" order. That might have some significance when the case came to trial, but apart from that point the facts were not distinguishable on the face of them.

Something, however, had occurred since the case of Ware and De Freville (supra). In a somewhat similar case in which the association was concerned (Rex v. Denyer, 42 The Times L.R., 452; [1926] 2 K.B., 258) it had been held in a criminal Court that the process of giving an opportunity to an offending firm to have the decision reversed if they would pay a fine and undertake to conform to the price regulations amounted to the criminal offence of extorting money by menaces.

The attention of the Court of Appeal in the Ware and De Freville case (supra) was not drawn to the possibility that action of that kind might constitute an offence against the criminal law. Sir Henry Slesser sought to distinguish the present case from the Ware and De Freville case (supra) by pointing out that in this case he happened to be in a position to show that one of the steps taken by the association was a step which involved criminality, and he suggested that, if in the Ware and De Freville case (supra) there had been a similar circumstance amounting to criminality and if it had been pointed out to the Court of Appeal, that Court would have come to a different conclusion.

It would not be proper for him (his Lordship) to express any independent view of law on the matter, because it seemed to him that in the present case his duty was laid down for him by what happened in the Ware and De Freville case (supra). He could not hold that there was a prima facie case here for granting an injunction. It was not open to him, he conceived, to go behind the decision of the Court of Appeal and say that that Court, if its attention had been drawn to another point, would or ought to have come to a different conclusion. It was on that ground that he was not at liberty to grant the plaintiffs the injunction which they claimed. His decision was that the Ware and De Freville case (supra), as a decision of the Court of Appeal, bound him to hold on the facts before him that the plaintiffs had no legal ground for relief, and therefore he made no order on the motion for an interim injunction.

If it were a case in which leave to appeal was required he would grant it, but he did not think that it was. As to procedure, it appeared that both parties were anxious to bring the case to trial as soon as possible, but the remaining defendants must enter an appearance at once. There was no reason why there should not be a summons for directions. There would be an order for pleadings in the action to be delivered within seven days; there would be a like time for the defence and seven days for reply. There would be a cross-order for discovery as soon as the pleadings were closed. There would be liberty to apply to advance the hearing as soon as the action was set down. The costs of both parties would be costs in the action, and there would be leave to appeal, if necessary. There would be no order on the motion.

Negligence — Spectator on golf course — Injury by player.

The plaintiff, while she was carrying the defendant's golf clubs on a golf course, was struck with a golf club by the defendant when she (the defendant) was demonstrating a stroke to the plaintiff's brother, with whom the defendant was playing. In an action for damages for personal injuries caused by negligence the jury found that the defendant was guilty of negligence which brought about the accident, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence and did not take the risk of such an accident by going on the course as a spectator, and they awarded the plaintiff damages.

* Reported by J. W. Hall and T. R. F. Butler, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Held, that there was no reason why the defendant should be excused merely because the accident took place in the course of recreation rather than of work, and that, as the plaintiff had not agreed, by going on the course as she did, to take the risk of being injured by negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

In this action Miss Jeanie Cameron Cleghorn, of 135, Osborne-road, Forest Gate, E., claimed damages for personal injuries from Miss Cicely Mary Oldham, of St. Clement's House, Bolsover-street, W. The plaintiff alleged that on September 7, 1925, she was negligently struck on the face by a golf club on the West Runton Golf Course by the defendant, who was demonstrating a stroke to the plaintiff's brother. As a result the plaintiff suffered severe injuries and was away from her work as a clerk in the actuarial department of an insurance office for 13 months. The defendant denied negligence, and pleaded contributory negligence.

Mr. Martin O'Connor appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., for the defendant.

The plaintiff, giving evidence, said that Miss Oldham was playing with the witness's brother and that she (the witness) was carrying Miss Oldham's clubs. At the 12th or 13th tee Miss Oldham drove from the ladies' tee quite well. The witness's brother made a bad drive from the men's tee. Miss Oldham said: "This is the way to do it," and played a stroke at an imaginary ball. She struck the plaintiff at the end of the "follow through" and the plaintiff was knocked down and became unconscious. When she came round she heard Miss Oldham say: "What have I done? I am sorry." A doctor was found, who took her home in his car and attended her for a week. She returned to work, but became too ill to go on and was away from January 1, 1926, to January 24, 1927.

In answer to Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON, the witness said that she used to play hockey, but had never played golf.

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON.—Is there not an element of danger in all games, which adds to the enjoyment?

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT.—You are not suggesting that people enjoy their golf more because they may be driven into? The language that one hears does not suggest that it is pleasurable.

The witness said that she and Miss Oldham were standing on the ladies' tee and saw Mr. Cleghorn's ball "trickling off to the right."

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON.—A familiar sight, at least when I play.

The witness said that Miss Oldham did not address the ball before she made the stroke.

Mr. O'CONNOR, re-examining.—It is suggested that Miss Oldham spoke to an imaginary ball——

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT.—You do not speak to the ball before you drive; you speak to it after you drive. You are thinking of "addressing" a jury, which is one thing; "addressing" a ball is another.

After corroborative evidence had been given for the plaintiff,

Miss Oldham gave evidence. At the 12th or 13th tee she watched Mr. Cleghorn's drive, which was rather a bad one. She walked down from her tee and as she walked down she called out: "Look, this is how it should be done." She "addressed" an imaginary ball and played the stroke. She must have struck the plaintiff at the very end of the stroke. Her eye was on the "ball." She had no conversation with Miss Cleghorn as she walked from the tee and had no idea that she had followed. Naturally, she said that she was sorry, as anyone would do if he accidentally hurt someone in playing a game.

In cross-examination, Miss Oldham said that the plaintiff had been carrying her (witness's) clubs for some time and had walked along beside her, but she did not expect the plaintiff to follow when she walked back towards Mr. Cleghorn's tee. Witness never said: "I know I should have looked." "One does not always look," said the witness, "before striking; one expects people to get out of the way."

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON submitted that a person who voluntarily took part in a game, even as a spectator, took the risks incidental to the game and could not bring an action, even if a player was negligent; to support such an action there must be deliberate violence or foul play. He referred to Reid v. Mitchell (22 Sc.L.R., 748); Giles v. London County Council (68 J.P., 10), Pollock on Torts, 12th ed., p. 164.

The questions left to the jury, with their answers, were:—

(1) Was the defendant guilty of negligence which brought about the accident?—Yes.

(2) Was the plaintiff herself guilty of negligence?—No.

(3) Did the plaintiff, by going on the course as a spectator in the way she did, take the risk of such an accident?—No.

(4) Damages, if any?—£150.

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON submitted that the question whether there was or was not a duty upon the defendant to take care in the particular circumstances was a question of law and not of fact. The plaintiff had placed herself on a golf course and the risk of such a blow as she received was to be expected. On that view of the case, whether the plaintiff consciously assented to the risk or not, she could not be heard to complain if, after going on to a dangerous place, she was hit. It was true that in Abbott v. Isham (37 The Times L.R., 7) Mr. Justice Horridge had taken the view that the question whether a plaintiff had voluntarily incurred the risk or not was one of fact for the jury. On the question what amounted to a voluntary incurring of risk he referred to Ilott v. Wilkes (3 B. and Ald., 304).

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT.—In that case the plaintiff was a trespasser. Here, so far as the defendant was concerned, she was lawfully on the golf links and I think that she was there by invitation. When you and I were young, we should have called her the chaperon, but I understand that such persons do not exist nowadays.

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON.—I contend that here there was no duty on the defendant to give any warning.

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT.—Is there any difference between negligence arising from the playing of games and negligence arising from any other transaction?

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON.—My answer to that would be that in a game persons submit to the course of excitement arising during the game and to the normal incidents thereof, and, indeed, to everything except violence or unfairness. There was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant to go to the jury. The question whether the plaintiff voluntarily undertook the risk did not arise, it being clear that she was on the course for the purpose of assisting in the game and knew that at any place a golfer might swing a club.

Mr. Martin O'Connor was not called on to argue.

Mr. Justice Swift, in giving judgment, said that counsel for the defendant had sought to draw a distinction between accidents arising from the playing of games and accidents occurring in other transactions of life, and it appeared to have been suggested that the ordinary rules of law in relation to negligence did not apply to the playing of games. He could not see that any such distinction existed. In playing games, as in other transactions of life, a person must abstain from doing what a reasonable person would not do, and if a jury came to the conclusion that a person had done something which a reasonable player in the circumstances would not have done and if injury had resulted therefrom, that person was liable in an action for negligence.

Games might be, and were, the serious business of life to many people. It would be extraordinary to say that people could not recover for injuries sustained in the business of life, whether that was football, or motor-racing, or any other of those pursuits which were instinctively classed as games but which everyone knew quite well to be serious business transactions for the persons engaged therein.

He could well understand that in the playing of games, as in other transactions of life, many accidents might happen for which no one could be held responsible, and the person who sustained the injury had then to bear the brunt of it. But where it could be proved that the accident was due to the negligence of the person who was sued as defendant, there was no reason why that person should be excused merely because the transaction in which the accident had taken place was recreation rather than work.

It had been suggested here that the plaintiff voluntarily undertook the risk. He had been inclined before his attention had been directed to the matter to think that the question was one of fact for the jury, and accordingly he left to them the question: "Did the plaintiff, by going on the course as a spectator in the way she did, take the risk of such an accident?" and they returned the answer "No." If, however, it were to be regarded as a question of law, he was equally of opinion that the plaintiff did not undertake the risk. A person who went on to a golf course, just as a person who crossed the street, took certain risks inherent to the place where he was. A ball might be driven without negligence and strike a spectator or player. A club might break without any fault on the part of the person using it, and someone might be injured by the flying head. But if negligence could never be brought home to anybody, an injured person could not recover. No authority had been cited for the proposition that a person ever took the risk of anybody being negligent unless there was an express agreement on proper facts to that effect.

There was here no ground for saying that the plaintiff voluntarily undertook the risk of an accident such as she met with. There was clearly evidence to go to the jury, and judgment for the plaintiff must be entered, in accordance with their verdict, for £150 and costs.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) 1927. Apr. 8.

TALLACK v. TALLACK AND BROEKEMA.*

Divorce — Jurisdiction — Husband's petition—Settlement by guilty wife on children—No property within the jurisdiction—Powers of English Court—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 191 (i).

The petitioner, the husband, obtained a decree absolute for divorce against his wife, the respondent, and was awarded £1,000 damages against the co-respondent. Subsequently the respondent married the co-respondent, a domiciled Dutchman, and she was now resident in Holland. The respondent paid the damages into Court out of her separate estate, and she obtained leave to enter an appearance so that she might be heard on the question of their payment out. The petitioner, by leave, then presented a petition for an order that the respondent should make a settlement on the two children, and the respondent entered an appearance to this petition. The Registrar reported that the respondent had an income of £500 a year, mainly from foreign investments, and he submitted that the £1,000 damages should be paid out to the petitioner and that the respondent should be ordered to settle £100 a year on each child. The petitioner moved to confirm the report as to the damages and to vary it by an order on the respondent to lodge in Court £4,000 to be settled on the children. The respondent opposed the motion on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to make the variation asked for.

Held, that the £1,000 damages ought to be paid out of Court to the petitioner, but that, as the respondent was not domiciled in England and had no property in England, and as her appearance was not entered to meet the claim made on the motion and was qualified by a denial of jurisdiction, there should be no order on the respondent to settle money on the children or to lodge money in Court for the purpose of such a settlement.

This was a motion to vary the Registrar's report on a petition for a settlement of part of a wife respondent's property for the benefit of the children of the marriage. The petitioner, Reginald Grant Tallack, was married at the British Consulate, Cairo, on July 12, 1912, to Bernardine Christine Hermance Betz, spinster. There were two children of the marriage, a girl born on August 14, 1916, and a boy born on July 6, 1919. The wife left the petitioner in March, 1923. The husband, who was domiciled in England, on April 1, 1924, filed a petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with Gerard Willem Broekema. On October 17, 1924, he was granted a decree nisi, which was made absolute on July 27, 1925, and was granted

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£1,000 damages against the co-respondent. The damages were paid into Court by the wife out of her separate estate, and on March 23, 1926, a summons was issued on her behalf for leave to enter an appearance in the suit, notwithstanding decree absolute, so that she might be heard on the question of payment out of Court of these damages and on the question of access to the children. Leave to enter an appearance so limited was granted. On April 8, 1926, a summons was issued on the petitioner's behalf for the payment out of Court of the £1,000 to himself and for leave to present a petition for a settlement on the children. This leave was granted, and on June 29, 1926, the petitioner presented a petition for this settlement, and to this the wife filed an answer asking that the £1,000 be settled on the children. The petition was heard by the Registrar on January 31 and February 9, 1927.

In his report the Registrar found that the petitioner's income was about £515 a year, and that the cost of the children's maintenance and education was computed at £300 a year. The respondent's property consisted mainly of foreign investments. The capital was about £9,000, bringing in £500 a year. The Registrar submitted that the £1,000 damages should be paid out to the petitioner ; that the respondent be ordered to settle £100 per annum upon each of the children of the marriage for life and that out of such sums the premiums upon the educational policies be paid ; and that the respondent pay the costs of the proceedings out of her separate estate. The petitioner moved to confirm the report as to payment out of Court of the £1,000 damages and as to the settlement to vary the report as follows : That the respondent be ordered to lodge in Court £4,000, half of which should be settled on each child for life, the educational premiums to be paid out of the income.

Mr. R. Ritson appeared for the petitioner ; and Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., Dr. W. R. Bisschop, and Mr. C. C. Trotter for the respondent.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy raised an objection that the Court had no jurisdiction with regard to the proposed settlement. The respondent's domicile of origin was Holland, and since her marriage to the co-respondent, a Dutchman domiciled in Holland, in August, 1925, she had gone back to live in Holland and was domiciled there. The Dutch Court refused to recognize any judgment of a foreign Court against a Dutch national, and there was a special jurisdiction as to divorce in Holland. Moreover, the respondent's property was not within the jurisdiction. The respondent under the law of Holland had to provide for her second husband (a Delft undergraduate at the time of their marriage), and the Registrar had ordered her to pay too much. There was no case where an order had been made for a lump sum to be paid into Court. It was quite a novel proceeding to be required to pay money into Court before a settlement order was made. The respondent had appeared under protest to the settlement petition all along.

Dr. Bisschop addressed the Court as to the effect of foreign judgments in Dutch law. The general principle, he said, was laid down in Article 431 of the Civil Code, which said :—

"Except in such cases as are expressly mentioned by Statute no judgments rendered by foreign judges or courts are executable within the kingdom. Proceedings may be dealt with afresh and disposed of before the Netherlands judge.

"In the above-mentioned exceptional cases the judgments of foreign judges or Courts shall not be executed within the kingdom unless previously leave for execution has been petitioned for . . . and obtained from the Court in which such judgment is to be executed. When such petition is heard and granted the facts of the case itself are not newly considered."

Up to 1924 the Dutch Courts held that after foreign judgments the parties must proceed de novo. In a decision of the Dutch Supreme Court dated November 14, 1924, In re Platt, a Dutch creditor had sued his debtor in England, but failed to obtain a judgment. He then sued the same debtor before a Dutch Court. But the Dutch Supreme Court held that as the plaintiff had chosen the English forum he was bound by the English judgment. This decision created a doubt as to the position of an English plaintiff and a Dutch defendant in an English Court. In the Court of Appeal at Amsterdam, on October 16, 1926, a decision was given in the case of Schenker v. Dexter, Ltd. Judgment had been given against the Dutch defendant in an English Court. The English plaintiffs tried to enforce the judgment in Holland by an action in that country founded on the English judgment. The Court of Appeal held that this could not be done, as it would be a contravention of Article 431. By Dutch law the party in divorce who was granted custody of the children could secure maintenance for the latter from the other party only during their minority, but on reaching full age they could themselves sue for maintenance. Guardianship Councils assisted the Courts in every district in this respect, and it was their duty to take proceedings for maintenance under Articles 285 (c) and 374 (g) of the Civil Code.

If the English Court gave a decision in the present case as to a settlement of the respondent's property on the children, the Dutch Court would not recognize it. Moreover, settlements and trusts in these circumstances were not recognized by Dutch law. Article 286 of the Civil Code, on the other hand, provided that divorce should not deprive the children of any advantages secured to them by law or by the marriage articles of their parents.

Mr. Ritson submitted for the petitioner that under section 191, sub-section 1, of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the Court could order a settlement of this kind. The sub-section said :—

"If it appears to the Court in any case in which the Court pronounces a decree for divorce or for judicial separation by reason of the adultery of the wife that the wife is entitled to any property either in possession or reversion, the Court may, if it thinks fit, order such settlement as it thinks reasonable to be made of the property, or any part thereof, for the benefit of the innocent party, and of the children of the marriage. . . ."

Counsel submitted that the petitioner could not now object to the jurisdiction, having entered an unconditional appearance. Under Divorce Rule 16 (a) an appearance under protest had to be accompanied with a concise statement of the grounds of such protest. The Court had power to make a personal order.

Lord Merrivale.—The respondent is not within the jurisdiction and you are asking the Court to bring her within the jurisdiction.

Mr. Ritson referred to Lorriman v. Lorriman and Clair (24 The Times L.R., 575 ; [1908] P., 282).

Lord Merrivale.—In that case there was a specific fund with a vested interest and the fund was within the jurisdiction. The crux of this case is that the property is entirely outside the jurisdiction.

MR. RITSON said that the respondent might in the future have some property in this country. If a personal order were granted the petitioner might sue on it when the opportunity occurred. He argued that the inference from the evidence as to Dutch law was not well founded.

LORD MERRIVALE.—I agree that it would be unjust to defeat the possibility of proceedings in Holland on the ground of res judicata in England, but process taken in Holland would not be prejudiced by a suspended state of proceedings here.

MR. RITSON in conclusion invoked the principle that the innocent party and children should not be adversely affected by the breaking up of the marriage, and referred to Noel v. Noel (10 P.D., 179) and March v. March and Palumbo (L.R., 1 P. and D., 440).

LORD MERRIVALE delivered a considered judgment as follows :—

The matters in question in this case arise under the power which was granted to the Court by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 45, and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, sections 6 and 7, to order a settlement of property of a wife divorced for adultery for the benefit of her husband or children. The sections in question are now embodied in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 191, subsection 1. Questions of difficulty arise which are not provided for in terms in the statutes, and as to which there is no authority in decided cases.

After reciting the facts leading up to the divorce and the payment of the damages into Court, the President said :—

The co-respondent was and is without means. The respondent had in 1912 investments of the value, as is said, of about £12,000. She has at present, as has been found upon inquiry in the registry, investments of a capital value of about £9,000 which yield an income of about £500 a year.

In April, 1926, some months after the dissolution of the marriage of 1912, the petitioner in the usual way issued a summons for directions as to the disposal of the money paid into Court in respect of damages. Without such an application this sum could not be appropriated. This money had been in Court since November, 1924. In March, 1926, the respondent had applied by summons for liberty to enter an appearance in the suit, notwithstanding decree absolute, "so that she might be heard on the question of payment out of Court of the damages and on the question of access to the children of the marriage." Leave to enter an appearance so limited had been granted. Each party filed evidence. The respondent alleged that the £1,000 in Court had been provided by her and paid into Court under an arrangement that the sum should be settled on the children of the marriage. This the petitioner and his solicitors denied.

The petitioner's summons came to a hearing and the petitioner then applied for and obtained leave to file a petition asking that the respondent should "make a settlement on each of the children of the marriage" and that the summons should stand over generally. A petition was in due course filed, the material allegations in which were that there were two children of the marriage, and that the respondent was possessed of stocks, shares, and other property of her own exceeding £12,000 in value, from which she derived an annual income of £600. No mention was made of the re-marriage of the respondent or of her domicil.

To this petition so filed the respondent in September, 1926, by the solicitors who had acted for her in the previous proceedings, entered an appearance. The appearance so voluntarily entered is relied upon by the petitioner as a submission by the respondent to the decision by the Court on claims of considerable variety made by the petitioner against the respondent in personam and in respect of her property. Stress is laid upon the fact of an unconditional appearance for reasons based on Matrimonial Causes Rules 15 and 16 ; these, however, apply as the context shows, to appearance in a suit. The rules as to petitions like the present are Rules 71 and 72.

The answer of the respondent to this petition for settlement was duly sworn and filed, and after setting out the state of her means, the terms of a settlement made by her upon her re-marriage, and the existence of insurance policies obtained at her cost by way of help toward the education of the children, it concludes by asking that the £1,000 in Court shall be settled upon them.

When the matters raised by the petition and answer came in the usual course before the Registrar for inquiry and report, counsel appeared for the respondent and objected that the Court had no jurisdiction to order a settlement of her property, she being domiciled in Holland and having property only in Holland, as is set forth in the report of the learned Registrar ; counsel stated that he "appeared to the petition for settlement under protest as to the jurisdiction of the English Court to order a settlement of the wife's property."

His Lordship proceeded to recite the report of the Registrar and the petitioner's present motion, and pointed out that the petition to which the respondent appeared did not contain the petitioner's present claim for the payment of £4,000 into Court to be settled on the children. His Lordship continued :—

At the hearing of the motion counsel appeared for the petitioner to support his new application. Counsel appeared for the respondent to protest against the exercise of the jurisdiction over the respondent's property in Holland, and to resist the application for payment out of the £1,000 in Court. On the respondent's behalf evidence was given of Dutch law in explanation of the effect of marriage in Holland upon property possessed by either spouse at the time of marriage, and as to a jurisdiction existent in Holland under which orders could be made against parents in respect of children, special local committees being entrusted with this authority. Information was given on both sides as to the details and whereabouts of the respondent's property.

Under the Dutch Code of Civil Procedure execution may not be had in Holland under foreign judgments except in cases expressly provided for by Netherlands law. Proceedings in other than the excepted cases must be taken anew before one of the local Courts. No suggestion was made before that the present case falls within any statutory exceptions. It was shown, however, that under Dutch law a citizen of the Netherlands who brings an action in England and fails on the merits, could be precluded from suing again in Holland in respect of the same alleged cause of action. It was also shown that notwithstanding an appearance and defence in an action brought in England against a Dutch citizen certain Netherlands tribunals hold themselves bound to refuse to enforce the judgment, as such, leaving the plaintiff, if he so desires, to proceed de novo in Holland to enforce his claim.

As regards settlement of property between spouses and disputes between parents as to their obligations towards their children, the evidence was that no jurisdiction such as that invoked in the present case exists in Holland, and that the "Guardianship Councils" which are appointed by the State in each district, to deal with such questions, have power only to direct periodical payments for the maintenance of children.

The evidence given on the respondent's behalf satisfies me that as between Dutch spouses, whether during marriage or after divorce, no orders as to property such as are here sought by the petitioner could be made by any Court in the Netherlands, that no Judge or Court there would or could under the Civil Code give effect to an order made here in terms of the petitioner's application.

No evidence was given of the existence in England of any property of the respondent in respect of which an order of this Court could be enforced. In replying to the argument made on behalf of the respondent counsel for the petitioner accepted the conclusion that no such property exists, and so far as regards this claim for a settlement the petitioner relied upon a contention that the respondent had voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court by her entry of an unconditional appearance to the petition, and that in a proceeding in personam such a submission binds the party to the acceptance of the eventual judgment of the Court.

The dispute which has arisen between the parties as to the sum of £1,000 paid into Court under the decree as to damages had been inconveniently, and perhaps not without intent, linked up by the petitioner's advisers for discussion and decision along with the question of settlement. I will dispose of it now. In view of the petitioner's evidence and the findings of fact in the report and the situation of the children of the marriage the proper order to be made is that proposed by the Registrar for payment out of the £1,000 in question to the petitioner.

The remaining questions upon the petitioner's motion depend upon the meaning and effect of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 191, subsection 1, construed as part of the English law of divorce. To what extent can an English Court consistently with the general principles of International law which govern national jurisdictions—apart from submission by the respondent—exercise jurisdiction in personam over a respondent domiciled abroad so as to bind him or her by its decree, or to establish a charge upon his or her property or alter his or her proprietary rights in property outside the jurisdiction? Does the appearance of a foreign subject before the Court for the purpose of disputing the jurisdiction empower the Court to adjudicate upon claims against him so as to bind him by a judgment in personam? Is the claim of the petitioner here a claim in an action in personam? If the Court has and ought to exercise jurisdiction in personam in such a case can it and ought it to assume power to alter the property in the respondent's assets not within its jurisdiction?

The relevant sections of the statutes are the first matter for consideration. Their effect is perhaps somewhat misunderstood. It is probably correct to say that section 45 of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 neither created a cause of action nor set up a new right in equity. In 1857 and long afterwards a delinquent wife so long as she was covert could not be sued. Nor was any equitable tribunal empowered to treat her matrimonial offence as founding any pecuniary demand or interest in her property. The power given to the Court in divorce to redistribute and settle property of a wife because of a matrimonial offence was absolutely none. The jurisdiction was statutory and had no precedent in the Ecclesiastical Courts. It was anomalous in that nothing like it existed at common law or in equity. In some respects it was penal.

One of the difficulties in the present case could not arises under the Act of 1857, because the respondent, being a domiciled Englishwoman by reason of her marriage, was manifestly subject to the jurisdiction of the Court until after the decree of dissolution of marriage. A decree of dissolution was made under that Act upon the hearing of the petition. The decree nisi was introduced by the Act of 1860. The jurisdiction as to property remains a jurisdiction to be exercised when the decree absolute is made. The intervening period is available for any interlocutory proceedings which may be sanctioned. One unforeseen difficulty under the Act of 1857 was provided against under the Act of 1860, section 6, namely, that, notwithstanding any new coverture in the case of a divorced woman indentured as to her property, any instrument made pursuant to an order of the Court should be deemed valid and effectual. Bearing in mind that the jurisdiction in divorce is limited to England and Wales and is dependent on domicile, it cannot, I think, be said that the statutory authority invoked by the petitioner is, on the face of it, necessarily an authority which extends to a woman, whether feme sole or feme covert, not in fact domiciled here. It is perhaps not immaterial on this question of construction that the power which was conferred on the Court by statute for service of process out of the jurisdiction (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 42) is a power in relation to the petition in a suit and to a proceeding such as is under consideration here.

As to the property of a guilty wife which is subjected by the statute in question to the jurisdiction of the Court, it is sufficient to say generally that, prima facie, what is dealt with is property of a woman domiciled in England subject by reason of her domicile to the jurisdiction of English tribunals.

Apart from any submission by the respondent to the jurisdiction sought to be invoked and in the absence of express statutory provision which directs the exercise of the jurisdiction over a respondent not domiciled in England or in respect of property beyond the jurisdiction, the power of the Court to do that which is prayed by the petitioner depends upon general principles, based in part at least on the comity of civilized States. Sir Albert Dicey, in his work "The Conflict of Laws" (4th Edition, at pages 27 and 33), states two applicable principles in these words:—

"General Principle No. II.—English Courts will not enforce a right otherwise duly acquired under the law of a foreign country: . . . (c) where the enforcement of such right involves interference with the authority of a foreign state within the limits of its territory.

"General Principle No. III.—The Courts of any country have jurisdiction over (i.e., have a right to adjudicate upon) any matter with regard to which they can give an effective judgment, and have no jurisdiction over (i.e., have no right to adjudicate upon) any matter with regard to which they cannot give an effective judgment."

Applying the first of the tests stated by Sir Albert Dicey, I think it is clear that the property in Holland of the respondent, a married woman and domiciled in Holland, cannot be partitioned by an English Court without infringing the authority of the Netherlands law over the domestic affairs of females domiciled in Holland. To apply the second test formulated by Sir Albert Dicey, this question must be answered: Can this Court give an effective judgment as to the respondent's property so as to bind the property? It is not clear that the judicial tribunals of the Netherlands are able to give effect at all to judgments of foreign Courts, even in personal actions, against defendants living in Holland. But having regard to the terms of the Civil Code, and the statement of Dr. Bisschop, I am satisfied that a decree of this Court purporting to partition the property of the respondent would be an idle and wholly ineffectual process.

Reference may perhaps be usefully made on this part of the matter to the case of Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote (10 The Times L.R., 621; [1894] A.C., 670).

The application of the petitioner for an order for the payment into Court was used as the basis of an argument that, even if a decree here for settlement of the respondent's property would be ineffectual in Holland, an order upon her for payment into Court of a sum of money with a view to an order later for a settlement would come within the description of a judgment in personam, and ought therefore to be made. The respondent, it was said, has appeared and is subject to a personal judgment; such a judgment should be granted ex debito justitiæ, even though she may not obey it and no execution upon it may be obtainable. This contention fails on various grounds. The prayer of the petition as filed set forth no cause of action which would found an action in personam properly so called. (Sydney Municipal Council v. Cook or Bull, 25 The Times L.R., 6; [1909] 1 K.B., 7.) The respondent's appearance to the petition was not an appearance to meet the present claim. I am not persuaded that an appearance to such a petition as the present, qualified at all stages of the case by a distinct and reasoned denial of the existence of jurisdiction, could with any propriety be regarded as a submission to the exercise of the jurisdiction so denied.

I am satisfied that the proposed interlocutory order would not be enforced in Holland. I was referred by way of authority to cases in this Court where jurisdiction undoubtedly existed—March v. March and Palumbo (L.R., 1 P. and D., 440), Noel v. Noel (10 P.D., 179), Lorriman v. Lorriman and Clair (24 The Times L.R., 575; [1908] P., 282), and Ponsonby v. Ponsonby (9 P.D., 122).

Such cases throw no light on the question really at issue. There is some guidance perhaps in some old authorities where with regard to disputed jurisdiction the principle was discussed before the existing rules as to jurisdiction were formulated. In Carteret v. Petty (2 Swanston, 323) a defendant resident in Ireland who appeared before the Court of Chancery and demurred to the jurisdiction, was ordered to answer a bill for waste committed in Ireland, because wheresoever the defendant may by personal coercion be compelled to perform the Act decreed, there, after answer put in, the Court shall proceed to a decree. In Foster v. Vassall (3 Atkyns, 588) the same point is stated in respect of suits in equity as to matters outside the jurisdiction, in these words: "As the defendant is here the Courts do agere in personam and may by compulsion on the person and process of the Court compel him to do justice."

Lord Mansfield, in Mostyn v. Fabrigas (1 Cowp., 161), drawing the distinction as regards presence and absence of jurisdiction, and contrasting actions for personal wrongs and actions in respect of property abroad—in that case realty—used these words at p. 176: "The substantial distinction is where the proceeding is in rem, and where the effect of the judgment cannot be had if it" (i.e., the proceeding) "is laid in a wrong place."

The compulsory process referred to in the Chancery cases is not available here at the instance of the petitioner. The respondent is beyond our reach. Nor has she appeared in a suit so framed with regard to a personal cause of action that after judgment attachment would be the penalty of default of obedience. I have purposely refrained from consideration of the proper order for settlement if such an order could properly be made.

It was ultimately urged on the petitioner's behalf that ex debito justitiæ some order ought to be made on the prayer of the motion with its amended claim, so as to enable the petitioner to take proceedings at his own risk in Holland, and alternatively it was submitted that no final judgment adverse to the petitioner's claim should be made in case hereafter he may find the respondent possessed of property within the jurisdiction. To the first submission I am unable to accede. As to the second, any inchoate rights which the petitioner may have under the statute will be sufficiently considered if I limit the operative order of the Court to that part of the Registrar's report which relates to the disposal of the damages, and as to the rest of the petition declare that in the absence of evidence of the existence within the jurisdiction of any property of the respondent subject to be dealt with thereunder the Court makes no order. The order to be drawn up will be framed accordingly.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE MINES DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS v. ELWELL AND SONS.*

Rating — Statutory body — Mine drainage — Power to levy rate—Mortgage of future rates — Cessation of drainage works — Survival of rating powers — South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923.

A body of Commissioners was created by statute for the purpose of underground and surface drainage of a mining area, with power to levy rates upon occupiers of mines. Power was also given them to borrow money upon mortgage of the produce of future rates, and this power was exercised. Owing to financial and other difficulties the Commissioners ceased to carry on drainage operations in 1919. In 1926 they levied a rate upon the defendants as occupiers of mines in their area. In an action by the Commissioners for the amount of the rate,

Held, that they were entitled to levy the rate notwithstanding the cessation of drainage operations.

This was a claim by the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Commissioners for £2,019 13s. 9d. arrears of drainage rates. The facts appear fully in the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. H. H. Joy, K.C., and Mr. R. A. Willes appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. L. J. Sturge for the respondents. Mr. Tristram Beresford held a watching brief for Lord Dudley.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are a statutory body, sue the defendants for certain sums alleged to be due as rates pursuant to the statutory powers of the plaintiff body. That body was constituted by an Act of Parliament of 1873, called the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Act. There is a series of eight Acts, beginning with that first one of 1873 and ending with the eighth, of 1923. It is provided by the first section of the Act of 1923 that this series of eight Acts shall be cited together as the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923.

The purpose of the original incorporation of the plaintiff body was with a view to providing drainage of water for the South Staffordshire Coalfield. The scheme of it was that the Commissioners were to provide drainage of two sorts—first, surface drainage, and, secondly, underground or mine drainage. They were, by certain machinery provided in this first Act, to divide up the whole of the South Staffordshire Coalfield into certain districts, which districts were to be treated as separate entities. It was provided by section 40 of the Act of 1873 that any particular district by a vote of its electoral members could contract itself out of the operations of the Commissioners as regards the underground mines drainage, though it remained liable to support the Commissioners and to pay rates in respect of the surface drainage. There were, as I understand, some five districts created under this first Act, and the one I am concerned with in this case is the Tipton District. The other four districts I think—I have not heard much about them because they are not primarily concerned—did contract themselves out of the underground operations of the Commissioners for the mines drainage, and only remained in the scheme as regards the surface drainage; the Tipton district came in, or remained in the scheme both as regards the mines drainage and the surface drainage.

In the history of the operations of the Commissioners, especially as regards the Tipton district, they were faced to an increasing degree as time went on with two difficulties—first, the difficulty of the water which defied their efforts to pump it or drain it, but, still more seriously, the increasing flood not of water but of indebtedness, and that arose more acutely as regards the Tipton district. The last five of the Acts I have referred to, the Acts of 1891, 1894, 1904, 1914, and 1923, are all concerned solely with the troubles of the Tipton district. Those difficulties, particularly as regards indebtedness, culminated in 1919 in this disaster. The Commissioners were unable, despite several schemes which in those successive Acts had been provided, to raise more money, and the water was becoming increasingly difficult to deal with, and in 1919, as regards the Tipton district, the whole of their pumps and apparatus for the underground mines drainage broke down and were disused, and as from August 31, 1919, there was no more pumping; but under provisions in several of these Acts the Commissioners have raised money by mortgaging the future produce of the rates they were entitled to levy and issued mortgage debentures to various people who lent them the money, and since 1919, though no mines drainage has been done in the Tipton or any other district by the Commissioners, they have continued to levy rates in the manner prescribed by the Acts in order to provide funds, not so much for paying off the capital sum of the indebtedness—because that is beyond their powers—but to keep down the ever-increasing burden of interest upon it.

Now the particular provision as regards the power of the Commissioners to levy rates was originally provided in sections 42 and 43 of the Act of 1873, as amended by section 23 of the Act of 1878, the second one. By the original sections 42 and 43 of the Act of 1873, the Commissioners were given power in respect of the surface drainage to assess and levy upon the occupiers of mines an annual rate, to be called the general drainage rate, to be assessed in respect of all minerals gotten from the mines within the drainage area, and, by section 43, as regards the mines drainage rate, they had power to assess and levy upon the occupiers of mines in the same words an annual rate in respect of all minerals gotten from such mines. The maximum amount of those rates was provided by various schedules, and the precise figure does not matter. That was, as I say, amended by section 23 of the Act of 1878, chiefly in the way of machinery, because it provided for half-yearly payments instead of the single annual payments. Now the Commissioners, purporting to act under the powers to levy rates thereby provided, have served notices of the making of the rate upon these defendants. The claim arises in this way: shortly after the great coal strike broke out in the early part of last year the defendants made an arrangement, to use a neutral term, with the agent of Lord Dudley, who owns large property in this South Staffordshire region and in this Tipton district. Certain letters passed between the defendants and the estate agent or the mineral agent of Lord Dudley. On May 3, 1926, Mr. Hutton, the agent, wrote to the defendants: "Confirming my conversation with you this morning, I am prepared to give you the sole right of the coal pickings from the Conygree and Foxyard area so long as the present strike lasts" with certain exceptions. "After giving full consideration to the question of price, I am prepared to accept 1s. 9d. per ton for the coal pickings, as I consider they are fully worth this figure." That the defendants agreed to by a letter of May 4; and those letters seem to deal only with coal pickings, which, as I understand it, mean not the winning of virgin coal but the collection of the remains around old pit-heads of coal which has been already won but has been wasted and dropped and otherwise not carried off. The operations of the defendants were extended by subsequent letters. On June 5 Mr. Clark, who I think is the mineral agent of Lord Dudley, wrote to them: "With reference to the interview you and your son had with Mr. Dudding and me at Dudley yesterday, enclosed I send you tracing showing the Foxyard area and Conygree area edged blue, under which you are to have the sole right of coal pickings," except certain parts. "As arranged yesterday the royalty payable by you for all coal and slack raised up to last night is to be 1s. 9d. a ton (2,240lb.), from thence onwards 3s. 9d. per ton (2,240lb.), you to supply the estates office each week with the tonnage of coal pickings taken away, and you to pay for the same each month. It is also understood that if Earl Dudley should wish to take any of the coal pickings, you agree to sell the same on the basis of cost of getting it plus some remuneration for your superintendence and haulage, if any. It is also understood that the numerous little shafts which you have sunk and will sink will have to be filled up again at your cost." There is a further letter on June 29 from the same gentleman, and in those letters the defendants acquiesced.

Pursuant to that arrangement with Lord Dudley's people, what the defendants did was that they first of all arranged with a few men, about six of them, that those men should go out into this area from which the defendants were given the sole right to get coal, and get as much coal as they could, and the defendants would pay them 7s. 6d. a ton for slack, and 15s. a ton for coal, or that which you describe as not slack, loaded into carts. Then the defendants took away the carts, and, I suppose, sold the coal at as good a price as they could get. The six men were increased in numbers very considerably, and the system came to be one under which a certain number of foremen of gangs, called "stall men," used to deal with the defendants, work with their gangs, get paid for all the coal they won by the defendants, and, I suppose, settle with the inferior members of their gangs. Under this system, during the year 1926 until the strike came to an end the defendants won, took away, and sold for their benefit a very considerable quantity of coal and slack. I have not any evidence as to the precise amount and I am not concerned with it, but a member of the defendants' firm gave evidence and admitted that they got at any rate more than 100,000 tons. It is by virtue of those proceedings so carried out that the plaintiffs claim to be entitled under those rating sections to which I have referred to recover from the defendants the sums they claim here as being the rate assessed and levied on the defendants as occupiers of mines in respect of minerals gotten by the defendants from such mines.

Subject to a small point that I will deal with later, there is no question but that the machinery for rating the defendants has been complied with by the plaintiffs, and that proper notices of the assessment of these rates have been made. I should also add that there is machinery in one of the Acts providing for an appeal against the assessment of a rate by any person upon whom notice of it is served. The defendants did not appeal against these notices of assessment, and for the purposes of this hearing I take it, and I do not think it is disputed, that if the defendants are liable at all they are liable for the sums claimed in this action. I rather infer, partly from their reticence as regards the amount which they did win, and the general absence of any desire to go into that question, that the defendants have probably won a good deal more coal than that in respect of which these assessments have been made upon them.

To this claim made by the plaintiffs four defences by way of objection have been raised. The first one is that the defendants cannot be rated in respect of this mineral because that which they were occupying, if they were occupying anything, was not a mine within the meaning of the Act.

What the men who worked for the defendants and won the coal did was that they dug into the surface of this region where coal apparently is very near the surface; in some places apparently you dig straight into the coal—there is no overlying soil of any sort; in some cases, I imagine, they did little more than dig away the side of the hill and dug away coal in so doing; in other cases, as I gather, the majority of the cases, they dug down in the form of a pit or hole to a varying depth, apparently as much as 30ft. Having got down the hole they made a lateral heading away from the hole in four or five directions for some little distance, but in no case did they do any timbering to support the roof, and the result of that was that it was not safe, and they did not dare to carry these headings to any length; the utmost of their excavation probably was in the form of a downward hole of about 30ft. deep, and out of the bottom of that hole a series of galleries or headings going a short distance away in a sort of star-like form.

Now Mr. Sturge, who has argued the whole case for the defendants here with very great care, says that workings of this sort are not mines within the meaning of these Acts, and, putting it broadly, he says that "mines" within the meaning of these Acts mean the underground workings, that is to say, a tunnel-like excavation of the soil, over the top of which there is a roof of rock or soil or coal, and that a contrast has to be drawn between a mine in that sense and a quarry, which is an open-air excavation of ground at the side of a hill, over the top of which there is nothing but the sky. Broadly speaking, he says that these workings, though they might be properly described as a quarry, are not mines. To some extent it is a question of degree, but I think also that the question what is meant by mines in any particular connotation or any particular piece of legislation depends entirely upon the terms of the particular Act of Parliament or other document. There is no definition of a mine in these Acts. The only definition clause, I think, is in the first Act of 1873, section 3, and that does not define mine except in this way: "The expression 'mine' includes mines within the drainage area at work, or which might be worked if freed from water"—that does not really assist us at all. "The expression 'mineral' means and includes coal, slack, shale, ironstone, fireclay, limestone, or other saleable mineral." In the discussion of the term "mine" I have referred particularly to the case of Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie (4 The Times L.R., 781; 13 App. Cas., 657); I think, perhaps, in that case the most illuminating passage is one in the judgment of Lord Herschell, who points out on page 684: "The word 'mines' is, I think, in a secondary sense, very frequently applied to a place where minerals commonly worked underground are being wrought, though in the particular case the working is from the surface. For example, where iron is got by surface workings they are spoken of as iron mines, and so, too, with coal which crops out at the surface. No one, I think, ever heard of a coal or iron quarry. On the other hand, the term 'slate quarry' is undoubtedly sometimes made use of, though the workings are underground. I think it is impossible to obtain any assistance from this use of the word 'mines' in construing section 18 [of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847]. It is no doubt exceptional to obtain coal and iron except by underground workings; but this is not so with slate, and the word 'mines' is used alike in reference to all these substances." I do not forget that in that particular case Lord Herschell was dissenting, but the authority of that case, if sought to be relied upon as a general exposition of the meaning of the word "mines" in any Act of Parliament, is considerably impaired, by reason of the fact that two years later, in the case of Midland Railway Company v. Robinson (6 The Times L.R., 100; 15 App. Cas., 19), the decision on very similar words was the other way. There are various considerations, I think, to be taken into account. I am told, and the evidence is all one way, that in this particular region the winning of coal has, I suppose, for all time not been so much a matter of concentrating in a limited number of big collieries, with big pit-heads and great underground workings, but the business has been split up amongst a great quantity of small workings and small collieries. That evidence is entirely confirmed by the fact that one of these Acts, the Act of 1894, gives in its first Schedule a list of the mines and minerals belonging to the several collieries thereafter specified which may be charged under the powers of the Act. That comes under two headings, first of all, the name of the colliery, and secondly, the estimated area of the mines and minerals; there are an enormous number of them; it goes down to as low as 0.35 acres, and I should think the great majority of them were under 20 acres.

There is a long list of things specified as collieries, dozens and dozens and dozens of which are under 20 acres, and a vast number of them under 10, and I think, having regard to various passages in these Acts, and the nature of the locality to which they were being applied, that this land on which the defendants were, by this arrangement with Lord Dudley's agent, allowed to win coal as worked by them through these men by these holes which the men dug did constitute a mine within the meaning of the 42nd and 43rd sections of the Act of 1878 and the 23rd section of the Act of 1878.

Now the second answer made by the defendants is that they are not occupiers and therefore cannot be assessed under the section which empowers the plaintiffs to assess the occupiers of the mines. I need not deal, I think, with that at any length; I think under the arrangement contained in those letters between the defendants and Lord Dudley's agents the defendants clearly were the occupiers of these mines.

The third point raised by the defendants is, I think, the most difficult and the most formidable. The difficulty arises because, so far as the industry of counsel on either side has gone, they have not been able to find any authority that really assists me, and I am quite confident, in view of that industry, that there is not in existence any sort of authority upon the point. The point arises in this way: the defendants say that the whole justification for the existence of these Commissioners is, as is quite clear from the preamble to the first Act, and I think every one of the later Acts, that the Commissioners should first of all create, instal, and then carry on a system of draining this waterlogged mining region, and inasmuch as since 1919 they have not been doing any drainage in the Tipton area, then, say the defendants, the whole justification for their existence has disappeared, and while they no longer perform their statutory duties of draining, they cannot legally levy any rates. At first sight that sounds, as a matter of common sense, an attractive proposition, but one must bear in mind that it is not as though the plaintiff Commissioners were neglecting and abstaining from performing their duties and were still collecting rates and not doing anything according to their statutory powers with the money so collected; the truth is that under their legislative powers they have borrowed vast sums of money from mortgagees. The Acts recognized the rights of the mortgagees, not merely by empowering the Commissioners to borrow from the prospective mortgagees, but by recognizing and confirming the appointment of a receiver for the mortgagees. The Acts further, in several passages throughout them, recognize the duty of the Commissioners to apply part, at any rate, of the rates which they collect for the payment of their debt to the mortgagees. That begins as long ago as the first Act of 1873, because it is provided by section 45 of that Act: "All moneys received by the Commissioners in respect of rates shall be applied" first "in payment of salaries and expenses," and so forth. Then the second heading is given: "In payment of the interest from time to time payable by the Commissioners on the principal moneys for the time being borrowed by them by virtue of this Act."

Furthermore, I was referred, as illustrating that position, to the second subsection of section 21 of the 1878 Act, which is an amendment of the 40th section of the 1873 Act, and which allows districts to contract out. Section 21 provides: "The owners and occupiers within any district which shall exempt itself from the operation of the principal Act and this Act with regard to underground drainage shall be and remain liable to be rated for payment of all moneys previously to such exemption borrowed by the Commissioners upon the security of the rates of such district." The same liability of the Commissioners in respect of the mortgages is recognized in section 28 of the Act of 1891. What is perhaps still more significant is that in the year 1923, four years after the draining operations of the Commissioners had, as must have been perfectly well known, come to an end, Parliament passed this Act about the Tipton district, confirming an agreement which had been made in regard to a scheme for paying off these debentures, and so far from repealing any of the previous Acts, including those sections giving the Commissioners power to levy a rate, it referred to them and treated this Act as one with them, so that the whole eight should be cited together as the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923. As I say, really there is no authority at all. Mr. Sturge referred me to a case of Aiton v. Stephen (1 App. Cas. 456), but I do not think that has any bearing whatever. That was simply a case where a man by Act of Parliament was authorized to charge a certain toll as remuneration for rendering certain services, and it was said—I should have thought it might have been said without resorting to the House of Lords to have it determined—that if he did not render the services he could not exact the toll. That seems to me to be a very different thing from the suggestion that is here made, namely, that when the Commissioners have ceased to do pumping they cannot then further levy any rate for the satisfaction of the debts already incurred in carrying out their duties. It is entirely a point of first impression; but I see nothing which prevents the Commissioners from now saying that they are entitled to levy rates pursuant to these sections and to use the money in paying the interest on the mortgages.

Now the last and fourth point raised is a minor one and a highly technical one. The claim of the plaintiffs is for two separate sums: First, a sum of £638, as a rate for the year from June 24, 1925, to June 30, 1926; secondly, a sum of £1,381 for the following year, 1926-1927. This point does not arise as to the second sum, but it is taken as regards the first, namely £638. It arises in this way: it is said here that the demand which purported to be made was for an amended rate made under section 24 of the Act of 1878. It is said that you cannot make an amended rate under section 24 of the Act of 1878 unless you have made at the beginning of the year an original rate to be amended. They did not make an original rate at the beginning of the year 1925 to 1926, for the simple reason that the defendants were not doing anything at the beginning of that year, but only began their operations later on in the year, and it is admitted that the first rate, the original rating of the defendants, was not made as it purports to appear in the book, on June 24, 1925, but it was made somewhere in the early months of 1926; therefore it is said that, the original rate not being made at the beginning of the year, you cannot have an amended rate under section 24 of the Act of 1878.

I think the answer to that is that by the 30th section of the Act of 1891 the Commissioners may assess new occupiers who commence their occupations after the general yearly assessment from time to time, and it is then provided that every such assessment shall in all respects take effect as if made at the time when the general assessment was made. Under that section 30 the Commissioners made four assessments on the defendants, 70, 71, 72, and 73, sometime, not, it is true, at the beginning of the 1925-1926 year, but towards its end. This having been done, that assessment under section 30 of the Act of 1891 was to take effect as if it was made at the beginning of the year, and so taking effect as if made at the beginning of the year, it can, I think, be amended as though it had been made at the beginning of the year pursuant to section 24 of the Act of 1878.

Finally, it is said that under section 30 the Commissioners are compelled to assess every occupier who may commence occupation, and it is suggested that the Commissioners did not assess every occupier. There is no proof of the existence of any named or specified individual whom they did not assess ; the suggestion is only made because it is said that there were many people who were digging for coal in this way during the strike, and probably some of them were not assessed. The answer of the representative of the Commissioners was : "It may be that some escaped us, but we assessed everybody of whom we knew."

First of all, I do not think there is any proof that they failed to assess any particular person ; secondly, I doubt whether, even if it were proved, that would affect the matter.

In the result, I think as regards these four defences which are raised each of them fails, and that the plaintiffs must succeed, and in the circumstances, as I have said, there is no dispute about the amount, and there will be, therefore, judgment for the amount claimed with costs.

GOOCH v. STRATMAN.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Recovery of possession—Requirement for purpose in the public interest—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 4.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Lionel Shirley Gooch, of 55, Basinghall-street, E.C., from a decision of Judge Cluer at Whitechapel County Court in an action in which the plaintiff asked for an order for the possession of a cottage occupied by the defendant, Mrs. Johanna Stratman, at Breezer's-hill, St. George's-street, Stepney, so that he could erect wool warehouses on the site and improve the approaches to existing warehouses.

Judge Cluer held that the plaintiff did not require the premises for a purpose in the public interest, but merely for his own business, and that the extension of any trade, however useful to the public, was not a matter of public interest within section 5 (1) (e) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as re-enacted by section 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

Mr. H. U. Willink appeared for the appellant. The respondent did not appear.

Mr. WILLINK said that by section 5 (1) (e) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as re-enacted by section 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, an order for the possession of a dwelling-house could be made when it was reasonably required "for any purpose which, in the opinion of the Court, is in the public interest," provided that reasonably suitable alternative accommodation was available. Judge Cluer had, he submitted, wrongly held that the development of trade was not a purpose "in the public interest," although it might be of the greatest public importance, since the "purpose" contemplated by the subsection must be public or quasi-public. He should have considered whether the purpose for which the dwelling-house was required was generally desirable from the point of view of the community or a substantial part of it.

The plaintiff owned some 57,000 square feet of land in Stepney on which were a number of wool warehouses and two cottages, one of which was that of which he desired possession. Possession was wanted so that the scheme in respect of the warehouses could be completed and the approaches to them improved. London was the greatest wool market in the world, and the wool trade was sufficiently important to be a matter of public interest within the subsection. Since 1925 there had been a scarcity of wool warehouses, and experts who gave evidence at the trial said that it would be advantageous to the wool trade as a whole that the plaintiff's warehouse accommodation should be extended.

Mr. JUSTICE ACTON, in giving judgment, said that the evidence called on behalf of the plaintiff in the county court was that he was engaged in a trade of the greatest importance to the country, and that it would be a great convenience to him to erect warehouses which would facilitate the purposes which he had in view. As a decision on a question of fact, the Judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiff did not require the premises for a purpose in the public interest, but merely for his own business. He went on, however, to say, perhaps unfortunately and certainly unnecessarily, that the extension of any trade, however useful to the public, was not a matter of public interest within the subsection. Mr. Willink, therefore, argued that he was entitled to assail the Judge's decision on the question of fact on the ground that he had misdirected himself on the meaning of the wording of the subsection.

He (his Lordship) did not, however, think that that sentence rendered untenable by the defendant the benefit of the decision which the Judge had given in her favour on the question of fact. The words in the subsection were very wide, and they must confer a very wide discretion on the county court Judges who had the responsibility of dealing with cases under the Rent Restriction Acts. The Judge's holding did not mean more than that the facts of the present case did not disclose a "purpose in the public interest" within the meaning of the subsection.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT, in agreeing, said that it was the uniform practice of Parliament not to grant compulsory powers to purchase land to any person who was carrying on a business, however important it was, apart from undertakings authorized by Parliament and subject to Parliamentary restriction. A county court Judge might well apply some such general rule of practice as that in exercising his discretion under the subsection, although he was not entitled to make a rigid rule and apply it to all the cases that came before him.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs

NEWCASTLE BREWERIES, LIMITED v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue—Excess profits duty—Requisition of goods—Compulsory sale—Assessability of profit—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo. V., c. 89), ss. 38-45.

The profit resulting from the compulsory sale involved in a requisition under Regulation 2B of the Defence of the Realm Regulations is assessable to excess profits duty.

The goods were requisitioned in 1918 and a sum of money was then paid on account as compensation. The balance was awarded in 1921 by the War Compensation Court—a tribunal created by the Indemnity Act, 1920—but on the principle of Regulation 2B.

Held, that the change of Court did not alter the date when the right to payment arose, and that this balance, which was net profit, was a profit of the year when the goods were requisitioned.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 609) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 609) affirming an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 185), who reversed a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts. The facts are fully stated in the report of the case before the Court of Appeal and sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The question raised by the appeal was whether in the circumstances of the case the appellants were, for excess profits duty purposes, liable to include as a profit of their trade or business arising in the accounting period ending October 30, 1918, a sum of £5,309 10s. awarded to them (as compensation for loss of rum requisitioned in 1918) in 1921 and received by them in January, 1922.

On an appeal by the appellants against an assessment of this sum to excess profits duty for the accounting period ending October 30, 1918, the Special Commissioners held on the authority of Arthur Guinness, Son and Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners ([1923] 2 I.R., 186) that the £5,309 10s. was not a profit of the trade and discharged the assessment.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners. He held (1) that the £5,309 10s. was a price upon a sale by the appellants of the requisitioned rum, and (2) that the accounts for the period ending October 30, 1918, ought to be reopened so as to include this sum in the profits of that period.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Sargant) affirmed the decision of the learned Judge.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellants; and the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. Reginald Hills for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: The appellants in this case are brewers and wine and spirit merchants, and they deal in rum, their practice being to buy raw rum, put it through a process of reducing and blending, and then sell the thing so produced. In the year 1918 they had a stock of raw Jamaica rum; and the Crown, acting under Regulation 2B of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, took possession of a large quantity of that rum for the use of the Forces. A question arose as to the price or compensation which should be paid to the appellants for the rum so taken. The Crown said that the price was to be regulated by Regulation 2B, and that under that Regulation the appellants were not entitled to the market price of the rum taken but only to a sum calculated on the cost and the pre-war rate of profit. The appellants, on the other hand, maintained that so much of Regulation 2B as purported to limit the price to be paid for goods taken was ultra vires, and they presented a petition of right claiming a declaration to that effect. Pending the dispute the Crown paid about £10,300 to the appellants without prejudice to any claim for a further sum. On the hearing of the petition of right Mr. Justice Salter decided in favour of the appellants, and declared that the part of the Regulation to which they had objected was not binding upon them and that they were entitled to the market price of the rum. Thereupon the Indemnity Act, 1920, was passed. That Act prohibited all legal proceedings in respect of the exercise of the Royal Prerogative during the war and swept away all pending proceedings and judgments, including the judgment of Mr. Justice Salter in favour of the appellants. The Act further provided that, if any person had suffered any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his property or business through the exercise of any prerogative right, that person should be entitled, in any case in which a Regulation had purported to prescribe any special principle for assessment of any payment, including any price—a category which included the present case—to payment or compensation to be ascertained by the War Compensation Court in accordance with that Regulation. Accordingly, the appellants applied to the War Compensation Court, and that Court awarded to them a further sum of about £5,300, which was duly paid. The question is whether, for the purposes of excess profits duty, that sum of £5,300, or thereabouts, is to be treated as profit arising in the accounting year 1917-18. If it is, it is a net profit, for no deduction falls to be made from that sum in respect of outgoings, and accordingly excess profits duty would be payable to the extent of 80 per cent. of the amount. If it was not a business profit or did not arise in the accounting period 1917-18, then, as excess profits duty ceased to be payable at some date in the year 1920-21, no such duty would be payable on this sum.

My Lords, it has been held by Mr. Justice Rowlatt and by the Court of Appeal that the sum in question is liable to excess profits duty, and I agree with their conclusion.

Two points are made on behalf of the appellants. First, it is said that the £5,300 is not a profit from the appellants' business at all, but is a sum payable by way of compensation for the compulsory taking by the Crown of a part of the appellants' capital. I cannot agree with that contention. It is true that the rum taken by the Crown had not been refined or blended and was not, therefore, in the state in which rum was usually sold by the appellants; but it was rum which they had bought for the purposes of their business, and the cost of the rum was no doubt treated as an outgoing of the business. If the raw rum had been voluntarily sold to other traders, the price must clearly have come into the computation of the appellants' profits, and the circumstance that the sale was compulsory and was to the Crown makes no difference in principle. Both the sums received for the rum—the £10,300 and the £5,300—were in fact brought into the appellants' books under the heading "Sales of Rum"; and, although that entry may not be binding upon the appellants, it seems to me to have been correct. The transaction was a sale in the business, and, although no doubt it affected the circulating capital of the appellants, it was none the less proper to be brought into their profit and loss account. As to the authorities cited, there is nothing in the Glenboig case ([1922] S.C. (H.L.), 112) which is inconsistent with the view which I have taken; and if the Guinness case ([1923] 2 I.R., 186) says anything to the contrary, then I can only say that I do not agree with it.

Secondly, it is said that if the £5,300 was a business profit, at all events it was not profit which arose in the accounting year 1917-18. I think it did, and I cannot see in what other year it can be said to have arisen. The rum was taken in 1918, and the right to some payment arose at once, though there was delay in ascertaining the amount to be paid. It is true that the Indemnity Act, 1920, entrusted the duty of ascertaining the amount to a new tribunal, namely the War Compensation Court, but on the principle of the Regulation as it stood in the year 1918. The change of the tribunal which was to ascertain the amount and enforce payment did not create the right to payment, or alter the date when the right to payment in fact arose. An illustration was put in the course of the argument when it was asked whether, if a partner had been interested in the profits of the appellants' business for the year 1918, he would have had a right to share in this sum. I think the answer should clearly be in the affirmative; and just as the sum was part of the profits of the year so as to entitle a partner to share in it, so it appears to me that it was profit of the year so as to entitle the Government to take a share in the form of excess profits duty.

My Lords, my conclusion is that the sum in question was a profit arising in the accounting year 1917-18; and as it was not then either included in the appellants' return or valued, and consequently was not then the subject of assessment to excess profits duty, I think that it could be assessed to that duty in the year 1923 at its actual amount as then ascertained.

I think that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed, with costs.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, I concur. As to the first point, I think the taking of the rum had no analogy with the embargo on working the clay fields in the Glenboig case ([1922] S.C. (H.L.), 112). The payment for the rum was in no sense a return of capital. It was simply a realization of a portion of the stock-in-trade at rather an earlier stage of the process than was the case with ordinary sales. Guinness's case ([1923] 2 I.R., 186) is not identical with this. If it were, then I think the judgment in it would have to be reconsidered.

As to the date, if I should read the Indemnity Act, 1920, as a statutory extension of the right which arose on the taking of the rum and the conferring of an entirely new right, then I should consider that the date was the date when the award was made by the War Compensation Tribunal. I do not so read it. I think it left the actual right to be paid where it was, but provided that that right could only be made effectual to the claimant in a certain way. Then the thing for which he was paid was the thing taken, and the date of the taking was 1918. The addition of the £5,000 odd is in the same position as the interim payment of £10,000 odd in the year 1918.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords, I concur with the judgment that has just been delivered by my noble friend upon the Woolsack, and have nothing to add to it.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. As to the first point I never had a doubt. It is quite usual in trade that manufacturers should from time to time for particular reasons dispose of the raw material which in ordinary course they make up for sale. The rum was purchased for trade purposes, and the particular sale was none the less a trade sale because the trade was forced upon the appellant company.

The second point has given me more trouble. I think, however, that if the Indemnity Act, 1920, had not been passed, and the appellants had been left to enforce their claim in accordance with the judgment of Mr. Justice Salter, the money which they should so recover would have represented profit earned in the year 1918, and that the taking away of this claim or right by the Indemnity Act, 1920, accompanied as it was uno flatu by the substituted remedy given by the same Act, did not create a new source of profit.

Lord Carson.—My Lords, I agree that this appeal fails. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to whether Guinness's case ([1923] 2 I.R., 186) decided by the Court of Appeal in Southern Ireland was rightly decided, as I do not think it has any application to the facts of the present case.

HARDIE AND LANE, LIMITED v. CHILTON AND OTHERS.*

Trade Unions — Representative action against members — Requirement of common interest —Summons adjourned into Court—Whether open to the Press—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XVI., r. 9, Order LIV., r. 22.

The plaintiffs, who were motor-car dealers and agents, brought an action against the defendants, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association, an unregistered trade union. The claims were for damages for the torts of conspiracy, fraud, and libel, and there was a claim in quasi-contract.

On the defendants' application the Master made two orders, (1) dismissing the action against the defendants in a representative capacity, and (2) amending the writ and subsequent proceedings by striking out the words which stated that the defendants were sued on behalf of the Association.

Held, on appeal, that since the persons to be represented had no common interest with the defendants, as required by Order XVI., r. 9, the order of the Master was right.

When a Judge adjourns a chambers summons into Court under Order LIV., r. 22, and does not direct that it is to be heard in Court as chambers, the matter is in Court for all purposes and is open to the Press.

When these summonses, adjourned into Court from chambers, came on, Mr. GIVEEN, for the defendants in their representative capacity, pointed out that a reporter was present. He did not object to the presence of legal reporters, but there was a lay Pressman in Court and, in his submission, the hearing was still technically in chambers. Order LIV., r. 22, provided :—

"In the King's Bench Division the Judge in chambers if he thinks it desirable that any summons, appeal or application owing to its importance or the length of the time likely to be occupied or for any other reason should be heard in Court may direct that the same be so heard or may adjourn the same to be so heard. Provided that any decision in Court on any such summons, appeal or application shall be deemed to be a decision at chambers."

SIR HENRY SLESSER, K.C., for the plaintiffs, submitted that "decisions at chambers" in Order LIV., r. 22, referred to matters of appeal and procedure, and that the hearing was in Court. There was a question of law to be decided of great importance, which he would like to see reported in the legal papers.

MR. JUSTICE FRASER said that he had been asked to adjourn the matter "into Court." He could see no reason why reporters should be excluded. He ruled that the matter was in Court for all purposes and that he could not exclude anyone who chose to be present.

The hearing of the applications, which came before the Judge on appeal from two orders of Master Jelf, was proceeded with. The action was brought by Messrs. Hardie and Lane, Limited, motor-car dealers and agents, against John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, and Percy Ingram Denyer, and the said John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, and Percy Ingram Denyer, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association.

The statement of claim alleged that the association purported to carry on business for the purpose of encouraging and protecting the motor industry in the United Kingdom and throughout the world and to watch over and protect the interests of manufacturers, &c. The statement of claim went on to say: "The defendants Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer substantially own and control the business and undertaking of the association and such business is in truth and in fact carried on for their profit and benefit.

"Further or alternatively, the association is an unregistered association of motor dealers and of motor manufacturers. The defendants Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer are and were at all material times members of the said association and also are and were members of a committee conducting the affairs of the association on the members' behalf and are sued as representing the general body of the members. The said defendants are and were at all material times the trustees of the association and the funds of the association were vested in them as such trustees. The said funds are and were at all material times the property of the members of the association and vested in the said trustees upon trust for the members."

The statement of claim then stated that the plaintiffs became members of the association, and it alleged a conspiracy between the defendants and one Neale to induce the plaintiffs by fraudulent representations to break a by-law of the association with regard to the maintenance of prices. As the result of the alleged conspiracy the plaintiffs were induced to pay to the defendants the sum of £332 and to give an undertaking to maintain the protected prices. On March 17, 1926, the present defendants issued a writ claiming from the plaintiffs a further £100. The plaintiffs in that action were described as "John Chilton and Harry Arnold Bennett suing on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Motor Trade Association." That action was discontinued.

On April 5, 1927, Master Jelf, on the defendants' application in the present action, made two orders: (1) dismissing the action against the defendants in a representative capacity; and (2) amending the writ and subsequent proceedings by striking out the words "and the said John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, and Percy Ingram Denyer sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association," and also striking out the words of the statement of claim set out verbatim above.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Harold Simmons appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Giveen for the defendants in their representative capacity; and Mr. St. John Field for the defendants in their personal capacity.

SIR HENRY SLESSER said that the question was whether he was entitled to proceed with his action. The association was an unregistered trade union with a certificate from the Registrar of Friendly Societies. It was contended against him that this action was founded on tort. As to that he would submit that this action was founded on contract as well as on tort, but the most important question was whether, if the action was founded on tort, it was correct to say that a trade union could not be sued through its trustees. To that question the defendants said, (1) that it was unarguable; and (2) that the objection to the statement of claim was really a plea in abatement which, though formally abolished, survived in substance, and a summons to strike out was really the only way in which a defendant could be protected. Master Jelf had given a note of his opinion in these terms :—

"Although I think that the argument of the plaintiffs is wrong I do not think that it is "unarguable" within the meaning of Evans v. Barclays Bank ([1924] W.N., 97) (and the case there cited), in which the Court of Appeal decided that I should have let the action proceed.

"But I think that this case depends upon a different principle. Pleas in abatement having been abolished, I think that an application to strike out is the only appropriate remedy for the defendants. The Judicature Acts in abolishing pleas of abatement were only dealing with a matter of form and not of the rights of the parties."

Counsel submitted that the first part of this note was a finding in his favour. If he had an arguable point, he was entitled to go on (Goodson v. Grierson, 24 The Times L.R., 364 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 761). On the question of abatement he cited Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse (40 The Times L.R., 837 ; [1925] A.C., 112). Admittedly, an ordinary unincorporated society which did not depend for its validity on statute could not be sued, but a trade union was the creature of statute and could be sued either in contract or tort (Walker v. Sur and others, 30 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 930 ; Mercantile Marine Service Association v. Toms [1916] 2 K.B., 243 ; Curle v. Lester and another, 9 The Times L.R., 480).

Having submitted that the present action was founded on contract, counsel proceeded to the point that even if it were founded on tort the action was not precluded by the Trade Disputes Act, 1906. Section 16 of the Trade Union Act Amendment Act, 1876, contemplated three classes of trade unions—unions of workmen and workmen, unions of masters and masters, and unions for imposing restrictions on trade. The words used in section 4 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, were not new, but went back to section 16 of the Act of 1876. Many unions for imposing trade restrictions imagined, and possibly erroneously, that they were protected by the Act of 1906. But, notwithstanding the general definition in section 5, section 4 was expressly limited to the two classes of unions of employers and of workmen. His Lordship had not to decide whether that view was right, but whether he was entitled to raise the point.

There was a further point under section 4 (2) of the Act of 1906, whether the union could not be sued if its trustees were joined. Section 4 (1) being general in its terms, the trustees could be sued under section 4 (2) (except in the case of a trade dispute), if the tort was within section 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871. It would be said that section 9 applied only to registered unions, but the observations in Vacher and Sons, Limited, v. London Society of Compositors (29 The Times L.R., 73 ; [1913] A.C., 107) seemed to show that it applied generally.

Summarizing his argument, Sir Henry Slesser said : (1) The distinction between a case which was unarguable and one which depended on abatement was misconceived. When he could show that he could sue in contract or tort, the whole remedy was open. The union had a certificate and was a creature of the register. The Master admitted that he ought to be allowed to argue subject to the plea in abatement. (2) The action could be said to be founded on contract or on tort. There was an agreement and consideration which had failed. The plaintiffs asked for the return of their money. That was a question for decision at the trial. There was certainly a constructive contract, and the matter was not wholly a tort within section 4 of the Act of 1906. (3) This union was one neither of men nor masters. (4) The plaintiffs were suing trustees and were entitled to proceed, even though the association was unregistered. He asked that the matter should go forward and be decided by the Court.

Mr. Giveen submitted that the Master was right. In the Taff Vale case (17 The Times L.R., 698 ; [1901] A.C., 426) the whole matter dealt with was interlocutory. In Parr v. Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Federation (29 The Times L.R., 235 ; [1913] 1 Ch., 366) no interlocutory application was made. This case came under the old head of a plea of abatement. Since that plea was abolished, the procedure was by application to strike out.

After dealing in detail with the statement of claim, counsel argued that there was no sufficient indication of the defendants' being trustees within the Trade Union Act of 1871, and that the claim for money had and received could not be used to sue in contract on a claim really arising in tort (Brocklebank, Limited v. The King, 40 The Times L.R., 869 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 52).

The exiguous suggestion of contract was joined with claims for fraud, conspiracy, and libel. There was no case in which a money claim as distinct from an injunction had ever been maintained against an unincorporated society. If allowed in this case it would be the first time that this had ever been done in English law. Counsel dealt with the cases of Mercantile Marine Society v. Toms (supra) and Walker v. Sur and others (supra). Here the real wrongdoers were before the Court, and there was no need for a representative action. The Taff Vale case (supra) was a claim for an injunction ; here they were not suing a registered trade union, and the suggestion that unincorporated bodies could be sued in a representative action was obiter, and there were equally weighty dicta the other way. As an old-fashioned common lawyer he could not conceive how the judgment should be framed or how execution should be levied.

It was a little ominous for the plaintiffs' case if they had to rely on a case which was overruled by Act of Parliament. The more the Taff Vale case (supra) was in the plaintiffs' favour, the more the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, was against them. He had never before heard that "trade union" in section 4 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, did not include associations for regulating trade. Section 9 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, only applied to contract ; his very good authority for that was Sir Henry Slesser's book on Trade Union Law, at p. 54.

Sir Henry Slesser.—I appear to have overlooked the observations of Lord Haldane in Vacher and Sons, Limited v. London Society of Compositors (supra).

Mr. Giveen.—I do not think that much was overlooked in writing that book. The object of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, was to protect the funds of a society from liability for the torts of its officials. Sir Henry Slesser now sought to say that one could exhaust the funds of the society by suing the trustees in a representative action.

Sir Henry Slesser, in answer to a question by Mr. Justice Fraser, said that he no longer contended that the defendants were being sued as trustees, and, therefore, the argument which he had based on section 4 (2) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, did not apply. He still contended that the defendants could be sued in a representative capacity.

Mr. Giveen summarized his arguments. He contended that the whole purpose of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, would be evaded if, for a claim for money had and received which really arose in tort, there were substituted a claim framed in contract, Brocklebank, Limited v. The King (supra).

Mr. St. John Field, who appeared for the three defendants in their personal capacity, contended that the words alleging a representative capacity ought to be struck out of the statement of claim. They became embarrassing when associated with the defence of the three individuals. Such defence ought to be left to be dealt with on its own merits. Moreover, the persons who had been selected as representative of all the members might cease to be representative before the action came to trial.

Sir Henry Slesser, in reply, contended that the parties must be regarded as sufficiently representative of the whole body, inasmuch as they had themselves recently sued as plaintiffs in a representative action on the same subject-matter. They had pleaded that they owned and controlled the funds of the association. Again, if they did consider that they were not sufficiently representative, it was always open to them to issue a summons to join other members.

With regard to the question whether a representative action would lie at all, trade unions were of three kinds—a union of workmen, a union of masters, and a union whose object was the imposing of restrictive conditions on the conduct of business. It was clear that the defendants came within the last category. It was never the intention of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, that exemption from common law liability should extend to that kind of trade union. Lord Macnaghten in the Taff Vale case (supra) had clearly expressed the view that an unregistered trade union could be sued, either in contract or tort, in a representative action. The present action was clearly an action for breach of contract, and entirely different from Brocklebank, Limited v. The King (supra). If it were regarded as an action for tort the onus still rested on the defendants to show that they were exempted from the provisions of the common law.

His Lordship, in his considered judgment, said that the first order was made on the application of Mr. Giveen for the defendants sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association, and the second order was made on the application of Mr. St. John Field for the defendants sued on their own behalf.

The Motor Trade Association was an unregistered trade union, and on June 3, 1914, it was certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies to be a trade union under section 2 (3) of the Trade Union Act, 1913.

The statement of claim contained 31 paragraphs. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 were as follow :—

"1. The plaintiffs are agents for the sale of and dealers in motor-cars. The defendants, the Motor Trade Association, purport to carry on business for the purpose of encouraging and protecting the motor industry in the United Kingdom and throughout the world and further to watch over and protect the interests of manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and users of motor goods and all others having commercial relations with the motor industry. The defendants, Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer, substantially own and control the business and undertaking of the association and such business is in truth and in fact carried on for their profit and benefit.

"2. Further, or alternatively, the association is an unregistered association of motor dealers and of motor manufacturers. The defendants, Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer, are and were at all material times members of the association and also are and were members of a committee conducting the affairs of the association on the members' behalf and are sued as representing the general body of the members. The said defendants are and were at all material times the trustees of the association and the funds of the association were vested in them as such trustees. The said funds are and were at all material times the property of the members of the association and vested in the said trustees upon trust for the members.

"3. In or about February, 1920, the plaintiffs became members of the association. One of the by-laws of the association is as follows :—(1) On proof to the satisfaction of the council that any company, association, firm, or person has offered or advertised or sold any proprietary price-maintained article at a price above or below the price fixed by the manufacturer or concessionaire to which the association has granted protection the council may place the name of such person on a list to be called the "stop list" and give notice thereof to all members of the association or otherwise. This by-law shall cover hire and hire-purchase transactions in accordance with regulations issued from time to time by the council.

"The plaintiffs will at the trial of this action crave leave to refer to the objects, regulations, and by-laws of the association as though the same were here fully set out."

Counsel for the plaintiffs, Sir Henry Slesser, contended before me that the distinction between a case which was unarguable and one which depended on abatement was misconceived ; that an unregistered union could be sued in a representative action ; that this was an action which was founded in contract as well as in tort ; that the plaintiffs were suing trustees and were entitled to proceed to trial even though the association was unregistered ; and that in order to succeed on these appeals it would be sufficient for him to prove that he had an arguable point within the meaning of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Evans v. Barclays Bank ([1924] W.N., 97).

In his (Mr. Justice Fraser's) opinion, however, there were two distinct and separate questions raised in these appeals to which different considerations applied.

He proceeded to deal with the ground of the first order—namely, that the statement of claim disclosed no matters giving ground for an action against the defendants as representing the Motor Trade Association or against the members thereof as represented by the defendants ; in other words, that this was not a case to which Order XVI., rule 9, was applicable. That rule said : "Having the same interest," i.e., common interest. As had been pointed out by Lord Macnaghten, the rule was meant to apply the practice of the Court of Chancery to all Divisions of the High Court. That practice was to require the presence of all parties interested in the matter or suit in order that a final end might be made of the controversy, but that when the parties were numerous the rule might be relaxed and a representative suit allowed.

His Lordship referred to Wood v. McCarthy (9 The Times L.R., 447 ; [1893] 1 Q.B., 775, at p. 778). He said that the essential condition of a representative action was that the persons who were to be represented must have the same interest as the persons representing them in one and the same cause or matter (per Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in Markt and Co., Limited v. Knight Steamship Company, Limited [1910] 2 K.B., 1,021, at pp. 1,038, 1,039 ; see also the observations of Lord Justice Vaughan Williams at pp. 1,028, 1,029, and Lord Justice Buckley at pp. 1,043, 1,044).

The claims alleged in the statement of claim in the present action were for damages for the torts of conspiracy, fraud and libel, and a claim depending on what was in the nature of quasi-contract.

Among the points raised by Sir Henry Slesser for the plaintiffs was the contention that under section 4 (2) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, a union could be sued if its trustees could be joined. As to that, Mr. Giveen replied that there was no sufficient indication that the defendants were trustees within the Trade Union Act, 1871, whereupon Sir Henry Slesser applied for leave to amend by alleging that the three named defendants were sued as trustees. He (his Lordship), however, said that he would only allow the amendment at that late stage if it were supported by affidavit, and Sir Henry Slesser withdrew his application.

Now that counsel for the plaintiffs had definitely abandoned his contention that the defendants were trustees the case from some points of view bore a close resemblance to Walker v. Sur and others (30 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 930), but in the present action there was no claim for any declaration for the ascertainment of rights. Moreover, the actual alleged wrongdoers were before the Court.

After citing other cases, including the Taff Vale case (17 The Times L.R., 698 ; [1901] A.C., 426), his Lordship said that he was quite satisfied that on the particular facts with which he had to deal this was not a case which came within the provisions of Order XVI., rule 9. He held that there was no common interest as required by that rule, and in those circumstances it was unnecessary for him to deal with the further points raised on behalf of the defendants. Both appeals would be dismissed and there would be the same order in each case, the defendants to have the costs in any event.

Leave to appeal was granted.

DALE v. MITCALFE.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Income accumulated for benefit of a person contingently—Beneficiary having only a life interest—Claim to relief—Meaning of "benefit"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 25.

By s. 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him" [a sum calculated as therein mentioned].

Held, that the words "for the benefit of" include a case where the accumulations of income are added to the capital of a trust fund in which the beneficiary has only a life interest and where therefore the accumulations never pass to the beneficiary.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

At a meeting of the Commissioners on October 29, 1925, Mary Catherine Louise Mitcalfe (formerly Burn), the wife of William Stanley Mitcalfe, of Oak House, 17, Aigburth Hall-road, Liverpool (hereinafter called the respondent), appealed against an objection made by the Inspector of Taxes for Hexham (hereinafter called the appellant) to a claim made by the respondent for relief under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of income accumulated under the trusts of the settlement hereinafter referred to.

By a settlement dated October 18, 1910, made between (1) John Henry Burn and (2) the trustees therein named, John Henry Burn (hereinafter called the settlor), settled certain stocks, securities, and moneys (hereinafter called the trust funds) upon certain trusts in favour of his children, of whom he then had five—namely, two sons and three daughters, all of whom were minors. Such trusts (so far as they were material to the questions raised in this case) were as follow :—

"5. Upon trust for all or any the children or child of the settlor now living or hereafter to be born who being male shall attain the age of 21 years or being female shall attain that age or previously marry if more than one in equal shares except that each son shall take double the share of each daughter.

"7. Provided further that the said trustees or trustee shall retain the share of each daughter of the settlor now living of and in the trust funds upon the trusts following (that is to say) the said trustees or trustee shall pay the income thereof to such daughter during her life and so that during coverture the same shall be for her separate use without power of anticipation but which restraint shall not preclude the payment of such income to a bank or banker for the credit of such daughter and after the death of such daughter shall stand possessed of her said share upon the like trusts and subject to the like powers and provisions in favour of the issue of such daughter as are hereinbefore declared and contained concerning the share of each of the sons of the settlor now living in the trust funds to take effect after the death of each of such sons in the same manner in all respects as if such trust powers and provisions were herein repeated with the substitution of the name of the said daughter for such son.

"10. Provided always that the said trustees or trustee shall apply the whole or such part as they or he in their or his discretion shall think fit of the income of the expectant or presumptive share (whether settled or unsettled) of any child or grandchild of the settlor in the trust funds under the trusts hereinbefore contained for or towards his or her maintenance education or benefit (whether there is any other fund applicable or any person bound by law to provide for such maintenance or education or not) and may either themselves so apply the same or may pay the same to the parents or guardians or guardian of such child or grandchild for the purpose aforesaid without seeing to the application thereof and shall during the minority of any such child or grandchild and in the case of a female spinsterhood accumulate the surplus (if any) of the same income by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any of the investments hereby authorized in augmentation and so as to follow the destination of the share from which the same shall have proceeded but with power to apply any such accumulations in any subsequent year for or towards the maintenance education or benefit of the child or grandchild for the time being presumptively entitled as aforesaid in the manner in which such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising in the then current year."

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

The respondent, then Mary Catherine Louise Burn, was a daughter of the settlor and attained the age of 21 years on May 26, 1921, and was married to her present husband, William Stanley Mitcalfe on August 31, 1922. Income-tax, at the rates appropriate to each tax year, had been duly paid by deduction or otherwise by the trustees for the time being of the settlement, in respect of the whole income of the trust funds up to May 26, 1921. As from that date the income of her share of the trust funds (including the income of her share of the invested accumulations) had been paid to the respondent, and she had been fully repaid all the tax recoverable by her in respect of such income up to the date of her marriage. The respondent claimed on September 12, 1922, under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, repayment of £380 3s. 11d., for or on account of tax paid or deducted in respect of income from the income accumulated during her minority under the settlement. The appellant refused the claim. The accumulations of income from the trust funds were, during the minority of the respondent, set aside to the credit of a separate accumulations fund in the names of the trustees of the settlement.

The claim was refused by the appellant on the ground that "as the accumulations of the income are added to the capital of the trust fund which never passes to the beneficiary the claim under section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, cannot be admitted."

No question arose as to figures in the case.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent :—That the surplus income of the trust fund had been accumulated during her "minority for her benefit," to the extent of the share thereof to the income of which she became entitled on May 26, 1921, inasmuch as, on attaining the age of 21 years, she became entitled to receive the income from those accumulations in addition to her other income ; that the words "for the benefit of" in section 25 must be given their ordinary meaning, there being nothing in the Act to restrict that meaning in the way suggested by the Crown ; that the surplus income had been accumulating for the benefit of the respondent within the meaning of section 25 none the less because she was not under the trusts of the settlement entitled absolutely to those accumulations ; and that clause 10 of the settlement empowered the trustees of the settlement to apply accumulations in any subsequent year for the benefit of the child or grandchild presumptively entitled to a share in the trust funds in the manner in which such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising in the then current year.

The appellant contended, inter alia, that the respondent was not entitled to the repayment of tax claimed under the provisions of section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and that the claim had, therefore, been rightly refused.

The General Commissioners held that the respondent was entitled to repayment of the tax the subject of the claim.

By section 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—

"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him [a sum calculated as therein mentioned]."

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT said that, in his judgment, the General Commissioners were right. The words that he had to construe were, "accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying." Here the money was accumulated contingently on the beneficiary's attaining 21 or marrying, and the accumulations were to be capitalized. She was to receive interest on the accumulations, and so she would be provided for in a way in which it was customary for people of means to provide for their daughters.

It was said that "accumulation for the benefit" of a person meant that the accumulations were to be paid to the beneficiary on attaining the specified age. He agreed with Mr. Hills to this extent that, if a will were so carelessly drawn that money was left "for the benefit" of someone, that person could require the money to be paid to him. But he did not think that the converse was true. Parliament had used very wide words, "for the benefit of any person," and, if one applied ordinary language to a well-known social phenomenon, then when a man made provision of this sort he was providing "for the benefit" of his daughter.

He did not see his way to cut down those words in the manner suggested by the Crown. The only difficulty was one which affected the matter obliquely. If the tax had been less, or had not been deducted, the beneficiary would not have got the money, because it would have been accumulated and invested. That was a difficulty, but he did not think that he could cut down the words. The whole thing was very artificial, and this might be a casus omissus, or it might be that the trustees could make the respondent account for the money ; but he must dismiss the appeal.

REX v. MINISTER OF HEALTH—EX PARTE WORTLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Rating—Assessment area—Scheme—Proportion of different classes of members—Scheme providing actual number of representatives of each authority—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 90), ss. 16 (2), 17 (4), 67 (1).

A scheme for the constitution of an assessment area under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, may specify the total number of members and the number to be allotted to each rating authority, board of guardians, and county council, and is not confined to specifying the total number and the proportion between the different classes of authorities, so as to leave the authorities themselves to agree upon the number of members to be allotted to each authority of each class.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Observations on the powers given to the Minister of Health by s. 67 (1) of the Act.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash an order dated November 12, 1926, whereby the Minister of Transport purported to approve with modification a scheme made by the County Council for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and dated July 21, 1926, under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, upon the grounds that the constituent authorities were entitled to decide among themselves : (1) On the size or number of the Assessment Committee ; (2) on the mode of representation of their own group.

By section 16 (2) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, county councils were required to make and submit to the Minister of Health a scheme for the constitution of assessment areas consisting of one or more rating areas.

Section 17 (3) provides for the constitution of the Assessment Committee in assessment areas which were county boroughs. Section 17 (4) provides : " In the case of any other assessment area the Assessment Committee shall consist of persons to be appointed by the following authorities, being authorities whose area or any part of whose area is comprised in the assessment area, that is to say, rating authorities, boards of guardians, and the councils of counties, and the proportion in which the said authorities shall be represented shall be determined by the scheme constituting the area."

The scheme in question in the present case constituted a number of assessment areas in the West Riding of Yorkshire, one of which was the Staincross area, consisting of the Wortley Rural District and 16 other smaller areas, making a total estimated population for the new area of 143,478 persons, with an assessable value of £707,494. The Wortley Rural District had a population estimated at 28,950 persons, with an assessable value of £182,758. An Assessment Committee was created for the area consisting of 28 members, of whom three were to be appointed by the county council, two by each of the three boards of guardians, two by the Wortley Rural District Council, and two by one urban district, while 13 urban districts and one rural district were to appoint one each. Save as aforesaid the scheme did not purport to determine the proportion in which rating authorities, boards of guardians and the county council should be represented.

The Wortley Rural District Council submitted that within the limits of the proportions to be fixed by a scheme the constituent authorities were entitled to decide among themselves (1) the size of the Assessment Committee, and (2) the mode of representation of their own group.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Minister of Health ; Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. M. FitzGerald appeared for the County Council ; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. St. John Micklethwait, K.C., supported the rule.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is an order nisi for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the Minister of Health to remove into this Court an order dated November 12 last, whereby the Minister purported to approve with modification a scheme made by the County Council for the West Riding of Yorkshire under date July 21, 1926, that scheme having been made under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

The grounds upon which the rule was granted on January 21, 1927, were two-fold : firstly, that under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, the constituent authorities are entitled to decide among themselves on the size and number of the Assessment Committee ; and, secondly, that they are entitled to decide among themselves on the mode of representation of their own group.

This recent statute is entitled : " An Act to simplify and amend the law with respect to the making and collection of rates by the consolidation of rates and otherwise, to promote uniformity in the valuation of property for the purpose of rates. . . . " The first part of the statute deals with rating. When we come to the second part, at section 16, the topic is valuation, and that part begins with provisions as to areas and authorities. By section 16, subsection 2, there is imposed upon the council of every county a certain duty : " As soon as may be after the passing of this Act the council of every county shall, after consultation with the authorities of the rating areas in the county and with the boards of guardians of the poor law unions situate wholly or partly in the county, make and submit to the Minister a scheme for the constitution of assessment areas consisting of one or more rating areas." Various detailed provisions are added with reference to the making of the scheme, and it is provided, for example, by subsection 10 : " In making schemes under this section regard shall be had to the population and rateable value of the rating areas which will be affected by the scheme and to the desirability that each assessment area shall have an administrative centre which is appropriate for the carrying out of the work of assessment in the area and convenient for the attendance of the persons interested therein, and that suitable premises for the transaction of the business of the Assessment Committee for the assessment area shall be available without unnecessary expenditure." Then it is provided by section 17 : " (1) There shall be an Assessment Committee for every assessment area. (2) The Assessment Committee for an assessment area shall, in the case of an assessment area being a county borough, be appointed as soon as may be after the passing of this Act, and in the case of any other assessment area shall be appointed as soon as may be after the assessment area has been constituted, and as from the appointed day Assessment Committees shall exercise such powers and perform such duties as are conferred on them by this Act, and all Assessment Committees constituted under the Union Assessment Acts, 1862 to 1880, shall cease to exist." Next, in subsection 3 there comes a specific provision as to an assessment area which is a county borough. In that case the committee is to consist " of such number of persons to be appointed by the council of the borough as may be determined by the council," and also it is provided that of the persons to be so appointed not less than a quarter are to be persons appointed to represent boards of guardians and not less than one-fifth persons who are neither members of the council nor members of the boards of guardians. Finally comes the subsection upon which the controversy in this case has chiefly turned (4) : " In the case of any other assessment area the Assessment Committee shall consist of persons to be appointed by the following authorities, being authorities whose area or any part of whose area is comprised in the assessment area, that is to say, rating authorities, boards of guardians and the councils of counties, and the proportion in which the said authorities shall be represented shall be determined by the scheme constituting the area." Now this task, whatever may be the true dimensions and meaning of the task, comes to be a part of that which has to be done by the county council in discharging the imperative duty that is laid upon it by this Act.

The argument that was made by those who support the rule may, I think, be stated in this way. They say that the statute does indeed require the scheme to determine the proportion of representation as between three different kinds or types or groups of authorities, that is to say, rating authorities, boards of guardians and county councils, but the statute neither requires nor permits the scheme to determine the number of representatives whom a particular rating authority or a particular board of guardians or a particular county council is to appoint. The question turns, therefore, largely upon the true construction of this subsection (4). It is conceded by Mr. Montgomery in argument that it may well be that under this section, read together with other sections, the county council is empowered to determine the total number of representatives, but he denies that the county council can do more, having appointed the total number, than decide the proportion of representation as between the three various groups. In my opinion, that construction must do some violence to the words of this subsection. It involves, I think, two things : (1) That the phrase "the proportion in which the said authorities shall be represented shall be determined by the scheme" means the mere proportion and nothing more ; (2) that the words "the said authorities" are to be read as if they were "the said kinds or types or groups of authorities." Now it is not denied that in the course which has in fact been taken by the county council in making the scheme and by the Minister of Health in approving it the total number has been fixed and the proportion has been fixed, but the proportion is not stated superficially as a proportion between groups of authorities ; the proportion is collected from an examination of the number of representatives accorded to each particular example of the various kinds of authorities. I am not suggesting that these words are not open to some criticism on the ground of ambiguity ; but, looking at the purpose of the Act and at the scheme as a whole, I think that, even if the words be open to two constructions, we ought to adopt that construction which makes for good sense and the working of the Act. The other construction seems to me to lead to chaos and uncertainty in a remarkable degree. I think, therefore, that the contention that there has been here a usurpation or excess of jurisdiction fails.

I should like to add that there is a very remarkable provision in this statute, which may interest those persons, if there are any, who observe the progress of departmental authority. Section 67 (1) provides : "If any difficulty arises in connexion with the application of this Act to any exceptional area, or the preparation of the first valuation list for any area"—these are words of remarkable comprehensiveness—"or otherwise in bringing into operation any of the provisions of this Act," the Minister of Health may do a series of remarkable things. He may "by order remove the difficulty." The imagination fails to contemplate at one view the extent and variety of the power which is given to the Minister under this section. He may by order remove the difficulty. He may cut the Gordian knot in any way that seems best to him. He may declare any Assessment Committee to be duly constituted ; he may make any appointment or "do any other thing which appears to him necessary or expedient for securing the due preparation of the list or for bringing the said provisions into operation," and the Legislature, not content with arming the Minister with those remarkable and varied and far-reaching powers, goes on to provide that "any such order may modify the provisions of this Act so far as may appear to the Minister necessary or expedient"—for what purpose? For carrying the Act into effect ? Not at all—"for carrying the order into effect." This, I think, though I say it with some hesitation, may be regarded as indicating the high water mark of legislative provisions of that character. It is obvious apparently that, if this Court had taken another view of the case presented to us and had decided to quash this order as having indeed been made ultra vires, the Minister to-morrow might, under the provisions of section 67, have arrived at the same end by making an order and removing the difficulty.

In my opinion, the argument on behalf of those who support this rule has failed and I think that this order nisi ought to be discharged.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I agree.

SKINNER v. JACK BREACH, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Wages—Trade—Minimum wage—Mending of nets for use in employer's own business — Trade Boards Act, 1909 (9 Ed. VII., c. 22), ss. 1, 6, 9.

The word "trade" in the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, is not confined to operations of buying and selling, but denotes any branch of work in which persons are employed commercially, provided that the employment is not casual or by a private person.

Held, therefore, that the minimum wage fixed for workers in the drift net mending industry applied to workers employed solely in mending nets, the property of, and used in the business of, their employers, who were fishermen and fishing boat owners.

This was a case stated by justices for the borough of Lowestoft.

An information was preferred by the appellant, Agnes Lawson Skinner, an officer appointed under the provisions of the Trade Boards Act, 1909, against the respondents, Jack Breach, Limited (whose registered office was situated at Waveney Chambers, Lowestoft), under the Trade Boards Act, 1909, and the Trade Boards Act, 1918, and the order of the Ministry of Labour made thereunder dated June 24, 1926, for that they, as employers of workers in those branches of the rope, twine, and net trade in Great Britain for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed by the Drift Nets Mending Trade Board (Great Britain), in pursuance of the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, did on July 10, 1926, at The Shoals, Whapload-road, Lowestoft, unlawfully fail to pay wages at not less than the minimum rate to Edith Alice Finch, of 1, Cumberland-place, Whapload-road, Lowestoft, being one of the said workers. The information was heard on December 2, 1926, and the justices dismissed it.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(a) That upon July 11, 1919, the Minister of Labour by virtue of the powers conferred upon him by the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, made a Special Order of the above date (Statutory Rules and Orders, 1919, No. 930) to the effect that from and after July 18, 1919, the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, should apply to the trade specified in the schedule of the said order as follows :—

"The Rope, Twine, and Net Trade, that is to say :— . . .

"(4) The braiding or splicing of articles made from rope, cord, twine, or net.

"(5) The mending of nets, . . ."

(b) That upon July 27, 1925, the Minister of Labour by virtue of the said powers made a Special Order varying the above-named Special Order as follows :—

"The following new paragraph shall be inserted in the Appendix to the Trade Boards (Rope, Twine, and Net) Order, 1919, after paragraph 4 and immediately preceding paragraph 5, that is to say :

"4 (a) The mending, refitting, and reconditioning of drift nets including all processes (whether similar to the foregoing or not) incidental thereto."

(c) That on July 28, 1925, the Minister of Labour by virtue of the said powers and in consequence of the said amending order set out in the immediately preceding paragraph made regulations amending the principal regulations and on the same date made regulations entitled the Trade Boards Drift Net Mending Trade, Great Britain (Constitution and Proceedings) Regulations, 1925, whereby (inter alia) it was provided as follows :—

"A Trade Board shall be established in Great Britain for the following branch of work in the rope, twine, and net trade as specified in the Trade Boards (Rope, Twine and Net) Order, 1919, as amended by the Trade Boards (Rope, Twine and Net and Drift Nets) Order, 1925, that is to say :—

"The mending of the net mesh of drift seine or similar nets except when done in a factory or workshop in which any of the following articles are made or re-made : (a) rope (including driving rope and banding), (b) cord, (c) core for wire ropes, (d) lines, (e) twine (including binder and trawl twine), (f) lanyards, (g) net and similar articles."

(d) That the general minimum times, rates, and overtime rates were fixed for certain classes of female workers by the aforesaid Trade Board for the drift nets mending trade in Great Britain, which rates were duly confirmed by the order of the Minister of Labour dated June 24, 1926, wherein it was ordered that such rates for such class of workers as were set out in the schedule thereto should become effective from June 28, 1926.

(e) That the respondents were a company carrying on the business of fishing and owning and employing their own boats for the purpose. The vessels brought their catch into the harbour of Lowestoft, where the same was sold.

(f) That the aforesaid Edith Alice Finch had been employed from March, 1923, and was still employed, as an adult female worker, by the respondents at The Shoals, Whapload-road, Lowestoft, the premises of the respondents, known as beating chambers, in the mending of drift nets, the property of the respondents. The said drift nets were used by the respondents in their said business as drift fishermen and fishing boat owners. The respondents' said business did not include the manufacture of nets or the repair of nets other than nets owned by and used in the business of the respondents.

(g) That there were employed on July 9, 1926, by the respondents at their said premises about 30 other women besides the said Edith Alice Finch upon the work of mending the respondents' nets.

(h) That on or about July 10, 1926, the aforesaid worker, Edith Alice Finch, was paid as wages for the week ending July 9, 1926, the sum of 17 shillings, being 15 shillings for a week of 43½ hours work, and in addition thereto a sum of two shillings for repairs to two nets completed, by way of bonus of 1s. each net.

(i) That the respondents had not paid and were not at the date of the hearing paying the minimum time rates and overtime rates as fixed by the aforesaid Trade Board for the drift nets mending trade, which rates were, for those workers who had completed two years of employment in the drift nets mending trade, 22s. per week of 44 hours or 21s. 10d. per week of 43½ hours.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the respondents carried on the trade of mending drift nets, in which trade the aforesaid Edith Alice Finch was employed, and that such employment was subject to the provisions of the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, by the operation of the orders above referred to.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the respondents carried on no trade, and that before the Minister of Labour could make any order there must be a trade to which he could apply such an order ; that, if the business of drift fishermen and fishing boat owners constituted a trade, then the incidental mending of drift nets of the respondents was no part of that trade or of any trade ; that the said premises were not a factory or workshop, and in any case that the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, and the orders and regulations made thereunder, did not apply to the mending of drift nets by workers employed by the respondents in the circumstances set out above.

The attention of the justices was directed to the following decisions :—

The majority of the justices were of opinion that since the respondents only repaired their own gear or nets and used the same for their own purposes they were not carrying on a trade as provided for by the Trade Boards Acts, and that such Acts only applied to operations which were carried on as a trade. The justices accordingly dismissed the said information.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether, upon the above statement of facts, the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. C. W. Lilley appeared for the appellant; Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Mr. Dodson for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices for the borough of Lowestoft. The question arises in the following way. An information was preferred by the present appellant, an officer appointed under the provisions of the Trade Boards Act, 1909, against the present respondents for that they, as employers of workers in those branches of the rope, twine and net trade in Great Britain for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed by the Drift Nets Mending Trade Board, in pursuance of the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, did on July 10, 1926, in Lowestoft, unlawfully fail to pay wages at not less than the minimum rate to one Edith Alice Finch, being one of the said workers. The justices, having heard the information, decided by a majority that the summons ought to be dismissed. The question for this Court is whether, in so deciding, they came to a correct determination in point of law.

So far as the facts are concerned, they may be briefly stated. The respondents, as the case shows, are a company carrying on the business of fishing, and owning and employing their own boats for that purpose. Their vessels bring the catch into the harbour of Lowestoft, and there the fish are sold. Edith Alice Finch, whose wages were said to be deficient, had been employed by the respondents for a considerable time. She had been employed by them ever since March, 1923, and she was still employed by them as an adult female worker at their premises in Lowestoft in the mending of drift nets, the property of the respondents. These drift nets were used by the respondents in their business as drift fishermen and fishing boat owners. On the material date, July 9, 1926, there were employed by the respondents at those premises some 30 other women in addition to Edith Alice Finch upon the work of mending the respondents' nets, and on or about July 10, 1926, Edith Alice Finch was paid as wages for the week ending July 9, 1926, the sum of 17s., being 15s. for a week of 43½ hours, and, in addition to that sum, a sum of 2s. for repairs to two nets completed, by way of bonus of 1s. each. The case further finds as a fact that the respondents had not paid, and were not paying, the minimum time rates and overtime rates as fixed by the Trade Board for the drift nets mending trade. These rates were, for workers who had completed two years of employment in the drift nets mending trade, 22s. for a week of 44 hours, or 21s. 10d. for a week of 43½ hours.

The respondents on their part contended that they carried on no trade, and that before the Minister of Labour could make any Order there must be a trade to which he could apply the Order; that if the business of drift fishermen and fishing boat owners constituted a trade, then the incidental mending of drift nets, the property of the respondents, was no part of that trade or of any trade; and further that the premises of the respondents were not a factory or workshop; and in any case that these statutes, and the orders and regulations made under them, did not apply to the mending of drift nets by workers employed by the respondents in the circumstances of this case. In the result a majority of the justices formed the opinion that, as the respondents repaired only their own gear or nets and used them for their own purposes, they were not carrying on a trade, and therefore that these statutes did not apply.

So far as the law is concerned, it is common ground that on July 11, 1919, the Minister of Labour, by virtue of the powers conferred upon him by the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, made a Special Order, which is No. 930 of the Statutory Rules and Orders, 1919, to the effect that from and after July 18, 1919, the Trade Boards Acts should apply to the trade specified in the schedule to the Order, and that trade was the rope, twine and net trade, and it included amongst other things No. 5, the mending of nets "where these operations or any of them are carried on in a factory or workshop" in which any of certain specified articles were made or re-made. Then came a Supplemental Order on July 27, 1925. The Minister of Labour, by virtue of the powers already referred to, varied that Special Order by inserting a new paragraph in the appendix to it. That new paragraph was paragraph 4 (a), and it is in the following terms: "The mending, refitting and reconditioning of drift, seine or similar nets, including all processes (whether similar to the foregoing or not) incidental thereto." Regulations followed, and a Trade Board was established in Great Britain for what was described as "The following branch of work in the rope, twine and net trade, as specified in the Trade Boards (Rope, Twine and Net) Order, 1919, as amended by the Order of 1925, that is to say, the mending of the net mesh of drift seine or similar nets except when done in a factory or workshop in which any of" certain named articles were made or re-made.

To complete the matter so far as the law is concerned, under that Order and Regulation there followed the fixing of general minimum time rates and overtime rates for certain classes of female workers by the Trade Board for the drift nets mending trade, and these rates were duly confirmed by Order of the Minister dated June 24, 1926, so that they became effective from June 28, 1926. It was not disputed that if these rates were applicable to the case of Edith Alice Finch she was underpaid.

The real question, which emerged in the argument before the justices and has been elaborated before us, may be stated in the following way: Does the Act apply only to persons of one of the specified trades employed by an employer whose trade is that trade, or does it apply also to persons of one of the specified trades by whomsoever he is commercially employed?

Our attention has been directed to a series of cases of which perhaps the chief is Nash v. Hollinshead (17 The Times L.R., 352; [1901] 1 K.B., 700), for the purpose of arguing that here there was no trade of drift net mending carried on by these respondents. But it is a little important to remember that that case, and all the other cases of the same class that were cited to us, turned upon the meaning of words in a different Act of Parliament which had a different purpose. We have to look at the true meaning of the Trade Boards Acts and the Orders and Regulations made under them. No doubt in a great many contexts the word "trade" indicates the process of buying and selling, but that is by no means an exhaustive account of its meaning. It may also mean a calling or a class of work or a branch or class of skilled labour, and when one looks at Acts like the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, it is apparent that the word "trade" is commonly used to indicate the position created by the relation of employer and employed in certain industries or classes of labour. So, for example, the compositor says that his trade is the trade of a compositor, the engineer, that his trade is the trade of an engineer, and a trade union is spoken of under a name which indicates the trade, calling or avocation or occupation of the persons, the skilled handicraftsmen, who are included within it. Now in this Act, the Trade Boards Act of 1909, the first provision is that the Act is to apply to the trades specified in the schedule to the Act and to any other trades to which it has been applied by Provisional Order of the Board of Trade made under this section, and when one looks at the trades which are specified in the schedule one finds there participles of verbs, "ready-made" and "wholesale bespoke tailoring," the making of boxes, operations of lace curtain finishing. These things, "making" and "operations," are spoken of as "trades." Subsection 2 goes on to provide that the Board of Trade may make a Provisional Order applying this Act to any specified trade to which it does not at the time apply, if they are satisfied that the rate of wages prevailing in any branch of the trade is exceptionally low as compared with that in other employments and that the other circumstances of the trade are such as to render the application of this Act to the trade expedient, and it was in pursuance of these powers that in due course another participle, or substantive based upon a participle, was added to denominate a new trade which was brought within the ambit of the Order, "The mending of the net mesh of drift, seine or similar nets." When one looks further, by section 2 (1) it is provided that "the Board of Trade shall, if practicable, establish one or more Trade Boards constituted in accordance with Regulations made under this Act for any trade to which this Act applies or for any branch of work in the trade," and by section 6, where the minimum rate of wages has become effective, it is provided that an employer shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the person employed at not less than the minimum rate clear of all deductions, and if he fails to do so he becomes liable to a penalty. The meaning which, as it seems to me, is to be collected from phrases like that (and they by no means stand alone), and indeed from the whole scheme and purpose of the Act, is reinforced by the particular language of section 9. Section 9 no doubt is dealing with an individual matter, but it uses words which seem to me to illuminate the purpose of the statute as a whole. Section 9 provides: "Any shopkeeper, dealer or trader"—that is to say, any shopkeeper, dealer or trader whatsoever—"who by way of trade"—that is, who by way of any trade—"makes any arrangement express or implied with any worker in pursuance of which the worker performs any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed under this Act, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be the employer of the worker, and the net remuneration obtainable by the worker in respect of the work after allowing for his necessary expenditure in connexion with the work shall be deemed to be wages." That section shows that, even where the out-worker or the worker who provides some of the requisite materials or tools is concerned, the Act is looking to the nature of the work performed, and if he is doing the kind of work to which the minimum rate of wages has been applied, it matters not that the shopkeeper, dealer or trader would not describe his business, or, at any rate, would not describe the whole of his business, by words applicable to that particular branch of industry. No doubt questions may arise upon the topic, Where is the line to be drawn? Illustrations were put in argument of the nature of a reductio ad absurdum. It is enough to say, I think, that casual work is not here dealt with, nor work given by a private person; there must be a commercial employment, and, if there is commercial employment, then it does not matter that the particular work which is done by the worker is not exhaustive of the whole business or industry of the employer.

Applying that interpretation to the facts of this case, I think that, although the business of these respondents was truly to be described as the business of fishing and owning fishing boats, nevertheless they were employing not casually but regularly, not privately but for commercial purposes, a considerable number of women engaged in the work or industry of mending nets. That being so, it seems to me to be immaterial that mending nets was not the whole of the business of the respondents.

In these circumstances I think that the justices came to a wrong conclusion, and that the minimum rate applies.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I have arrived at the same conclusion with some hesitation. At first I was disposed to think that this statute and the Orders made under it applied only in the case where the employer and employed were engaged in the same trade, and the contention of the appellant before the justices rather gave colour to that view, because it is stated in the case that on behalf of the appellant it was contended that the respondents carried on the trade of mending drift nets. Now, in my opinion, the respondents did not carry on the trade of mending drift nets, and if it had been necessary for a decision of this case to establish that they did, I should think the justices' decision would have been correct. But looking at the provisions of section 9 of the Act, and particularly at the provisions of section 6, which is the penal section, I have come to the conclusion that the statute and the Orders under it cannot be limited in that way. Section 9, as my Lord has pointed out, applies to any shopkeeper who employs a worker to perform some work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed. That, I think, clearly contemplates a shopkeeper who carries on a particular trade and who, for his own convenience, employs some worker to do some work which may possibly be the work of another trade, a trade other than that which the shopkeeper ostensibly carries on; and section 6 is quite general in its terms when it says that "where any minimum rate of wages . . . has been made obligatory by order of the Board of Trade under this Act, an employer"—that is, any employer—"shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the person employed at not less than the minimum rate." That leads me to the conclusion that it is sufficient to satisfy the terms of this Act if the employer carrying on one kind of trade employs a worker to do some work which is incidental to the trade or business which the employer is carrying on, subject to the qualification which my Lord has mentioned, that the statute is not intended to apply to a private individual who gives a casual job to some person engaged in a particular trade to do work for him.

I have only one other word to add with regard to the cases which have been cited. The one that was nearest to this case was the case of Curtis v. Shinner (22 The Times L.R., 448). That was a case of mending fishing nets, but, as has been pointed out, it turned upon the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and the Court there had to decide whether the place where the nets were mended was a workshop within the meaning of that Act. It does not appear to me that that decision under the Factory and Workshop

Act, 1901, governs this case. For the reasons I have given this Act appears to me to apply to a case where fishermen, such as these, who were undoubtedly carrying on a trade, employ persons who are engaged in a different trade—namely, that of mending nets.

In these circumstances, I agree that the justices came to a wrong conclusion and that the case should be remitted to them. The question what penalty should be imposed in the circumstances of this particular case is a matter entirely within their discretion.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion, and I have only a few words to add. I think the magistrates were misled by cases which were decided under another and different statute. Under some other statutes the word "trade" may have a different meaning from that which it has in this statute. In my judgment, when you look at section 1 of this Act—and I need not read it—and the reasons given as to why it was necessary and the rules as to when a Trade Board could fix a rate of wages, I think the dominant meaning of the word "trade" in this statute is "industry." The nearest synonym is "industry." It was intended, wherever it was discovered that there was a recognized form of industrial employment which was underpaid, that by the machinery of this Act, and also the subsequent amending statutes, provision should be made that the industrial workers in that kind of industry should be properly paid. When one looks at it, even without reference to section 9, I think it is clear that sections 1 and 6 enable the Board to fix a rate of wages in any specified industry between employers and employed. "Specified" does not necessarily mean anything which the Board chooses to call a trade, but some recognized species of industrial work. I have no doubt that in these circumstances if there is a species of industrial work (and that is not disputed here) known as net mending, if it is carried on by way of a trade, then the Board, as to those workers who carry it on by way of a trade, can fix a rate of wages between those workers and their employers, whatever other business the employers may carry on.

In my view, therefore, the justices were wrong, and the case must go back.

WOODWARD v. OLDFIELD.*

Education—Defective child—Parent—Father a convict—Child residing with mother—Consent to child being sent to special school—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), ss. 42, 53, 54 (1), 170 (12).

The parent whose consent is required to be given or unreasonably withheld before a defective child can be ordered, under s. 54 (1) of the Education Act, 1921, to be sent to a special school which is not within reach of the child's residence or to a boarding school, is the parent who has de facto custody of the child.

Hence in a case where the father of a defective child was a convict serving a term of penal servitude and the child resided with its mother,

Held, that the mother was the parent for the purposes of the section.

This was a case stated by Somerset justices.

A complaint was preferred on October 11, 1926, by Norman Oldfield, of Weston-super-Mare, solicitor, deputy clerk of the County Council of Somerset, on behalf of the local education authority for the county of Somerset (hereinafter called the respondent) under the Education Act, 1921, section 54, against Marion Ann Woodward (hereinafter called the appellant), for that she on October 4, 1926, at the parish of Burnham-on-Sea in the said county, being the parent of a certain defective child named Marion Lilian Woodward, over seven years of age, was on September 18, 1926, required by the said local education authority to send the said child to the special school provided by them at Sandhill Park, Bishops Lydeard, in the said county, being a school certified by the Board of Education as suitable for mentally defective girls, and that she had failed without reasonable excuse to do so, and the said local education authority applied for an order requiring the said child to be sent to a certified class or school suitable for the child and willing to receive her, pursuant to the statute aforesaid.

The complaint was heard and determined at Petty Sessions on October 18 and November 1, 1926, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing, there appearing to the justices to be no reasonable excuse why the said child should not be sent to a special school, they ordered that the said child should within 14 days from the said November 1, 1926, be sent to the special residential school for mentally defective girls at Sandhill Park, Bishops Lydeard, in the county of Somerset.

Upon the hearing of the said complaint the following facts were admitted or proved in evidence:—

(1) The appellant was the mother of the said child, Marion Lilian Woodward, and the said child then was over the age of seven years, to wit, of the age of 12 years, and was residing and at all material times resided with, and was in the actual custody of, her said mother. The said mother was stone deaf.

(2) The father of the said child was Harry Edward Woodward, who at all material times was serving a sentence of penal servitude and was imprisoned at his Majesty's Prison at Maidstone until the last week of April, 1927. The consent in writing of the child's said father or of the appellant to the said child's being sent to the special school hereinafter mentioned had not been obtained.

(3) The said child was, in fact, a defective child within the meaning of that word as used in Part V. of the Education Act, 1921, and the Somerset County Education Committee, acting as the local education authority for elementary education under powers delegated to them by the County Council of Somerset pursuant to the said Act, were satisfied, after consultation with the appellant, that she was not making suitable provision for the said child's education, whereupon they required the appellant to send the said child to a certified class or school suitable for such child, to wit, the said special school at Bishops Lydeard. The appellant failed without reasonable excuse to send the said child to such school.

(4) On June 14, 1926, one Alfred Ernest Remmett Weaver, M.D., B.Ch., D.P.H., senior assistant school medical officer under the said local education authority, being a duly qualified medical practitioner approved by the Board of Education, gave a certificate in writing which the justices found was to the effect that the said child was defective within the meaning of section 55 of the Education Act, 1921, and the justices were not satisfied that the said certificate was incorrect, but were satisfied that the same was correct.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

There was no doubt expressed by the medical witnesses on either side, nor had the justices any doubt, that the said child was defective. The said Alfred Ernest Remmett Weaver gave evidence before the justices.

(5) The special school at Sandhill Park, Bishops Lydeard, was one provided by the local education authority and was duly certified as such by the Board of Education within the meaning of section 54 of the Education Act, 1921. The said school was one suitable for the said child, and the authorities at the said school were willing to receive her, and the justices considered it expedient that the said child should be sent to the said school. The said school was not within reach of the child's residence and was a boarding school. The appellant had not selected, and did not before the justices select, a suitable class or school.

(6) By letter dated September 21, 1926, the appellant, in reply to a letter to her from the local education authority, dated September 18, 1926, refused to consent, and before the justices refused to consent, to the said child's being sent to the said school.

(7) It was proved to the justices' satisfaction that the appellant unreasonably withheld her consent to the said child's being sent to the said certified school, and they were not satisfied that such consent was withheld with the bona fide intention of benefiting the said child.

At the hearing the appellant stated on oath that she refused her consent to the said child's being sent to the said school on the ground that she believed that the child would do better at home in charge of herself as her mother than at school, where she would be liable to be punished ; and that the child was quite capable of doing housework ; and that she believed the child to be, by reason of defective intelligence, incapable of benefiting from instruction in a special school for defective girls and that she was so advised by her medical adviser, Arthur Hugh Lowther.

The said Arthur Hugh Lowther, M.B., a registered medical practitioner practising at Burnham-on-Sea, was also called as a witness on behalf of the appellant, and he testified that he had examined the said child on one occasion, namely, on Thursday, October 28, 1926, and he gave it as his opinion that the child was feeble-minded within the definition in the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, but that in his opinion she was incapable of benefiting by instruction at the special school for defective children under the Education Act, 1921, and that, as the child was of an emotional temperament, her interests would best be served if she remained at home in her mother's care, as it would be more beneficial for her to associate with normal persons than with other defective children, and that he had so advised the appellant.

The appellant contended that, pursuant to the terms of the said statute, the justices had no power in law to make an order that the said child should be sent to the said school on the grounds following :—

(1) That the parent of the said child within the meaning of section 54 of the Education Act, 1921, was the father and not the mother of the child, if the father was alive and could be found, and no consultation had ever taken place between the local education authority and the father of the said child.

(2) That no request had ever been addressed by the local education authority to the father of the said child that he should send the said child to the said school.

(3) That there was no evidence before the justices that the father had failed without reasonable excuse to send the child to the said school.

(4) That there was no evidence that the consent in writing of the father of the said child had ever been requested, or obtained or unreasonably withheld.

(5) That there was no evidence that the mother of the said child, in refusing her consent to the said child's being sent to the said special school, was not acting with the bona fide intention of benefiting the said child.

(6) That there was no evidence that the mother of the said child was acting unreasonably in withholding her consent.

(7) That the certificate aforesaid given by Dr. Weaver and put in evidence before the justices was incorrect.

The respondent contended :—

(1) That the said child was in the actual custody of the appellant and that the appellant was the parent of the said child.

(2) That on the facts admitted and proved the complaint of the respondent was made out and that the whole of the provisions of section 54 (including the proviso thereto) and of section 55 of the Education Act, 1921, were satisfied.

(3) That the justices had power in law to make the said order.

The justices were of opinion that the contentions of the respondent were correct and that those of the appellant were incorrect, and accordingly they made the order hereinbefore mentioned.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether, upon the above statement of facts, the justices came to a correct determination in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

By section 42 of the Education Act, 1921 :—

"It shall be the duty of the parent of every child between the ages of five and fourteen, or, if a byelaw under this Act so provides, between the ages of six and fourteen, to cause that child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic."

By section 53 :—

"The duty of a parent under Part IV. of this Act to cause his child to receive efficient elementary instruction shall, in the case of a defective or epileptic child over seven years of age in any place where a special class or school certified by the Board of Education for defective or epileptic children, as the case requires, is within reach of the child's residence, include the duty to cause the child to attend such a class or school, and a parent shall not be excused from this duty by reason only that a guide or conveyance for the child is necessary."

By section 54 (1) :—

"If a local education authority for elementary education are satisfied, after consultation with the parent of a defective or epileptic child over seven years of age, that the parent is not making suitable provision for the child's education, they may require the parent of the child to send the child to a certified class or school suitable for the child, and, if he fails without reasonable excuse to do so, may by complaint apply to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order requiring the child to be sent to a certified class or school suitable for the child and willing to receive him, being either such as the parent may select, or, if he does not select a suitable class or school, then such class or school as the Court think expedient. . . .

"Provided that (i.) no order shall be made requiring the child to be sent to a certified class or school which is not within reach of the child's residence or to a boarding school without the consent in writing of the parent, unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court that such consent is unreasonably withheld, or that the parent cannot be found, but consent shall not be deemed to be unreasonably withheld if withheld with the bona fide intention of benefiting the child. . . ."

By section 170 (12) :—

"The expression 'parent' in relation to a child or young person includes guardian and every person who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of the child or young person."

Mr. E. H. C. Wethered appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices for the County of Somerset. The case arises upon a complaint preferred on October 11, 1926, by the present respondent, who is deputy clerk of the County Council of Somerset, on behalf of the local education authority under section 54 of the Education Act, 1921, against the present appellant. The complaint was that on October 4, 1926, being the parent of a certain defective child named Marion Lilian Woodward, over 7 years of age, she was on a day in September last required by the local education authority to send the child to a special school provided by the authority at Sandhill Park, being a school certified as suitable for mentally defective girls, and that the appellant had without reasonable education authority under section 54 of the Education authority applied for an order requiring the child to be sent to a certified class or school suitable for the child and willing to receive her. That complaint being heard by the justices at the Petty Sessions, there appeared, the justices say, to them to be no reasonable excuse why the child should not be sent to a special school, and accordingly the justices ordered that the child should be sent to a named school within a named period. The appellant appeals from that order, and the question is whether in arriving at the conclusion set out in the case the justices came to a correct determination in point of law.

The facts of the case may be summarized quite shortly. The appellant is the mother of Marion Lilian Woodward, and that child being 12 years old at all material times resided with and was in the actual custody of her mother, who is stone deaf. The father of the child at all material times was serving a sentence of penal servitude, his release being expected to take place in the month of April, 1927. [He was in fact released a few days before the hearing in the Divisional Court.] The case finds as a fact that the consent in writing of the child's father or of the appellant, the child's mother, to the sending of the child to the special school had not been obtained ; more than that, the child was in fact a defective child within the meaning of that word as used in Part V. of the Act of 1921, and the County Education Committee, acting as the local education authority, were satisfied, after consultation with the mother, that she was not making suitable provision for the child's education. Accordingly, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act, the education authority required the mother to send the child to a certified class or school, and the case finds as a fact that the appellant failed without reasonable excuse to send the child to that school. Meantime, on June 14, 1926, the medical officer under the education authority gave a certificate in writing to the effect that the child was defective within the meaning of section 55 of the statute, and the case adds that there was no doubt expressed by the medical witnesses on either side, nor had the justices themselves any doubt, that the said child was defective. Correspondence had passed between the education authority and the appellant, and on September 21, 1926, the appellant in writing refused to give her consent to the sending of the child to the school, and in an important finding of fact the justices say : "It was proved to our satisfaction that the appellant unreasonably witheld her consent to the said child's being sent to the said certified school, and we were not satisfied that such consent was withheld with the bona fide intention of benefiting the said child." The mother, the appellant, gave evidence on oath. She stated her reasons ; she said that she believed the child would do better at home in her charge as her mother than at school, where she would be liable to be punished, and that the child was quite capable of doing house work. The mother's evidence was to some extent corroborated by a registered medical practitioner, but having weighed the evidence the justices came to the conclusion which has been already stated.

Upon those materials two points have been urged on behalf of the appellant. The first point is that there was no evidence upon which the justices could reasonably find that the appellant withheld her consent unreasonably and not with the bona fide intention of benefiting the child. With regard to that submission it appears to me that the evidence upon the one side and upon the other was before the justices ; it is fairly and clearly summarized in the case, and I think it is clear that the justices upon conflicting evidence came to a conclusion as to which it is only necessary to say that it was a conclusion to which they were entitled to come. Then it is said that there was no evidence upon which they could reasonably come to this conclusion. What appears really to be meant upon analysis is that they did not accept the evidence given by and on behalf of the appellant, but preferred the evidence which was given on behalf of the education authority.

The second contention is the real point of substance in this case, and it is this, that notwithstanding that the father was at all material times serving a sentence of penal servitude in Maidstone, still he was within the meaning of the statute the parent referred to ; that nothing had happened to impose upon him any disability in relation at any rate to this matter ; and that as his consent had neither been asked nor received, the condition precedent had not been fulfilled which required that before the education authority took the step referred to here the consent of the parent must first be obtained, or in the alternative unreasonably withheld. Is it true to say that within the meaning of the term in this part of the statute the father in such circumstances continues to be the parent whose consent, whether given or withheld, is the material consent ? That question depends upon this statute, and not upon the use of like terms in some other statutes, and under this statute it is provided by section 42 at the beginning of Part IV. of the Act as follows : "It shall be the duty of the parent of every child between the ages of 5 and 14, or, if a byelaw under this Act so provides, between the ages of 6 and 14, to cause that child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic." When one turns to the definition section in this Act, which is section 170, one finds that the expression "parent" in relation to a child or young person includes guardian and every person who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of the child or young person. It is not denied in the argument made before us on behalf of the appellant that at the time when the father was detained in prison and the child was in the actual custody of the mother it was the mother who would have been liable if she had neglected the duty imposed on the parent by section 42. Reference may usefully be made upon that point to the case of Hance v. Burnett (45 J.P., 54). It was held there that the mother of a child having the actual custody and control of the child was liable for neglecting to cause the child to attend school while her husband was at sea, whether or not he was the father of the child. In giving judgment Lord Coleridge, C.J., said at page 55 : "I observe that it is not found in the case that this was the child of the husband. If it had been his child, I think nevertheless that owing to the father's absence, as the child was in the actual custody of the respondent she was liable to see to the child being sent to school, otherwise the children of the seafaring population might be wholly neglected. The words of the statute sufficiently comprehend the present case and the justices ought to have convicted." Those observations, as it seems to me, are apposite to the present matter, and indeed when one turns to section 54 of this statute under which the proceedings now under examination were launched, the matter is, I think, still more plain. By section 53 of the Act it is provided that : "The duty of a parent under Part IV. of this Act to cause his child to receive efficient elementary instruction shall, in the case of a defective or epileptic child over seven years of age in any place where a special class or school certified by the Board of Education for defective or epileptic children, as the case requires, is within reach of the child's residence, include the duty to cause the child to attend such a class or school, and a parent shall not be excused from this duty by reason only that a guide or conveyance for the child is necessary." It might indeed be said that the admission that under section 42 in the circumstances of this case the mother would have been liable in the case of a normal child for omitting to perform the duty laid down in section 42 carries with it the proposition that she has the duty as the parent in the circumstances of the case under Part IV. Section 54 provides as follows : "If a local education authority for elementary education are satisfied, after consultation with the parent of a defective or epileptic child over seven years of age, that the parent is not making suitable provision for the child's education, they may require the parent of the child to send the child to a certified class or school suitable for the child, and, if he fails without reasonable excuse to do so, may by complaint apply to a court of summary jurisdiction for an order requiring the child to be sent to a certified class or school." To apply that section to the circumstances of this case, if by reason of the fact that the father remains the father notwithstanding that he is in prison he is the parent referred to, the consequences become a little grotesque. The education authority must then satisfy themselves after consultation with the person undergoing penal servitude that he, being in that place and in those circumstances, is not making suitable provision for the child's education. The education authority must then require the convict undergoing penal servitude to send the child to a certified class or school suitable for the child, and it is only if the convict fails without reasonable excuse so to do that they may by complaint apply to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. What could be a more reasonable excuse, if indeed the father was the parent referred to, than to express his regret that he was not in a place where it was possible for him to comply with the suggestion ? And the result would be that as he had a reasonable excuse the defective child would have to be neglected until the period of penal servitude, whatever it might happen to be, came to an end, because only on its expiration would he be deprived of the reasonable excuse.

There are other sections of the Act which seem to me to enforce the same conclusion, and I think here upon the meaning of the word "parent" the test is whether there is a person otherwise satisfying the definition in section 170 who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of the child or young person ? That is not to say for a moment that in other circumstances and under the provisions of other statutes the father in such circumstances may not retain the rights of a paternal parent. Reference has been made to the case of Rex v. Judge Radcliffe (31 The Times L.R., 610 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 418), and in particular to the passage in the judgment of the Court at page 423, but it is to be observed among other things with reference to that case that the matter there in question was the presentation of a petition, an affirmative act by the parent or guardian, and the statute had provided for the protection of the parent or guardian ; where the petition was not presented by the parent or guardian the order was not to be made without the consent in writing of the parent or guardian unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the judicial authority that such consent was unreasonably withheld or that the parent or guardian could not be found. It seems to me that the reasonings in that case under the terms of that statute are not applicable to the special provisions of this Act with reference to the education of a defective child.

In these circumstances, it appears to me that the justices were entitled to come to the conclusion of fact to which they came, and that in the interpretation which they put upon the law they were right. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I am of the same opinion. I think that in order to give practical effect to this statute it is necessary that we should hold that the expression "the parent" in section 54 of the Education Act, 1921, means the parent who de facto has the custody or control of the child, and not the parent who de jure has the custody or control of the child. It would be impossible, as my Lord has pointed out, otherwise to give any effect to section 54, because where the father is in penal servitude it would always be said by him that he had a reasonable excuse for not complying with the requirement that was made upon him ; and looking particularly at subsection 3 of that section it is obvious that the section contemplates a parent who in fact has the custody or control, and not one who in law merely has it, because that subsection provides : "Nothing in this section shall be construed as affecting the power of a parent to withdraw a child from school on proof to the satisfaction of the local education authority that he will make suitable provision for the child's education in some other way." Under those circumstances it appears to me that we ought to follow the decision of the Court in the case of Hance v. Burnett (45 J.P., 54), where the father was at sea, and not the decision in the case of Rex v. Judge Radcliffe (31 The Times L.R., 610 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 418), where the father in fact was at home and de facto had the custody and control of the child. In this case, upon the question of fact no doubt it would have been open to the justices to come to a contrary conclusion as to the mother's reasons for not consenting to the child being sent to a school, but, when they have found as a fact as they did, it is impossible for this Court to interfere with their finding of fact, and I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked in this case to construe section 54 of the Education Act, 1921, with regard to an alleged defective. In my judgment the words "the parent" in this section mean the parent who has the actual custody of the child. Those are the words in the definition section, "the actual custody of the child" at the time of the cause of the offence arising. The difficulty I felt during the argument of the case was the considered decision in the case of Rex v. Judge Radcliffe (31 The Times L.R., 610; [1915] 3 K.B., 418), which was no doubt a case arising out of section 6 of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, because one is most desirous, if it can be avoided, of not having different meanings given to the same words in cognate sections. On consideration I have come to the conclusion that that case does not in the least conflict with the decision which we are giving. No doubt where both husband and wife are living together the person having the actual custody would be the husband, and when one looks at the Judge Radcliffe case (supra) the wife and husband were living together, and the Court quite properly said that the husband was the person having the actual custody; and therefore the authorities are not in line. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

REX v. SOUTHWARK VACCINATION OFFICER—EX PARTE GOVERNORS OF PEABODY DONATION FUND.*

Vaccination — Register — Search — Additional information required by subsequent Act — Whether right of search impliedly abolished —Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 84), s. 24—Vaccination Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 98), s. 6—Vaccination Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. 49), s. 2—Vaccination Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 31), s. 1.

The provision of s. 24 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, which gives a right to search the vaccination register has not been impliedly repealed by the subsequent Vaccination Acts requiring information to be inserted in the register beyond the information required by the Act of 1867.

This was a rule nisi for a mandamus directed to the Vaccination Officer or Officers of the Guardians of the Poor of the Borough of Southwark to show cause why they should not allow search to be made of the vaccination register kept by their clerk or registrar under the provisions of section 24 of the Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 84). The rule was obtained on the ground that by that section and section 6 of the Vaccination Act, 1871, the Governors of the Peabody Donation Fund were entitled to search the vaccination register.

The Peabody Donation Fund, a body incorporated by Royal Charter dated December 14, 1900, owned a large number of working-class dwellings in various districts of London, including the Metropolitan Borough of Southwark. The charter empowered them to build dwellings to be let to the labouring poor of London who were of moral character and good conduct and to impose regulations, terms, and conditions in respect of the occupation thereof.

In accordance with their powers the Governors made it one of the terms of each tenancy granted by them that every member of the tenant's family should be vaccinated. To ascertain whether that term was being complied with the superintendent of the Peabody Estate at Southwark asked to be allowed to search the vaccination register, but permission was refused. The Governors submitted that the right of search was given by section 24 of the Act of 1867.

The Guardians admitted the refusal, but contended that the vaccination register as now kept under the various Vaccination Acts and the Vaccination Order of 1898 was not the register of vaccinations contemplated by or referred to in section 24 of the Act of 1867, inasmuch as it contained information entirely beyond the information required to be registered under that section.

The right of the Peabody Governors to inspect the register arose in 1913, when one of their tenants made a statutory declaration of conscientious objection. The then vaccination officer gave information to the applicants, and the tenant, a Mr. Redford, was given notice to quit. Mr. Redford complained to the President of the Local Government Board, who took the view that the vaccination officer had exceeded his duties in giving the information referred to.

The question had not been raised again until the Guardians refused the applicants' request on the view taken by the Local Government Board, and on their own view that it was not right to allow the register to be searched for the purpose of enabling the Peabody Governors to bring pressure on their tenants. The Guardians were desirous that the law should be properly carried out and agreed to act in any way the Court might direct.

Mr. Wingate-Saul, K.C., and Mr. Morle showed cause.

Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. Wynn Werninck, who supported the rule, were not called upon to argue.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said that the case seemed to him to be perfectly clear. There was an effort made to search the register; that effort was resisted on the ground that search was no longer permitted. The argument was that section 24 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, was impliedly repealed because information which was not and could not be contemplated by that Act must now appear in the register. The argument was quite unsustainable.

By section 24 of the Act of 1867 the registrar was to keep a register of certificates of successful vaccination. There were under that statute two other kinds of certificate—certificates of unfitness for vaccination and certificates of insusceptibility to vaccination or of previous smallpox.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Those certificates at that time were not matter of transmission and registration, but by the Vaccination Act of 1871 they required registration. Then came the Act of 1898, which provided for certificates of exemption, and there was then a fourth part of the register for certificates under section 2 of the Act of 1898. Afterwards the Act of 1907 substituted statutory declarations for certificates of exemption, and by paragraph 2 of the fourth Schedule to the Vaccination Order, 1898, as amended by the third Schedule to the Vaccination (No. II.) Order, 1907, these declarations had to be entered on the register. The certificate of successful vaccination remained—that was the foundation; the other certificates of unfitness and of insusceptibility remained and the name of the medical man remained, as always. It was desperate to argue that the register had been so altered as impliedly to repeal section 24 of the Act of 1867. The rule must be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Avory agreed. He said that he was quite unable to appreciate the respondents' reason for refusal.

Mr. Justice Shearman concurred.

BACH (OTHERWISE KOHN) v. BACH.*

Divorce — Nullity — Gretna marriage — Informality — Non-residence in Scotland for requisite period — Decree nisi of nullity.

This was an undefended petition for nullity of marriage by reason of informality. Mary Celine Bach, otherwise Kohn, of Belle Vue Hotel, Cheltenham, who in April, 1924, went through a form of marriage with William Ernest Bach, a commercial traveller, at the Old Blacksmith's Shop at Gretna Green, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, prayed for a decree of nullity.

Mr. T. F. Davis, for the petitioner, submitted that the condition of 21 days' residence by one of the parties required under the Marriage (Scotland) Act, 1856, had not been complied with, the couple, both of whom lived at Birmingham, having travelled up to Scotland together the day before the ceremony. Section 1 of that Act provided:—

"After the 31st day of December, 1856, no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland, by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony, shall be valid, unless one of the parties had at the date thereof his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for 21 days next preceding such marriage; any law, custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

On the authority of Lawford v. Davies (4 P.D., 61) Counsel asked for a decree of nullity.

Mr. A. Dewar Gibb, a member of the English Bar and advocate of the Scottish Bar, gave expert evidence.

Other evidence having been given, his Lordship said that it was quite clear that there had been no marriage, the ceremony being carried out directly in the teeth of the Act. He granted a decree nisi of nullity, with costs.

COULSON v. AUSTIN MOTOR COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Companies—General meeting—Right to attend and vote—Non-cumulative preferred ordinary shares—No right of holders to attend unless dividend in arrear—Meaning of "in arrear" in the articles.

A company's articles of association provided that the original preference shares, carrying a cumulative preferential dividend of 7 per cent., should not confer upon the holders the right to attend and vote at any general meeting or to have notice thereof unless (inter alia) the dividend thereon was "in arrear" for more than three months. Subsequently the capital of the company was increased by the issue of preferred ordinary shares with the right to a non-cumulative preferential dividend of 10 per cent. payable in respect of each year exclusively out of the profits earned in each year and to rank after the preference shares. It was further provided that the holders of these preferred ordinary shares should, mutatis mutandis, be subject to the same restrictions as to receiving notices of and attending and voting at general meetings as the holders of original preference shares. Since 1920 no profits had been available to pay dividends, and for the general meeting of 1926 the holders of preferred ordinary shares received no summonses. In an action by holders of such shares against the company for a declaration that they were entitled to have notice of and to attend and vote at the general meetings, Held, that the words "in arrear," in the context in which they appeared in the articles, could not be construed to cover the non-payment of a non-cumulative preference dividend payable out of the profits of each year and not paid because there were no profits available for the dividend, and the action failed.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, Samuel Twentyman Coulson and William Robinson Harrison, on behalf of themselves and all other holders of the Ten per Cent. Preferred Ordinary shares of the defendant company claiming a declaration that the holders of Preferred Ordinary shares were entitled to have notice of, and to attend and vote at, general meetings of the company; a declaration that the proceedings at an ordinary meeting held on August 31, 1926, were invalid by reason of the exclusion of the holders of Preferred Ordinary shares; and an injunction to restrain the company from acting otherwise than in accordance with the above declarations.

The company was incorporated on February 4, 1914, with a capital of £650,000 divided into £1 shares. The company's articles of association provided (article 6) that 250,000 shares of the original capital should be Preference shares and should be called original Preference shares; (article 7) that those shares should carry a Cumulative Preferential dividend of 7 per cent. per annum; and (article 8) that in a winding up the surplus assets of the company should be applied first in payment to the holders of the original Preference shares of the paid up capital, secondly in payment to the holders of the original Preference shares of an amount equal to the difference (if any) between the total amount of dividends paid and 7 per cent. per annum on the capital paid up, and thirdly in payment to the holders of Ordinary shares as there mentioned.

Article 65 provided as follows:—

"Subject to any special terms as to voting upon which any shares may be issued or may for the time being be held, every member personally present at a meeting shall have one vote on a show of hands and every member shall upon a poll have one vote for every share held by him but the original Preference shares shall not confer upon the holders the right to attend or vote, either in person or by proxy, at any general meeting or to have notice of such meeting unless the meeting is convened for reducing the capital otherwise than by merely cancelling capital paid up or credited as paid up on Ordinary shares or for winding up or sanctioning a sale of the company's undertaking or for altering the regulations of the company or where the proposition submitted to the meeting directly affects the rights and privileges of the holders of the original Preference shares or the dividend thereon is in arrear for more than three months after any half yearly day fixed by these articles or by the terms of issue for the payment thereof."

The 250,000 Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares were issued and fully paid and by the terms of issue dates were fixed for the payment of dividends.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on January 20, 1919, a resolution was passed increasing the capital of the company to £1,650,000 by the creation and issue of 1,000,000 new shares called "B" Preference shares. By that resolution the "B" Preference shares were given a right to a Cumulative Preference dividend of 6 per cent., ranking after the original Preference shares. The resolution also provided (inter alia) that the new shares should have—

"the same voting rights (subject to the same restrictions and qualifications mutatis mutandis in all respects as regards receiving notice of and attending and voting at general meetings) as the original Preference shares, but no further voting rights."

The "B" Preference shares were duly issued and fully paid.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on January 21, 1920, it was resolved that the capital of the company should be increased to £5,000,000 by the creation of 3,350,000 new shares of £1 each. The directors were thereby authorized to issue any of the new shares with such rights in regard to dividend and return of capital and with such voting rights as they should determine, but with the reservation of a right to issue further "B" Preference shares as therein mentioned.

On January 26, 1920, the directors passed a resolution for the issue of 1,500,000 10 per cent. Preferred Ordinary shares, with the right to a non-cumulative Preferential dividend on the paid-up capital payable in respect of each year exclusively out of the profits earned by the company during each year and to rank after the original Preference and "B" Preference shares. The resolution also provided inter alia that those shares should have

"the same voting rights (subject to the same restrictions and qualifications mutatis mutandis in all respects as regards receiving notices of and attending and voting at general meetings) as the said original Preference shares and 'B' Preference shares, but no further voting rights."

It was on behalf of the holders of those shares that the plaintiffs were suing.

In 1920 the company experienced difficulties and a receiver was appointed in a Debenture holders' action, but ultimately a scheme of arrangement was carried through, the receiver being discharged. Since then the company had prospered and earned substantial profits, but by reason of the lee-way which had to be made up no profits had been available since June 30, 1920, to pay dividends.

Until the 11th general meeting, held on August 31, 1926, the Preferred Ordinary shareholders had always been summoned to general meetings of the company. It was the failure to do so for the meeting of August 31, 1926, that caused these proceedings.

Mr. Jenkins, K.C., and Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Cecil Turner for the defendant company.

Mr. Justice Tomlin, in giving judgment, said that it was to be observed that the holders of Preferred Ordinary shares were given (putting it shortly) the same voting rights mutatis mutandis as the original Preference shareholders and the "B" Preference shareholders, but no further voting rights.

The voting rights of the original Preference shareholders were set out in article 65 and the effect of the referential clause in the directors' resolution must be that, for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of the shareholders, it was necessary to read article 65 as though whenever there was a reference to the original Preference shares there was substituted a reference to the Ten per Cent. Preferred Ordinary shares, and as though the appropriate alteration in dates were made.

It was not suggested that, on its construction, the referential clause could be read as giving the Ten per Cent. Preferred Ordinary shareholders a right to vote whenever the "B" Preference shareholders voted. The question was as to the true construction of article 65 read as indicated. The answer must depend on the true meaning of the phrase "or the dividend thereon is in arrear for more than three months" after the appropriate date for payment.

The plaintiffs said that "in arrear" meant if no dividend was paid, and that as they had had no dividend they were entitled to be summoned to meetings. On the other hand, the defendants said that where, as here, the Preferred shares were non-cumulative, there could be no arrears in respect of any year in which there were no profits earned available for dividends. It was further said that, if it were otherwise, the curious result would follow that, if once the dividend was passed, the non-cumulative Preferred shareholders would have a right in perpetuity to attend meetings, even though they thereafter received in every year the dividend in full.

He (his Lordship) thought that the word "arrears" or the words "in arrear" connoted in the strict sense a reference to a sum which had become due and payable and had not been paid. They might, however, be used in a secondary sense to indicate some deficiency which was capable, either certainly or contingently, of being made good. It was that secondary meaning which was attributed to the word "arrears" in In re Springbok Agricultural Estates, Limited ([1920] 1 Ch., 563), and that meaning might be applicable to the words "in arrear" used in article 65.

The secondary sense did not, however, assist the plaintiffs. Was there, then, a third sense wide enough to cover the non-payment of something—a non-cumulative Preference dividend payable out of the profits of each year and not paid because no profits were available for the dividend—which never in fact became payable, and never could in the future in any contingency become payable or be made good? It was impossible to say that there might not be a context which would necessarily require some such sense, but in his (his Lordship's) judgment the words "in arrear" in article 65 could not, in the context in which they occurred, be so construed.

The plaintiffs had suggested that the words mutatis mutandis enabled the Court to mould article 65 by giving to the Ten per Cent. Preferred Ordinary shareholders, when no dividend had been earned, the right, three months after the date fixed for the payment of dividend, to attend meetings until the next dividend date. He (his Lordship) could find no justification for that, which would amount to settling new terms of application for the Preferred Ordinary shares.

The action must be dismissed, with costs.

DONALD CAMPBELL AND COMPANY, LIMITED v. POLLAK.*

Practice — Costs — Appeal — House of Lords—Appeal for costs—Competency—Order as to costs founded on error of law.

The rule of the House of Lords as to appeals for costs, while it prevents the House from entertaining an appeal for costs on the mere ground that the discretion of the Court has been wrongly exercised, does not prevent it from entertaining such appeal on the ground that the order is founded on an error of law.

So held by the majority of their Lordships, Viscount Sumner and Lord Shaw of Dunfermline dissenting.

On an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of Mr. Justice Branson as to costs, the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that it was an appeal for costs.

The respondent was formerly in the employ of a firm of Donald Campbell and Co., and, on the firm being converted into the appellant company, became a director of the company. The company had since gone into liquidation. Actions were brought against the respondent by the firm and the company, and the actions were consolidated. These actions were tried before a Judge and jury and in each case the plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment in their favour. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial of both actions. The House of Lords allowed the judgment in the action by the firm to stand, but affirmed the order of the Court of Appeal for a new trial of the action by the company.

At the re-trial of the second action, without a jury, Mr. Justice Branson gave judgment in favour of the respondent, but without costs, having regard to the fact that the respondent had been guilty of improper conduct, which necessitated the second action.

The respondent appealed, without leave, to the Court of Appeal against so much of the judgment as related to costs.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Atkin) allowed the appeal on the ground that the trial Judge in dealing with the costs was not entitled to take into account the proceedings in the other action, and had therefore no materials upon which to exercise his discretion.

The total costs of the litigation amounted to many thousands of pounds.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. H. J. Astell Burt appeared for the respondent in support of the preliminary objection; and Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. E. F. Spence, K.C., for the appellants.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: Mr. Justice Branson, who re-tried this action (under an order for a new trial) without a jury, decided the issues of fact in favour of the defendant (the respondent in this appeal), but gave judgment for him without costs. In arriving at his decision not to give the defendant his costs, the learned Judge relied mainly upon the fact—established by the verdict and judgment in another action which had been consolidated with the present action—that the defendant had been guilty of improper conduct which (as he held) had induced the liquidator of the appellant company, and, indeed, had forced him in the execution of his duty, to bring the present action. On an appeal by the defendant to the Court of Appeal against so much of the judgment of Mr. Justice Branson as had ordered that no order should be made as to costs, that Court held that the trial Judge was not entitled to take into account the proceedings in the other action—which (as they held) had been "de-consolidated" and wholly separated from the present action by the order for a new trial of this action—and accordingly that the Judge had no materials before him upon which it was right for him to exercise his discretion as to costs; and they allowed the appeal and declared the defendant entitled to his costs of action. The plaintiffs have now appealed to this House against the order of the Court of Appeal. The costs in question amount to a very large sum, as they include the costs of two long trials and several appeals. The respondent raises the preliminary objection that the appeal is incompetent as being an appeal as to costs only, and your Lordships have now to deal with this preliminary objection.

The objection appears, at first sight, to be somewhat surprising. Under section 5 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, and Order LXV., Rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, the costs of a trial without a jury are in the absolute discretion of the trial Judge; and under section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (which was in force when the appeal to the Court of Appeal was heard), no order made by the High Court of Justice or any Judge thereof as to costs only which by law were left to the discretion of the Court was subject to any appeal except by leave of the Court or Judge making such order. Notwithstanding these enactments, the respondent appealed (without leave of the Court or Judge) to the Court of Appeal against the order of the trial Judge as to costs, and he succeeded in that appeal on the ground that the Judge had no right in law to make that order; and, now that the appellants ask your Lordships to review that decision and to hold that the trial Judge had such a right, the respondent objects that the appeal to this House is as to costs only and cannot be entertained. It would seem that, if the appeal to the Court of Appeal, which was an appeal as to costs only, was competent notwithstanding the statutory prohibition of such appeals, the appeal to this House must be equally competent notwithstanding the rule of the House which prohibits such appeals. But the respondent contends that the rule adopted by this House goes beyond the terms of the statute which binds the Court of Appeal, and that under that rule this appeal cannot be heard.

My Lords, there are passages to be found, both in speeches made in this House and in text-books of authority, which lay it down in broad terms that an appeal as to costs only will not be entertained here; but it is plain that the rule, so stated, needs some qualification. For instance, an order made contrary to a statute which gives a party a right to his costs is clearly appealable (see Tod v. Tod, 2 Wilson and Shaw, 542). So, an order as to costs made by the Court of Appeal without jurisdiction must needs be subject to an appeal to this House, for otherwise the law might be broken without redress; and Garnett v. Bradley (3 App. Cas., 944) and Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355; 14 App. Cas., 26) are instances of such appeals. Why, then, should a decision of the Court of Appeal as to costs which is founded on a wrong view of the law—and in dealing with the preliminary objection this must be assumed to be the case—be exempt from review? If, on argument, it should appear that the Court of Appeal was wrong in holding that the trial Judge had no right to refer to the proceedings in the consolidated action, then there was no ground on which the Court of Appeal could discharge his decision as to costs, and the order setting that decision aside was made contrary to the statute and was without jurisdiction. Why should the appellants be prohibited from putting forward this contention? The suggestion that, if the appeal were allowed on that ground, the House would be reviewing a discretion exercised by the Court of Appeal is obviously untenable; for if that Court was wrong in setting aside the discretionary order of the trial Judge, then there was no field for the exercise of any discretion by the Court of Appeal itself. On principle, therefore, unless there is some settled rule of the House which prevents your Lordships from hearing the appeal, I am of opinion that it should be heard.

My Lords, if the authorities are carefully examined, I think it will appear that there is no rule of the House which prevents a party from asking to have a decision reviewed on the ground that it is wrong in law, even though the only result of a reversal of the decision would be to alter the incidence of costs. In my opinion, the true rule is that, while this House will not review an exercise of discretion as to costs, it will not refuse to entertain an argument that an order as to costs is founded on an error of law.

As the contention of the respondent is wholly based on the citation of cases, I feel compelled to trouble your Lordships with a review of the decisions of this House bearing upon the point; and I have thought it well to include in order of date the relevant decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and some statements made by Lord Chancellors when sitting on appeal from Judges in Chancery. The earliest case with which I am acquainted is Duvall v. Terrey (Shower, P.C., 15), where the appeal failed on merits and the report concludes:—"And as to costs, held no cause for an appeal in this case, nor in truth was it ever known to be a cause if the merits were against the party appellant. And so the decree was affirmed in the whole." In Huband v. Huband (7 Brown, P.C., 433) a decree of Lord Keeper Harcourt was affirmed except as to costs. In Gould v. Granger (Mosely, 395) "the Lord Chancellor (Lord King) allowed an appeal from the Master of the Rolls for costs only, and his Lordship said he had known the House of Lords allow an appeal for costs only, tho' the old practice was otherwise." In Owen v. Griffith (1 Ves. sen., 250), on an appeal from a decree made by Mr. Justice Abney upon a bill against an execution creditor for an account on the ground that the Judge had not given the defendant her costs, counsel for the respondent insisted on "the general rule that there could not be an appeal for costs only"; but Lord Chancellor Hardwicke allowed the appeal, saying that the creditor was clearly entitled to his costs on the merits "if not precluded by that rule; which I have often heard so delivered by the Court. The foundation of it," he added, "was to prevent vexation and trouble; for, as cases in equity often depend on abundance of circumstances about which as the reason of mankind might differ, it would create perpetual appeals; but this is no printed rule; and it seems somewhat strict and hard to adhere to it; for since the stamp duties, costs come to be very material. Yet, if it was to be laid open generally, that an appeal might be for costs, it would cause that general inconvenience, to which a particular inconvenience ought to give way. But if a sound distinction from the rule can be made, it ought to be allowed; and it will be very unfortunate if in this case the defendant should be precluded thereby; for being an incumbrancer for a just debt, and having a lien on the estate for her costs as well as her demand, it seems to be an exception, and different from the Court's not suffering matters to be overruled merely for costs." In Cowper v. Scott (1 Eden, 17) the Lord Keeper (Lord Northington) said that an appeal or re-hearing for costs only was not to be encouraged, "because costs are merely discretionary, and depending upon particular circumstances; and when a Judge has once determined the matter a re-hearing for costs should be admitted with great caution"; but upon the authority of Owen v. Griffith (supra) he allowed the appeal. In Wirdman v. Kent (1 Brown, C.C., 140) Lord Chancellor Thurlow is reported to have said that the appeal in Owen v. Griffith (supra) was admitted upon such an apparent mistake that upon motion for enrolment the minutes of the decree would have been altered; but (as the editor of Brown's Reports points out) Lord Thurlow can hardly have said this, as Lord Hardwicke clearly treated the case of an execution creditor as a sound exception to the rule.

I turn now to the cases which were cited in the argument on this appeal. In Fitzgibbon v. Scanlan (1 Dow, 261, at p. 270) the appellant, although unsuccessful on the merits, was relieved of some of the costs thrown upon him by the order below; and Lord Eldon said that, "although an appeal would not be received merely on the subject of costs, yet it did not follow but the article of costs might be taken into consideration when there was an appeal respecting other matters." In Tod v. Tod (supra), where there was a cross-appeal as to costs only, Lord Eldon said that this House never entertained an appeal for costs "where costs were in the discretion of the Court below"; but the appellant in the cross-appeal, who was entitled by statute to his costs, succeeded in his appeal. In Burkett v. Spray (1 Russell and Mylne, 113) a decree was varied on appeal as to costs only, Lord Lyndhurst saying that an appeal would lie in respect of costs if any principle were involved and they were not merely given as consequential on the decree. In Brodie v. Sinclair (5 Wilson and Shaw, 567), where a pursuer who had succeeded as to a part of his claim had been ordered to pay the defender's costs of suit on the ground "that the expense of litigation in this case had been mainly, if not altogether, occasioned by the pursuer insisting for the other items in the account which have not been sustained," this House set aside that part of the decree, Lord Chancellor Brougham saying, "It is quite true that the costs are in the discretion of the Court in all cases, but I find there is no such rule as that assumed for the interlocutor." In Inglis v. Mansfield (3 Cl. and Fin., 362) the appeal failed on merits, but the appellant was relieved of the costs thrown upon him by the judgment, and Lord Brougham said (p. 371):—

"The rule with respect to costs in this House, as well as in the Privy Council and the Court of Chancery, is that you cannot appeal for costs alone; but you can bring an appeal on the merits; and if that is not a colourable ground of appeal for the purpose of introducing the question of costs to the Court called upon to review the case, the Court of Review will treat that, not as an appeal for costs, but will, in affirming the judgment given in the Court below, consider the question of costs as if it is fairly raised."

In Clyne's Trustees v. Dunnet (Maclean and Robinson, 28) Lord Cottenham used similar expressions, but said that the order of the Court below as to costs was right. In Angell v. Davis (4 Mylne and Craig, 360), where a decree had been made giving a trustee his costs of the cause out of the estate, Lord Cottenham, relying on Owen v. Griffith (supra), Cowper v. Scott (supra), and Burkett v. Spray (supra), allowed an appeal by the beneficiaries against that part of the decree and ordered the trustee to pay the costs of the cause so far as they had been occasioned by his own misconduct. In Home v. Pringle (8 Cl. and Fin., 264) the House dismissed an appeal by trustees claiming to be entitled to their costs, Lord Cottenham saying, at p. 293:—

"A Court of Appeal does not interfere in the question of costs without reluctance in any case, and generally will not entertain an appeal for costs alone."

I pass to the more recent cases, and first to Wilson v. The Queen (L.R. 1 P.C., 405). In that case one of the appellants (Cole) appealed to the Queen in Council against a decree of the Admiralty Judge at Sierra Leone on the ground that, although he had succeeded in the Court below, he had not been awarded the costs of the proceedings; and Lord Cairns said, at p. 408:—

"Their Lordships are of opinion that, with regard to the appellant, Cole, the appeal is strictly and simply one for costs, under circumstances in which their Lordships have at all times laid down as a rule that an appeal for costs could not be entertained."

The order for costs which was the subject of appeal was clearly discretionary. In Yeo v. Tatem (L.R. 3 P.C., 696), an action in the Admiralty Court for damages caused by collision, the defendants pleaded a general denial and also a special defence founded on the doctrine of res judicata. On evidence that the damage had been caused by a third party the Court gave judgment for the defendants without costs, and declined to go into the special defence. On an appeal by the defendants to the Judicial Committee, it was held that, although the issue on the special defence had become material only as regards costs, the appellants were entitled to have judgment upon it and to have the general costs of the action. The appeal was accordingly allowed; and Sir Joseph Napier, who delivered the judgment of the Board, said, at p. 702:—

"Their Lordships do not mean to question or recede from the decisions that have been pronounced regarding not allowing an appeal for costs, but where there has been a mistake upon some matter of law that governs or affects costs—some matter that involves the due application of principles of law—the party prejudiced is entitled to have the benefit of correction by appeal."

This was a plain case of an appeal on a point affecting costs only, and the appeal was allowed. The same may be said of Garnett v. Bradley (supra), where, the plaintiff in an action for slander tried with a jury having recovered only one farthing damages, the Court of Appeal had held that under the statute 21 Jac. I., c. 16, he was not entitled to the costs of the action; but the House of Lords, holding that the statute of James I. had in effect been repealed by Order LV., gave him his costs. In that case the issue upon merits had been finally determined by the verdict of the jury and the judgment in the action, and the appeal to this House was plainly as to costs only; but it was not suggested that it was incompetent. In Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 582) it was held that an order of the Court of Appeal which imposed, as a condition for a new trial, the payment of the costs of the first trial was not an appeal in respect of costs only and ought, therefore, to be entertained; and Lord Selborne, at p. 584, stated the rule as follows:—

"The rule, subject to certain exceptions, is established that an appeal is not to be allowed in respect of costs only; which means that, when the merits of a question have been determined, and when a Court has thought fit to give or refuse costs in the exercise of its discretion, and in the absence of any settled principle upon the subject, the Courts of Appeal must give so much credit to the exercise of that discretion as not to allow the merits, when they are no longer in controversy, to be again gone over with great expenditure, not only of money but also of judicial time, for the mere purpose of reviewing that discretion."

No doubt the appeal in that case was not in respect of costs only, but was an appeal against a refusal to make an unconditional order for a new trial; but the language of Lord Selborne is interesting as showing the origin and meaning of the rule under discussion. In Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra) an appeal as to costs only was entertained, the question argued being whether there was "good cause" for depriving a litigant of costs under Order LXV., Rule 1, but the decision of the Court of Appeal on this point was affirmed. Lastly, in Rieken v. Yorke Peninsula District Justices (24 The Times L.R., 821; [1908] A.C., 454) the Judicial Committee disallowed an appeal against an order as to costs on the ground that the Court in Australia had exercised a judicial discretion and that there had been no mistake of law.

As reliance has been placed upon a decision of the Appeal Committee established by Lord Eldon in the year 1812, it may be convenient to refer to a few decisions of that Committee to which my attention has been called by the Judicial Department of the House. In Robertson v. Tait (1852) an appeal as to costs only was dismissed as incompetent, and Lord Chancellor St. Leonards said :—

"The rule, I apprehend, both here and in the Courts below, is that you cannot appeal for costs generally. If the question of costs involves a serious question of law, then, although you only go for costs, the appeal may be sustained, because in that appeal it may be necessary to decide a question of law. Now here what has been stated shows . . . what the general rule is ; but it is equally clear that it is not a binding or positive rule."

In Marquess of Ailsa v. Kerr (1853) an appeal as to costs only was dismissed, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) saying :—

"You cannot have an appeal on the subject of costs where, the decree being otherwise right, the discretion of the Court is exercised wrongly upon the subject of costs. . . ."

In Sawers v. Monteith (1869), on an appeal against a discretionary order as to costs, Lord Hatherley said : "The appeal upon costs only we do not proceed with." Again, in Thallon v. Kinnear Moode and Co. (1884) an appeal against a discretionary order as to costs was dismissed as incompetent. Lastly, in Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie (briefly reported in [1903] A.C., 126) the respondent petitioned against the competency of an appeal on two grounds : first, that it was an appeal on costs only ; and, secondly, that under the statute which was there in question an appeal would only lie on a question of law. The Appeal Committee dismissed the appeal, Lord Macnaghten saying (as appears from the shorthand note) :—

"Their Lordships are of opinion that the objection is a good one and must prevail."

It does not clearly appear on which of the two grounds the appeal was dismissed ; and, in any event, the order as to costs made by the Court below was a discretionary order, the Court of Session having a very wide discretion as to costs. There is, therefore, not much to be learned from this decision.

My Lords, I have gone through this long succession of cases only for the purpose of ascertaining what is the precise rule which has been laid down by this House ; for I agree that, if a rule of practice exists, it ought not now to be disturbed, and that the rule (whatever it may be) was not abrogated by section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876. The result of my examination appears to me to be (1) that there is no universal rule that an appeal as to costs only will not be entertained by this House, but the true rule is as stated by Lord Northington in Cooper v. Scott (supra), by Lord Eldon in Tod v. Tod (supra), and by Lord Selborne in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (supra), as well as by Sir Joseph Napier in the Judicial Committee and by Lord St. Leonards and Lord Cranworth in the Appeal Committees ; and accordingly (2) that in this House, as in the Court of Appeal, an appeal from a discretionary order as to costs will not be received, except, perhaps, in cases where there is also a bona fide appeal on merits ; but (3) that when it is alleged that the Court of Appeal in dealing with costs has fallen into error on a point of law which governs or affects costs, an appeal on that question will be heard. There are (as will have been seen) many cases in which an appeal under those conditions has been entertained, and there is no case in which such an appeal has been held to be incompetent.

If this be the true view, then it is plain that the appeal in the present case, in which the exercise by the trial Judge of his statutory discretion as to costs has been set aside by the Court of Appeal on legal grounds, ought to be allowed to proceed. I therefore move your Lordships that the preliminary objection to this appeal be disallowed and that the costs of and consequent upon that objection be paid by the respondent in any event.

Viscount Haldane (read by Lord Carson).—My Lords : The point with which we are at present concerned in this case is whether an appeal lies to this House from a judgment of the Court of Appeal. That Court had varied a judgment of Mr. Justice Branson in favour of the respondent, the defendant in an action, tried by the learned Judge without a jury, for damages in respect of alleged breach of contract and fraud. Mr. Justice Branson had deprived the respondent of costs, amounting to a large sum, in the exercise of what he considered to be the discretion which he could exercise. The Court of Appeal altered this, directing that the judgment in favour of the respondent should carry costs. Assuming for the purposes of the present question that the appellants may develop a substantial case against the decision of the trial Judge depriving the successful defendant of his prima facie title to his costs, there remains a preliminary question which has to be decided at this stage of the appeal to your Lordships' House. It is whether the appeal, which is limited exclusively to the question of these costs, is one which, according to the principle that regulates our practice, can be entertained at all. When a trial takes place without a jury the costs, under section 5 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, and Order LXV., rule 1, are in the discretion of the trial Judge, and under section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, there is to be no appeal from the exercise of his discretion except by leave of the Judge who made the order. Nevertheless the respondent appealed against the order without leave, and succeeded in the Court of Appeal, upon the ground that the Judge had no right in law to make it for the reason for which he did make it. Mr. Justice Branson, in deciding not to allow costs to the defendant, relied on the circumstance that the verdict and judgment in another action against the defendant, in which the plaintiffs were different persons from the appellants, the plaintiffs in the present case, established facts which justified the liquidator of the appellant company in the execution of his duty in bringing the present action. But the Court of Appeal, holding that Mr. Justice Branson was not entitled to take into account the proceedings in a different case with different parties, considered that the learned Judge had not proper materials before him on which he was at liberty to exercise his discretion under the rule as to costs.

The question with which we have to deal presents this peculiarity. The appeal to the Court of Appeal was brought without leave. This may have been legitimate on the ground that the Judge was said to have been without a reason on which to proceed legitimately in the way he did. But it seems curious that if that were so an appeal to this House raising what seems to be a precisely analogous question should be incompetent. If it is so, this must be for some special reason which has been definitely established by this House in relation to its own proceedings, and which goes beyond the principle applied in the Court of Appeal. It seems as though it must be shown that this House is precluded by its established decisions from entertaining an appeal which relates exclusively to costs given by the Court below in the exercise of its discretion, even when the exercise of that discretion has arisen out of error about matter of law.

This question is one the answer to which must be collected from a study of the authorities. It is not enough that section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 1876 gives in general terms a right of appeal from the Court of Appeal to this House. The general words employed in this section may not be sufficient to interfere with the special practice of this House if such a practice is established. What the section was directed to was to get rid of the repeal of appellate jurisdiction effected by a statute of 1873, and not to the alteration of the settled practice where jurisdiction existed.

When the authorities are examined they disclose, what is apt to happen unless a very definite principle is being enunciated, a certain vagueness in judicial statement. Where a rule is laid down it is sometimes qualified by exceptions which are vaguely expressed. If, however, the cases are read as a connected series of utterances the result seems to me to admit of two different contentions. One is that it is established that when an appeal to the House of Lords resolves itself into a question only of costs the House will refuse to entertain it. It is added that this refusal is not confined to cases where discretionary costs have been dealt with below in accordance with an exercise of a discretion conferred and not infringing any principle of law. It is said that costs can be dealt with where they are ancillary to a variation of the substance of a judgment, but that otherwise there is no power to deal with them unless the case comes within certain nominate exceptions referred to in the course of the discussion. In effect these are said to be :—(1) instances in which the order as to costs has been made personally against parties who have as matter of law a right to be exempted from them, such as trustees and mortgagees ; (2) instances in which costs have been ordered to be paid out of a particular property to the prejudice of persons interested in it and not before the Court ; (3) instances in which a statutory or analogous legal title has been disregarded. All of these are exceptions in which a substantive right is said to have been violated, as distinguished from cases in which it is claimed that there has been what is merely a non-judicial and in that restricted sense improper exercise of the function of the Judge to the appellant's disadvantage. Mere error in law not of a special character is accordingly in this view not enough to give ground for an appeal.

The observation at once occurs that the exceptions which the authorities relied on for this conclusion illustrate are upon this interpretation of the restriction curiously limited in nature and unconnected in character. So far as they go, they certainly do not give ground for the assertion of a more general principle, such as that this House will make an exception to the rule against hearing an appeal against a mere award of costs where any general principle of law has been disregarded.

Speaking for myself, after examination of the authorities, I do not think that they establish the list of exceptions collected above as an exhaustive list. If an order as to costs were, for example, made without jurisdiction, I do not think that they show that there could be no appeal to get rid of the illegality committed. Surely the burden lies heavily on those who assert that this House has precluded itself by decisions from entertaining such an appeal, and from dealing in this case with such a decision of the Court of Appeal based on want of jurisdiction, as freely as that Court dealt with the decision of Mr. Justice Branson.

The second and alternative interpretation of the scope of the authorities admits of this. It concedes that the settled practice of this House, and indeed of the higher Courts of Appeal in England generally, is to refuse to admit appeals as to costs alone where these have been disposed of by the Court below as matter of discretion. But what is an exercise of mere discretion, and what is in reality a declaration based on imagined legal principle, are matters not so clear. In 1749, when Lord Hardwicke was laying the foundations of the modern system of equity procedure, he laid down a principle which admits of costs under certain conditions being made the subject of appeal. He said of the rule that there cannot be an appeal for costs only, that it was "no printed rule," and that while it was for the general convenience that the rule should be maintained, a sound distinction where it could be made ought to be allowed. That was in Owen v. Griffith (1 Ves. sen., 250). I cite the case, not as fully defining the principle as it exists to-day, but as showing that in the days when it was being developed its now rigid character was emphasized. In inquiries into the origin and scope of rules of practice of this kind a genetic method seems essential.

Pursuing this method, the conclusion to which the language of the leading authorities seems to point is that where a discretion as to costs has been exercised on material that is illegitimate or is non-existent, or in violation of some principle of substantive right, an appeal will be entertained. Turning first to the question as it stands to-day in the Court of Appeal, I think that this is established there. That it should be so is important, for the restriction on appeals for costs as stated in the decisions of this House is not stated as though it were the outcome of a principle which is peculiar to the House. In Civil Service Co-operative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 756) the plaintiffs sued to recover money paid on a consideration that had failed. The learned Judge who heard the case gave judgment for the defendants, but as they would not accept suggestions made by him for a settlement he deprived them of their costs. They appealed, and the Court of Appeal said that there were no materials before the Judge upon which he could legitimately exercise a discretion to this effect, and that accordingly he had no power to make the order. "No doubt," said Lord Halsbury, who presided at the hearing, "where a Judge has exercised his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, it may not be, and I think it is not, within the power of the Court of Appeal to overrule that exercise of discretion. But the necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials upon which the discretion can be exercised must be satisfied." Why is this principle not applicable to appeals to this House ? No doubt your Lordships have power to define the conditions on which such appeals are to be allowed. But have you done so in such a fashion as to exclude appeals as to costs when the discretion has been exercised in a way which is alleged to be contrary to the law ? Certainly Lord Hardwicke did not say so. In Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355 ; 14 App. Cas., 26) the question which arose related to another part of the Order which enabled the trial Judge to direct that where he found "good cause" the costs were not to follow the event, as was to be the normal course where the trial was with a jury. It was said here, that where the discretionary power to deprive of costs for good cause had been duly exercised, that exercise was not to be subject to any review. And it was also said by the House that not any reason which may have been assigned for disallowing the costs of a party who had been successful in getting a verdict must necessarily be accepted as good cause. If the trial Judge gives effect to considerations which do not constitute "good cause" his decision is not protected from review. The House therefore listened to an appeal which was only concerned with costs.

My Lords, there are observations in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 582) which appear to me to be only consistent with the view I have preferred, and in Yeo v. Tatem (L.R., 3 P.C., 696) that view was distinctly enunciated in the judgment delivered for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by Sir Joseph Napier at page 702. In the hearing of that case Lord Justice James and Lord Justice Mellish, both great authorities on the old general practice, took part.

The decision of the Appeal Committee in Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie ([1903] A.C., 126) was cited in support of the contrary general proposition that the House will not entertain an appeal against costs only. That case was not a decision of the House and no reasons are given, and it is not clear that the preliminary question may not, in reality, have turned equally on the provision of the Judicature Act of Scotland which confines appeals to this House in cases commenced in the Sheriff's Court to matters of law alone. I find myself unable to treat this imperfectly reported case before the Appeal Committee as having been intended to overrule, or as having been capable of overruling deliberately, the principle underlying the other decisions to which I have referred. There are further decisions which support the view which I have expressed, but on these I do not think it necessary to enter because they have been referred to by the Lord Chancellor, in whose analysis of them I concur. I think, with him, that when the right to costs, or the existence of a discretion as to costs, depends on the decision of a question of law or procedure, an appeal on that question will be heard. The general rule against appeals as to costs is, as Lord Hardwicke said as long ago as 1749, a "paper rule," in the sense that it is a prima facie statement capable of being displaced in this way.

I therefore think that the respondent is not entitled to succeed upon his present contention.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords: Before forming my opinion in this case I had the great advantage of perusing the opinions of the noble Lords who had heard the case on the former occasion. These opinions being equally divided were a sure proof that the case was not easy of determination, and I therefore think that no apology is needed for saying that my opinion has not been arrived at without much thought and hesitation. The opinions to which I have referred have so thoroughly analysed the numerous decided cases that it would be quite useless to do so again. I shall therefore, in the remarks which I venture to address to your Lordships, assume complete familiarity with the facts of the case and with the many decisions. I have myself come to the conclusion that it is not possible to say that this House has in terms laid down a rule which will settle this case. I do not think that that is a matter of great surprise because I think it is plain that the precise question could not have arisen before the Judicature Act, and since then no case which raises the point has reached your Lordships' House. It follows that our duty now is to lay down the rule which is to guide future practice.

It was natural that one should search with avidity for a precise decision which settled the matter. At one time during the discussion I thought I had found such a case in Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie ([1903] A.C., 126, and reported in the Court below 5 F., 30), but on further reflection I felt that this was not so. In the present case the Court of Appeal has altered the judgment of the trial Judge as to costs because it considered that the trial Judge had been influenced by evidence which was not legally before him. They could not, no leave to appeal as to costs having been either asked for or given by the trial Judge, under the terms of section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, simply apply their own discretion to the point as to whether the costs should be allowed or not. In Barrie's case (supra) the Inner House of the Court of Session, who have by Scottish law and practice just as full discretion as the Judge or Judges whose judgments they are reviewing, did look, as they were entitled to look, to certain evidence, and on their view of it came to the conclusion that the Judge from whom the appeal came had been right. The result, so far as appeal to this House is concerned, would have been the same if they had held that he was wrong.

The nearest approach to a general rule, indeed so far as expression is concerned it might be taken as a general rule, is, in my opinion, what Lord Watson said in the case of Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 582, at p. 586):—

"I quite concede the propriety of the rule that the Court of last resort ought not to entertain an appeal which involves nothing except the payment of costs, but it appears to me that that rule is limited to the case where the whole merits of the action or cause have been determined, and where the Judges who have decided the cause have applied their minds to the right of the parties to receive an award of costs, looking to the whole circumstances and the conduct of the case; because it must be kept in view that the right to costs does not, in most cases, merely depend upon the merits of the cause as finally decided, but may, to a very great extent, depend upon the mode in which it has been conducted throughout by the parties."

It would, however, have been, I think, impossible in view of the numerous judgments and the varying forms of expression contained therein to pick out the dictum of one Judge and say that it settled the rule as laid down by this House. It follows, in my view, that your Lordships have now for the first time to lay down the rule by an authoritative judgment.

Now before stating what I think the rule should be I wish to state a preliminary proposition. It has not strictly to do with the rule, but I think it is necessary before going to the rule. That proposition is that if in any case the merits are raised by a competent appeal before this House, raised bona fide and not merely colourably with a further intent, then, however infinitesimal the pecuniary value of the merits may be in comparison with the pecuniary value of the costs, yet appeal will lie and the costs may be dealt with with a free hand.

I come now to the rule when the appeal is for costs alone. It is to be remembered that the appeal is always from a Court of Appeal, and it is that judgment which is to be held appealable or not. What has happened in the former stages is, for the moment, immaterial. Further, I am using the words "costs alone" as meaning when the costs are the only stake. I am not for a moment saying that these words have always been so used by others, but I am using them in that sense, and in so doing I am, I think, doing the same as Lord Watson when he spoke of nothing but the payment of costs being involved.

The rules that I would wish to lay down are these. Appeal will lie :—

1. If an express statutory provision applies and it can be shown that the Court of Appeal has disregarded it. An illustration may be found in the case of Tod v. Tod (2 Wilson and Shaw, 542).

2. If a rule of law and not mere discretion could decide the question. Illustration : Lord Advocate v. Dunglas (9 Cl. and F., 173) and Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355 ; 14 App. Cas., 26).

3. If the Court of Appeal have based their judgment on a point of law which may or may not be erroneous. Illustration : the present case.

In all other cases no appeal will lie.

I do not fancy that there is any controversy as to the soundness of my first two rules. It is the third that is controverted. My Lords, I confess I think the justification of the third is that without it there would be grave injustice done. The position under the Judicature Act of the Court of Appeal is very peculiar. When an appeal comes to them as to costs awarded by the discretion of a Judge, they cannot exercise their discretion instead of his unless leave to appeal from his order as to costs has been given by him. By a long series of decisions the Court of Appeal has held that that does not prevent them from upsetting what the Judge has done if they can find that he had no proper materials on which his discretion was exercised. This having been found, it strictly becomes the duty of the Court of Appeal to refer the matter back to the Judge for a proper exercise by him of his discretion as to costs. It may be doubtful whether this view is sound, but it has been acted on so consistently and so long that as it is, after all, a question of procedure your Lordships would not now wish to interfere with it. Nothing would suit the appellants better than if you could, for the judgment of the Court of Appeal would simply disappear and Mr. Justice Branson's judgment would stand. But, as it is, it would surely be very unjust that the respondent here could get rid of the trial Judge's judgment upon the point of law that he had considered matter which it was illegitimate for him to consider, and that then that view could not be overruled, if erroneous, by this House. This House is then revising not a discretion but a legal opinion that no discretion had been exercised. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal in this case is competent.

Viscount Sumner (read by Viscount Dunedin).—My Lords : On both the occasions when this preliminary objection has been argued at the Bar, the question has been, as I understood, whether any rule of this House existed which limited the competence of appeals for costs and, if so, how that rule had been defined by your Lordships' predecessors. On neither was there question of laying down a new rule, except in so far as the application of an old rule to new circumstances may itself be said to renew it. I think it is necessary to note this, because there is a singular lack of decided cases on the point in this century, and the precise issue raised in this appeal could not have arisen before the orders and rules of 1875, and could not previously have been contemplated even constructively. This appeal really rests upon authorities decided in the Court of Appeal upon the meaning and effect of the Judicature Act and the orders and rules made under it on the subject of costs, where there has not been a trial by jury. There has been no case in this House upon that effect of the rules, for I am convinced that Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355 ; 14 App. Cas., 26), whatever bearing it may have, is not now decisive. If it were, why have the older authorities been reviewed at all ? To this case I must return later.

My Lords, after the first argument I examined as exhaustively as I could the cases before this House and the Appeal Committee, both reported and unreported, which seemed to touch the point, and also the cases on costs in the Privy Council, and I submitted to your Lordships a detailed statement of them, on whichever side they appeared to be, with the conclusions that I drew. These have not found any favour with your Lordships and it would only be tiresome to examine all the cases again. As, however, the second argument has only confirmed my former view, and as it would be discourteous to dissent from your Lordships' better judgment without assigning reasons, I ask leave to trespass on your Lordships' time with a statement of the results of my examination of the cases and some observations on the present position of this appeal.

A hundred years ago the practice of the House as to appeals for costs only was not new, but it had not been formulated in published reports and decisions, still less in any regulation of the House itself. The general subject, especially as it was dealt with in Chancery, was familiar, and the distinction between costs as to which certain persons had vested rights, and costs which were entirely in the discretion of the Court, was well known. Still the question whether and, if so, under what circumstances costs which were in the discretion of the Court constituted appealable subject-matter was not and could not be a matter of general principle. In the absence of statutory regulation it was a matter of practice to be settled by the tribunal of the proposed appeal alone. In the case of an appeal to the House of Lords this practice derived its authority from the House. The rules adopted by the Privy Council or on a rehearing in Chancery might be known to be like those adopted by the House, and to the extent of that similarity might be contemporary evidence to show what the rule of the House was, but they could not even indirectly govern or prescribe it. It is not as though a uniform and consolidated body of rules had been laid down for the three tribunals, so that a case in the one would be any authority as to the practice of another. If this is right, the crucial examination of the decided cases is considerably limited in its scope.

Looking then at the opinions expressed by noble and learned Lords and the decisions of the House thereafter arrived at, there is abundant evidence that the formula " no appeal as to costs only " was regarded as a sufficient, if loose, description of the rule, and that, understanding the costs in question to have been costs in the discretion of the Court below, there is no adequate authority for treating that rule as doubtful or as admitting of fresh exceptions. The reported cases show, very early, that " costs " in this formula did not mean all or any costs, but only costs that had been in the discretion of the Court below. Step by step costs given by statute, costs of trustees, and costs of incumbrancers by way of mortgage or otherwise, were decided to be outside the rule. They were the subjects, respectively, of rights by law vested in certain parties antecedently to and independently of any Court's exercise of its discretion in their favour. On similar grounds the immunity of the Crown from having to pay costs constituted another vested exception, but these cases lend no aid to the contention that costs become an exception to this rule of incompetence, whenever the discussion of the order below involves what is called a "question of law." I think this has never been decided, and the dicta most favourable to the appellant fall far short of it. Lord St. Leonards leaves it in doubt whether it is upon the emergence of any question of law or only of a serious one that the competence of an appeal as to costs depends (Robertson v. Tait (unreported) (supra). Lord Cranworth's language would seem to show that, for a wrong exercise of discretion as to costs, there can in no case be an appeal (Marquess of Ailsa v. Kerr (unreported) (supra), and Lord Selborne, on the other hand (Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill, 5 App. Cas., 582), appears to be content with the vague statement that discretion is not interfered with "in the absence of any settled principles upon the subject," whatever that may mean. His words should be read in connexion with those of Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson in the same case, by which I think they are considerably limited. On the facts of that case, however, the question was not one of disregard of a settled principle as to the grant or refusal of costs, but of an order regarding the allowance of an appeal on the merits, which the Court of Appeal had clearly no jurisdiction to make. The House has so often declared in terms that an appeal as to discretionary costs is incompetent and will not be proceeded with, and has so often dismissed appeals accordingly, that the appellants' argument ought not to be that Huxley's case (supra) was a case as to discretionary costs and is therefore in point, but that their own appeal is one as to jurisdiction, like Huxley's case (supra), and is governed by it for that reason, which I have not understood them to allege. With the very doubtful exception of Brodie v. Sinclair (5 Wilson and Shaw, 567) I have not found any case in which your Lordships' House has entertained or allowed an appeal as to discretionary costs only, without some addition of the merits of the cause or of a question of jurisdiction or vested legal right. In Brodie's case (supra) the appellant had succeeded at the trial, though not as to all the items, and had been ordered, nevertheless, to pay all the unsuccessful defender's costs. Some rule of Scottish law was apparently vouched in justification of this singular order. Lord Brougham, L.C., after inquiry, satisfied himself that there was no such rule, and accordingly the appeal succeeded. Here again the Court below had disregarded the pursuer's legal right, which was not to be compelled to indemnify another for outlay neither incurred at his request nor necessitated by his breach of the law. The rule has been repeatedly stated (e.g., Fitzgibbon v. Scanlan, Dow, 261, at p. 270), that, if a question on the merits be appealed, provided that it be raised genuinely and not merely colourably, the House will hold itself free to modify the order made as to costs below, even if it dismisses the appeal on the merits. I cannot think that such a rule was needed, or would have been laid down, if the real mind of the House was that even discretionary costs could be made the subject of an appeal by themselves, if any question of law was added or involved. If this was the latent rule of the House, it already included their patent but narrower rule, and this express statement of it was merely otiose and confusing.

My Lords, in 1835 (Inglis v. Mansfield, 3 Cl. and F., 362), Lord Brougham is reported as having said that the Privy Council rule and the rule in Chancery too were then the same as that in the House of Lords. How this may have been it is hard to tell, for, scanty as are the reported decisions on the subject in the House of Lords before that date, in the Privy Council I think there is hardly one. The later decisions we must read for ourselves. I wish to make one general remark as to the Privy Council cases, which is equally applicable to the review of causes in Chancery. In the latter Court always, and in the Privy Council often, the appeal is a first and only appeal. In the case of the Privy Council the appeal is not infrequently from Vice-Admiralty Courts abroad or from Courts of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in England. It may well be that, for that reason, the Judicial Committee's general rule against appeals for costs only should be less strict than in the case of your Lordships' House, which is always a tribunal at least of second appeal. I cannot help thinking that this is a material consideration. Test it thus. If Mr. Pollak's appeal had failed in the Court of Appeal, how would a second appeal to this House have been regarded then ?

The case of Yeo v. Tatem (L.R., 3 P.C., 696) has been much relied on by the appellants. It is true that it is a case in which the immediate benefit to be derived from the appeal was to get an order for payment of costs, but I do not think that no other matter than a right to costs was involved in it. Sir Joseph Napier's words show that the appeal was taken out of the general rule against allowing appeals for costs only, because there had been a mistake upon some matter of law, which governed or affected costs or involved the application of principles of law. The matter of law there in question was not simply failure to give costs. It was a substantive error in declining to exercise jurisdiction to decide the issue as to recovery of full satisfaction for the matter of the plaintiff's claim in a previous personal action at law. This could only have been decided in favour of the appellant, and he would have thereby gained the advantage of being able to plead res judicata, if the matter were ever raised again. As the law then stood it was his vested legal right to have all the pleaded issues decided one way or the other (Rex v. Johnson, 6 Cl. and Fin., 41). As the report of Yeo v. Tatem, in 40 L.J., Adm. 29, shows, the respondent's main argument was that, as the alleged satisfaction was made in an action in personam and the Admiralty proceeding was in rem, neither the special plea nor the general issue sufficed to bring the common law proceedings before the Admiralty Judge as a matter requiring adjudication. The dispute was therefore as to the Judge's jurisdiction, the existence of which the respondent denied, and not as to his right to exercise it. Legal rights at that time constantly found expression in terms of pleading, and I think this discussion, technical as it looks, was really the natural way in which to raise the complaint that the appellant had not enjoyed the right secured to him by law and was not merely appealing about a failure to give him rather more costs than he actually got. It is thus as an appeal against the act of the Admiralty Judge in declining jurisdiction to the appellant's prejudice that Yeo v. Tatem (supra) was subsequently understood in Rieken v. Yorke Peninsula District Justices (24 The Times L.R., 821 ; [1908] A.C., 454, though it is true that Lord Collins, in stating the grounds on which the appeal was dismissed, says both that the Court below had exercised discretion and that there had been no mistake in law. This is equivalent to saying that the justices had not declined jurisdiction and that there was nothing appealable about their decision. He goes on to say that the Privy Council rule was the same as your Lordships', and so it was, if this is the right construction of the decision.

So much as to the current of authorities, which fix the substance of the rule. Assuming that the form in which it should be stated is that there is no appeal as to costs only, I see no escape from the present objection merely by saying that this appeal, though an appeal as to costs, is not an appeal as to costs only. Nothing is gained by saying it is an appeal as to a question of law as well. I think this expression only leads to confusion. You do not add a question of law to a question of costs; the two things are not in pari materia. You raise a question of law, which is a question of the law of costs. A question of law must be a question as to the law affecting some subject-matter, and so with a question of fact. The only subject-matter here is costs, and the only question of law is whether, in this case, the Judge's discretion as to costs was exercisable in either of two directions or in one only. Justiciable questions are not divisible into three kinds, questions of law, questions of fact, and questions of discretion. Judicial discretion as to costs goes to the Judge's powers over questions of law and questions of fact, but the powers themselves alike are powers over costs and costs only. The question suggested here is, whether the respondent's conduct in the first (the firm's) action was in any sufficient way made evidence before Mr. Justice Branson on the trial of the second (the company's) action, which appears to be a question of fact, and to be decisive of the matter one way or the other, but in any case I do not know what arguable question about costs there could be, other than mere questions of fact, that would not be some sort of question of law on the legal subject of costs. In the Court of Appeal, however, the decisions have so copiously laid down limitations and directions for the exercise of a Judge's discretion as to constitute a body of jurisprudence, which tends to destroy that free exercise of his statutory powers, which the Legislature conferred.

The relevancy of the inquiry into the effect of the reported cases on the present occasion is twofold. First, if it is laid down that the rule of the House always was such as to extend to appeals, which nowadays arise under Order LXV., rule 1, where a Judge sitting alone has deprived a successful party of costs and has not given leave to appeal, then in future discussions of other cases, coming under the same class but differing in their features from the present appeal, it will be open and may be necessary to go back to the old authorities in detail and to seek in them, and probably with success, reasons for distinguishing such other cases and excluding them from any appeal. Secondly, in the minds of some at any rate, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, section 3, presents a difficulty in the way of any rule limiting appeals at all, unless it can be affirmed that it is one which existed before that Act was passed and can therefore be deemed not to have been affected by it. I do not understand your Lordships to decide that all matters as to costs are appealable. Some remain incompetent still, section 3 notwithstanding. I take it, for example, that Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie ([1903] A.C., 126) must still render incompetent any order of the Court of Appeal as to costs which are in its own discretion, for it related to costs, which were in the discretion of the Court of Session. Hence the importance of discovering whether it really can be said that the rule existing before 1876 extended to the present case, or whether it is not really a question of making a new rule now.

My Lords, my own view would be that in a matter of practice your Lordships are and always were masters, and that no general statute as to jurisdiction could be read as limiting the right to mould the cursus curiae. This seems to have been the view which underlies section 11 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 1876. I think that the rule, both originally and all along, was a practice rather than a principle, a matter of self-defensive policy, like the maxim de minimis non curat lex or the Privy Council rule as to concurrent findings of fact, and these are clearly questions of the way in which the House exercises its jurisdiction. Such matters must be capable of modification, whenever your Lordships think it expedient from time to time. Particularly must this be so, where a new regulation of practice opens your Lordships' doors to new subjects of appeal not hitherto entertained. The only question in this view would have been one as to the expediency of the change, but this has not been the matter in debate, and I will only say that I am not at present persuaded on this head.

I should also like to point out, what I think may be very important in any further proceedings, that I do not understand your Lordships to pronounce any conclusion as to the validity of the practice, long as it has prevailed in the Court of Appeal, of entertaining appeals from a Judge below, brought without his leave, against the exercise of his discretion as to costs when sitting without a jury. The principles on which this is done and the grounds on which it is supported are very conveniently stated by referring to what was said by Lord Halsbury in the Civil Service Cooperative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10; [1903] 2 K.B., 756). This may stand for a numerous body of decisions. These decisions have not been put in the arguments on the present objection. Not unnaturally, Mr. Jowitt, whose client had appealed to the Court of Appeal successfully, did not argue that the decisions, under which this had been done, were wrong, but this does not alter the fact that they are not binding on this House, have never come before it for approval or the reverse, and will be open to review on future occasions. The fact that counsel did not dispute them in this case cannot, of course, make your Lordships' present decision equivalent to an affirmation of them.

Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra) is, no doubt, a case of importance in this connexion, but I think it must be clear that its value lies in analogy only. It is not a decision on the rule in the Civil Service Cooperative Society's case (supra). I see no difficulty in reconciling the fact that the House entertained the appeal in Huxley's case (supra) with the existence of a rule, good or bad, that it will not entertain appeals as to costs only. The question being "was there good cause?" the decision did not touch the question "was there good enough cause?" The ground of the appeal was that the Lord Chief Justice had acted without jurisdiction, surely an appealable matter apart from the mode in which he dealt with the costs. If he acted without jurisdiction the litigants' legal rights were invaded, just as in Yeo v. Tatem (supra) they were disregarded. Order LXV., rule 1, has the force of law and Huxley's case (supra) arises under the second proviso which it contains. The structure of the proviso is that, where the matter has been tried by a jury, the costs shall follow the event and be independent of the Judge's order, unless the occasion arises, which alone gives him jurisdiction to intervene, that is, the existence of "good cause." The question of its existence, since his jurisdiction depends on it, must be appealable; a Judge cannot give himself jurisdiction by finding that he has it when, in fact, he has not. The rule, where the trial is without a jury, is laid down on totally different lines. The costs are then in the discretion of the Court and there is no express statement of anything which limits it or is the foundation on which jurisdiction depends. Costs, which are in the discretion of the Court, are primâ facie costs which are got from the Judge according to his view of the case before him, and they are not the subject of standing legal prescriptions, vesting in a litigant a prior legal right to certain costs at all. If you come to think of it, costs, which are in the discretion of the Judge, must also be in his indiscretion, and so the only question that remains outstanding is the question of jurisdiction. In saying this, I am painfully aware that I am departing from the line which has long been followed in the Court of Appeal. There the cases have been steadily assimilated, whether the trial was by Judge and jury or not, and the extent to which under this process the exercise of the Judge's discretion has now been prescribed to him by decisions of the Court of Appeal, as matters of law, may well be collected from the judgment of Lord Justice Atkin in Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144, at p. 145; [1920] 2 K.B., 47, at p. 54). Further, by the words of the principal Act itself, the Judge's order as to such costs is made expressly, and primâ facie absolutely, unappealable without his leave. There is no doubt here about jurisdiction, for the subject-matter is simply costs, whether an order for costs is made or is refused, and those costs are entirely within the Judge's discretion since he tried the cause. His jurisdiction is complete, if the cause has proceeded before him. "The necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials, upon which the discretion can be exercised," is merely a condition precedent to the exercise of a discretion which the Judge possesses, if he proposes to exercise it otherwise than in one way. In the face of a rule which places costs in the Judge's discretion, it is impossible to argue that the successful litigant has by law a right to costs, in the sense in which that is said of trustees' costs or costs given by statute. Now this condition is only implied, if it exists at all, but the implication, according to Lord Halsbury, is not only that the right to exercise the discretion, otherwise than in one way, is conditional, but also that the question of the existence of that condition is itself appealable, notwithstanding the statutory words. These questions are quite different from those which arose in Huxley's case (supra). How they should be answered is not a question which now arises for decision, but for the purpose of emphasizing what I have ventured to say about the complete distinction between Huxley's case (supra) and the issue in this appeal, I would point out two things. First, an implied condition, unlike an expressly limited jurisdiction, even if it can be implied at all, may nevertheless not be appealable matter, for the Act may mean the Judge himself to be the sole judge of the existence of the condition, as he is of the other matters that guide him in the exercise of his sole discretion. The second is that to imply such a condition as an appealable question, if it is merely rested on the proposition that the Judge must act judicially, is a construction deserving of close scrutiny. A Judge, sitting in the seat of justice and acting as a Judge, may sometimes deal with costs as with other things, injudiciously, but in the matter of costs, which are in his discretion, an injudicious order is not open to review. If, then, the statement that he must act judicially really means more than this, it is no doubt true, but in common experience it is an injunction never disregarded. Certainly during the argument we were presented only with somewhat fantastic suggestions of non-judicial conduct, under the express language of Order LXV., and such cases, if they occur, are but a dubious ground for implying rules about self-misdirection and the existence of evidence fit to be considered by a reasonable man, which really belong to trials by jury.

My Lords, I should desire to add two observations on another aspect of the case. Mr. Pollak appealed to the Court of Appeal claiming that Mr. Justice Branson had gone outside his discretionary power and had fallen into an error of law in so doing, which was appealable. He won. He now says that by the rules of your Lordships' House the matter is no further appealable. It is now contended that grave injustice would be done, if we refused to entertain the appeal on the appellants' allegation, for this purpose deemed to be capable of being established, that the Court of Appeal in its turn was guilty of error of law and that the trial Judge was not. As this involves hearing all the facts of the appeal, it makes any rule which has to be enforced by an objection in limine, quite useless, for the merits will always have to be fully heard on the appellants' allegation that, when they are heard, the error in law will appear. Further, though it may be surprising for this House to have a rule differing from that adopted by the Court of Appeal, or to refuse to review that Court's decision on the same ground as that, on which it undertook the task of review, the question is not whether our rule is surprising, but whether it exists. For the rest, I am frankly unable to understand how the fact that Mr. Pollak sought the Court of Appeal and won there can assist the appellants in showing that they, in their turn, must have a corresponding right of appeal to your Lordships. With great respect, I think that the objection should have been allowed, and that in any case the decision should be no more than this, that your Lordships, in the exercise of your power over the practice of this House, think fit to proceed with the appeal.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: I think the respondent's objection to the hearing of the appeal fails. I concur with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor on this point. He has dealt with the authorities touching it so exhaustively that it is quite unnecessary for me, agreeing as I do with the conclusion at which he has arrived, to deal with them afresh at any length. I base my opinion mainly upon the principle upon which the two following cases have been decided—namely, Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355; 14 App. Cas., 26) and Civil Service Cooperative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10; [1903] 2 K.B., 756). The first of these two was an action brought by the appellant Huxley against the railway company for damages alleged to have been sustained by him through the negligence of the latter while carrying him as a passenger on their line. He claimed to receive £3,000. The defendants pleaded that there was no negligence on their part, that there was contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part, and that the plaintiff might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the defendants, if any, and lastly that the plaintiff was not injured as alleged. At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and a special jury, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for £50. The Chief Justice, though applied to by the company's counsel to exercise the power conferred upon him by Order

LXV., rule 1, and to deprive the plaintiff of his costs, declined to exercise any jurisdiction in the matter, upon the ground that the later decisions of the Court of Appeal (especially that in the case of Jones v. Curling, 13 Q.B.D., 262) had made the principles upon which this jurisdiction was to be exercised unintelligible to him. The plaintiff accordingly entered up for judgment for himself for £50 and costs. My Lords, I think it would be illuminating to consider at this stage what was the nature and scope of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Jones v. Curling (supra) which the Chief Justice found so unintelligible. The action in that case was brought to recover possession of six parcels of land. The defendants, availing themselves of the provisions of Order XIX., rule 15, which corresponds with Order XXI., rule 21, of the Rules of 1883, pleaded as a defence that they were in possession of all the closes claimed. The jury found for the plaintiffs as to four of these closes, numbered respectively 1, 2, 3, and 5 and for the defendants as to closes 4 and 6. The respective portions recovered by the plaintiffs and defendants were about equal in area, the plaintiffs' portion being valued at £4,950. Lord Coleridge, C.J., before whom the case was tried, made an order that the costs of both parties should be added together, and divided, apparently equally, between the plaintiffs and the defendants. This order was obviously not an order that the costs should follow the events ; but rather an order that on the ordinary system of taxation they should not follow the event. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal. At page 267 of the report, the Master of the Rolls (Sir Balliol Brett) is reported to have expressed himself thus. He said : "Now from this order" (the order as to costs) "an appeal has been brought to this Court, and the first question for us to decide is whether we can entertain any appeal, and if so to what extent. I am of opinion that this Court has a right, and is bound, to inquire whether the condition exists which gives a Judge jurisdiction to make an order as to costs." At the bottom of the same page the Master of the Rolls says : "The condition which gives the Judge upon a trial before himself and a jury jurisdiction to make an order as to costs is, whether there was a good cause or not existing, and I am of opinion that that is a subject-matter of appeal. Whether there was a good cause or not is a question of fact, and the Court of Appeal must consider whether in their judgment that fact did exist, and if they disagree as to this with the Judge who tried the action they must allow the appeal." Lord Bowen expresses his opinion on the matter with his well-known felicity of language at page 271 of the report. Referring to Order LXV., rule 1, he said : "The question of costs is dealt with by Order XLV., rule 1. That rule begins with placing in the discretion of the Court the costs of all proceedings in the Court, but then follows a provision by which, in the event of a jury trial, the costs are removed from the discretion of the Judge and are to follow the event except in one case, which is, if the Judge shall for good cause otherwise order. It appears to me that these latter words restore costs to the discretion of the Judge, provided a condition precedent is fulfilled ; that is to say, provided there is good cause. But unless there are facts from which a reasonable man might think the exceptional order was one which was more just than allowing the costs to take the ordinary course, there can be no good cause, and if there is no good cause then the Judge had no jurisdiction. It seems to me that on the true construction of this rule there is an appeal with respect to the existence of the facts upon which alone the jurisdiction of the Judge depends. When, however, this jurisdiction is established, then I think there is no appeal unless the Judge's discretion is exercised in such a wrong way as to make it no reasonable exercise of discretion at all. . . . It being open for us to decide whether there was good cause here for making the exceptional order by which the costs do not follow the event, we are driven to consider what is good cause within the meaning of this rule. . . . Good cause really seems to me to mean that there must exist facts which might reasonably lead the Judge to think that the rule of the costs following the event would not produce justice as complete as the exceptional order which he himself could make." Lord Justice Fry, at page 274, said : "It appears to me that the question whether the facts exist which give the Judge the discretion must be the subject of appeal. . . . I will not attempt to give any definition of what 'good cause' is, but it plainly must be something which renders it reasonable that the Judge should interfere with the rule that costs should follow the event." He then points out that the judgment or verdict in the case was distributive, the event with which it dealt not being single, and that upon taxation the costs would therefore follow the distinct issues, and he concludes as follows :—

"Is then the fact of the success of the plaintiff on some issues, and of his failure on other issues, by itself good cause for interfering with the rule that costs follow the event ? I am bound to say that it appears to me not to be so. I am of opinion therefore that there was no good cause shown, and consequently that the Lord Chief Justice had no jurisdiction to make the order, and that the order must be set aside."

In Huxley's case (supra) the Court of Appeal made an order that the defendants should have liberty to renew their application to Lord Coleridge and that if he declined to exercise his jurisdiction under Order LXV., rule 1, they should apply to the Divisional Court. A stay of execution was given in the meantime. On December 18, 1885, the defendants accordingly renewed their application for an order depriving the plaintiff of his costs. On January 3, 1886, the Lord Chief Justice heard the arguments, and on April 5 following made an order that the plaintiff be deprived of his costs for the reasons given in the report of the case in 17 Q.B.D., 373. The Lord Chief Justice delivered a judgment which covered nine and a half printed pages of the report. On the first of these pages he states, as I understand it, what are the facts which he considered amounted to "good cause" for depriving the plaintiff Huxley of his costs. The statement runs thus. "In the case of Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra), the plaintiff had preferred an extravagant and extortionate claim for compensation—£3,000—not merely in the formal statement of claim but in the particulars delivered in the action ; he had supported it by fraudulent statements and dishonest acts ; and endeavoured to substantiate it before the jury by evidence which they very properly disbelieved." The plaintiff Huxley appealed to the House of Lords against this Order of the Court of Appeal. The appeal was heard by the following six members of this House—namely, Lord Chancellor Halsbury, Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell, Lord Fitzgerald, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Herschell. Four of these noble Lords gave long judgments. Lord Macnaghten stated that he agreed with the conclusions at which his learned friends had arrived, and Lord Herschell expressed his concurrence with the opinion Lord Watson had delivered. The House entertained the appeal and decided it on the ground that the statement as to Huxley's conduct in instituting and supporting his action, as stated by Lord Coleridge, constituted "good cause" for his depriving Huxley of his costs. The judgments delivered in the case are very valuable, inasmuch as they deal with the proper construction of Order LXV., rule 1, and indicate what was the true meaning and reach of the words "good cause" used in the Order, and next the important question whether Huxley's appeal was to be dealt with and regarded as an appeal on "costs alone" or the same thing "costs only." Lord Watson, while stating that he would not attempt to give a general definition of "good cause," said that he might give an incomplete definition of it, and indicated what the words, in his view, meant in the Order and what they embraced. In his view, he said, they embraced everything for which the party was responsible, connected with the institution or conduct of the suit and calculated to occasion unnecessary litigation and expense. And he lays it down that as long as the Judge or Court deals with considerations of this kind, the sufficiency or insufficiency of those considerations as affording a reason for disallowing costs is a matter of which they are the constituted arbiters. They are acting within their jurisdiction and their decisions are final and conclusive. On the other hand, he said, if they give effect to considerations which do not constitute "good cause" within the meaning of the rule they exceed the limits of their jurisdiction, and on that ground their decisions are not protected from revision. Lord Halsbury's judgment is practically to the same effect. The judgment of the Court of Appeal dealt solely with the question whether Huxley's conduct and action, as described by Lord Coleridge amounted to proof of "good cause" for depriving him of costs within the provisions of Order LXV., rule 1. There was not, in the Court of Appeal, any suggestion that the verdict found for Huxley should on any ground be set aside or modified or that the damages awarded to him should on any ground be diminished. The appeal dealt solely with the question of the existence of "good cause" under Order LXV., rule 1, for depriving a successful litigant of his costs. The only relief asked for from the Court of Appeal or this House was that he might be declared entitled to these costs. The appeal to the House of Lords was likewise an appeal dealing solely with costs, i.e., an appeal to get rid of the order of the Court of Appeal which deprived Huxley of costs. It is difficult to see how an appeal that only aims at annulling an order which deprives a litigant of his costs, because of his own conduct and not because of the merits of his action, is not an appeal dealing solely with costs. As an example of the practical application of those principles I refer to the second of the above-mentioned cases—namely, the case of Civil Service Cooperative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (supra). There the defendants chartered to the plaintiffs a steamer to bring a party of sightseers to Spithead and other places to see the review of the fleet to be held on the occasion of King Edward VII.'s Coronation. The review was first postponed to the 25th June. The amount to be paid to the defendants was the lump sum of £1,500. The plaintiffs paid him £250 on the signing of the charter, and the balance £1,250 on the 18th June. On the 25th of June, when the review was postponed, notice was given by the plaintiffs to the defendants that they would not require the use of the ship. Before the postponement the defendants had expended £500 in fitting out the steamer. The review did not, in fact, take place till the month of August. The plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover the sum of £1,500 as money paid on a consideration which failed. At the trial before a Judge alone, Mr. Justice Bigham, as he was then, it appeared that there had been some negotiations between the parties for a settlement of the dispute, and the learned Judge expressed a desire that the matter should be left to him to say what, under the circumstances and apart from the strict legal rights of the parties, should be done. The defendants declined to take this course, and refused to accept another suggestion of the learned Judge—namely, that they should be content to retain the amount of the expenses they had received and their costs. In the result the learned Judge gave judgment for the defendants but ordered that each of the parties should bear their own costs. The plaintiffs appealed against the judgment in favour of the defendants, contending they were entitled to recover the sum they had paid. And the defendants appealed from the order of the learned Judge that each of the parties should bear their own costs. The appeal was heard before Earl Halsbury (Lord Chancellor), sitting in the Court of Appeal, Lord Alverstone (Lord Chief Justice), and Lord Justice Cozens-Hardy. The plaintiffs' appeal against the order of the learned Judge was dismissed, and on reference to the defendants' cross-appeal against the award of costs, the Lord Chancellor, at page 765, is reported to have said: "No doubt, where a Judge has exercised his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, it may not be, and I think is not, within the power of the Court of Appeal to override that exercise of discretion. But the necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials upon which the discretion can be exercised must be satisfied. In the present case, so far as the evidence before me goes, I can see no materials whatsoever upon which the learned Judge could exercise a discretion at all. The defendants were sued, and rightly according to law resisted the suit, and finally succeeded. In the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, and in the judgment of this Court, they are right; and it practically comes to this—that the learned Judge has deprived the persons sued of what, prima facie, is their right to the costs of the litigation which has unsuccessfully been brought against them because they will not submit to the learned Judge himself as arbitrator to say what should be done. That is not exercising a discretion upon materials properly before the Judge; but it is depriving a litigant of rights of which he is by law possessed, upon grounds which it is not competent for the Judge to treat as grounds for the exercise of his discretion. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the cross-appeal must succeed, and that the defendants are entitled to their costs."

It is, I think, perfectly clear from these authorities that if a Judge in a case tried before him and a jury should, by the exercise of the discretion given to him by Order LXV., rule 1, deprive a successful litigant of his costs, the materials upon which he exercises that discretion, if it is to be properly exercised, must be materials proved in that case to exist. It is not enough that they should be imagined, or suspected, or without proof believed by the learned Judge, to exist, nor is it enough if they should exist in a suit different from the suit tried, and the Judge should mistakenly suppose that they had been established in this latter suit and act upon that false assumption. That it appears to me is what has occurred in this case. Besides, it should always be remembered that the discretion which is to be exercised under this Order and rule is a judicial discretion. It is not a judicial exercise of this discretion to order a litigant who has been completely successful in a suit and against whom no misconduct is alleged to pay the costs of the proceeding : Kierson v. Thompson (29 The Times L.R., 205 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 587, at p. 589). Irrelevant matters cannot be relied upon by a Judge as constituting "good cause" for depriving a successful litigant of his costs, such as his putting forward, in his defence to a money demand, the Gaming Act, Granville v. Firth (19 The Times L.R., 213), or the Statute of Limitations, Elms v. Hedges (22 The Times L.R., 574), or the expression by the jury of their opinion as to how the costs should be borne. The rule that no appeal shall lie to the House of Lords on a question of costs alone is not a statutory rule. It is merely a rule of practice. It was shaped, adopted, and applied long before our expeditious and effective Court of Appeal was created. Upon what rational principle this rule, if it be a desirable one, is to be applied to appeals to the House of Lords and not to appeals to the Court of Appeal, it is difficult to see. The judgments of this House delivered in the Huxley case (supra), if they do not disregard it altogether, would appear to me to deprive it of all coercive authority. For these reasons I am of opinion that the preliminary point fails and that the objection raised should be disallowed.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline (read by Lord Carson).—My Lords : There is no question before your Lordships' House as to the merits of the action between these parties. It is admitted by both of them that these merits are finally disposed of and that the sole difference between them is as to costs.

I wish to make this general statement in the most absolute terms. A consideration of the decisions founded upon by learned counsel shows, first, that a question of costs which is incidental to a consideration of a judgment upon the merits may be entertained when but not unless the merits are brought before this House and made the subject of consideration.

In the second place, there may be cases figurably and indeed definitely alluded to in the judgment of this House to which reference will presently be made in which, even although the merits be brought formally upon appeal, yet the House may discern that that is but a colourable attempt to introduce costs and nothing but costs to their Lordships' consideration. Such an attempt being colourable stamps the case as one in which no merits are before this House ; the remainder of the case being costs alone, the appeal is thrown out on the simple ground that in substance costs, and nothing but costs, were brought before your Lordships. Such an appeal will not be entertained.

In these circumstances the respondent in this case makes an objection founded upon the practice. The first reason stated in his case is that the appeal ought to be dismissed "because the present appeal is one brought as to costs only, and is therefore one which in accordance with the established principles of your Lordships' House cannot be sustained." The meaning of that I take to be that the appeal is excluded from consideration by the established practice. I think that reason to be sound, and I am of opinion that the appeal should accordingly be dismissed. The argument upon this subject contained a full reference to many authorities and was long and elaborate. It is clear to me that an attempt is now being made to subvert or invade in a most substantial sense our long-settled practice.

The respondent was in the employ of a firm Donald Campbell and Company, and was the manager of their Eastern department. Their business was formed into a limited concern, namely, Donald Campbell and Company, Limited ; the respondent became director of that company and he was a large shareholder in it. It did not prosper, and in a short time went into liquidation. Acute differences ensued on the subject of the respondent's dealings, and, in particular, as to his relations with one Boris Said. The firm sued the respondent by a writ issued on May 31, 1921 ; then, a few days afterwards, namely, on June 3, 1921, the company issued a writ against him. The two actions were consolidated and tried before Mr. Justice Darling and a jury, and resulted adversely to the respondent. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial in both actions. On appeal to this House it was decided that there should be no new trial in the action by the firm and that a verdict in the firm's favour for £2,943 2s. 0d. should stand. With regard to the company's action, however, which was an action for an account, it was decided that it should be re-tried.

It was re-tried, and confessedly the trial was most satisfactorily conducted. To use the language of Lord Justice Atkin :—

"That second action was tried before Mr. Justice Branson. It was tried before him for eight or ten days, and he gave a judgment as to the issue of liability, and, if I may say so, a more satisfactory judgment I have never read in a complicated case. It seems to me that the learned Judge went very carefully into all the facts, considered very carefully the contentions of both parties, and, having very carefully considered and weighed them, eventually came to a decision in favour of Mr. Pollak. An action tried in that way should have the usual result that the parties are satisfied that justice has been done, although they do not go away satisfied with the result, because it is very seldom possible to convince an unsuccessful plaintiff or defendant against his will. Nevertheless, both parties are obviously satisfied with the way in which the case has been tried, and there is no further appeal from the findings of the learned Judge on the question of liability. The question that is before us now is the question as to costs. The learned Judge has deprived Mr. Pollak of his costs."

My Lords, I do not propose to discuss whether Mr. Justice Branson was right in so depriving Mr. Pollak of his costs, or whether the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal were right in reversing that judgment and finding Mr. Pollak entitled to costs. In substance the Court of Appeal held that in exercising his discretion as to costs the learned Judge had been moved towards that decision by facts established, or held to be established, when certain evidence was led in the previous consolidated action ; the Court of Appeal held that he should not have been so influenced. The material was no doubt before him, in this sense, that the consolidated action and its procedure were referred to, but the Court of Appeal considered that Mr. Justice Branson overstepped the legitimate limits by allowing the evidence to enter into or influence his mind and did not properly exercise his discretion. In these circumstances they confined within what they reckoned to be proper limits the true subject for consideration in the exercise of a discretion as to how costs should be awarded, and they did, in their turn, exercise a discretion as to costs, and made a pronouncement upon them in favour of Mr. Pollak. I shall, before I close, revert to this subject of discretion.

It would be improper to indicate which of these judgments was right, but the brief narrative has only been given in order to lead up to the fact now definitely manifest, namely, that from the day when Mr. Justice Branson gave judgment in favour of the respondent the merits of this action were not only finally determined but completely passed from. The judgment stands without suggestion by either side that it can be gone back upon, and with a confession that the appeal to this House is on costs alone. Neither in substance nor in form or colour are the merits brought before this House, and it is to that clear and clean case that the authorities as to practice have to be applied.

In Fitzgibbon v. Scanlan (1 Dow, 261) Lord Chancellor Eldon said at p. 270 :—

"In regard to the matter of costs, although an appeal would not be received merely on the subject of costs, yet it did not follow but the article of costs might be taken into consideration when there was an appeal respecting other matters."

That is a clear distinction between costs alone and other matters, namely, the merits. As to costs alone "an appeal would not be received." It is reported that Lord Redesdale concurred with the Lord Chancellor "in every particular." The case was decided in 1813.

The case of Tod v. Tod (2 Wilson and Shaw, 542) completely confirms the same view as to practice, but it illustrates the matter from another aspect. A summons of reduction of a certain election of magistrates to a Royal Burgh in Scotland was raised in the Court of Session. The merits of the discussion need not be entered upon, but the Lord Chancellor said, upon the point of practice, as follows at p. 549 :—

"This House never does entertain an appeal for costs where costs are in the discretion of the Court below."

That is a statement of the general practice. He then, however, added :—

"But when the Legislature by a statute has expressly required that the Court of Session, in the case of an action that is brought under the authority of that statute, and in the case of a summary complaint which is brought under that statute, the Court shall make the party who fails pay the full costs of suit, it does appear to me that the party is in fact entitled to full costs of suit, and that, being so entitled to full costs of suit, the Court below ought, by their judgment, to have given full costs of suit, unless they were prepared to say that this was a case out of the statute."

And the Lord Chancellor concludes with this clear pronouncement :—

"If it is a case out of the statute, it would be a question of discretion, and therefore no appeal would lie."

In 1835 occurred the case of Inglis v. Mansfield (3 Cl. and F., 362), a case on appeal to this House from the Court of Session. Lord Chancellor Brougham put the matter thus at p. 371 :—

"The rule with respect to costs in this House, as well as in the Privy Council and the Court of Chancery, is that you cannot appeal for costs alone ; but you can bring an appeal on the merits ; and if that is not a colourable ground of appeal for the purpose of introducing the question of costs to the Court called upon to review the case, the Court of review will treat that, not as an appeal for costs, but will, in affirming the judgment given in the Court below, consider the question of costs as if it is fairly raised."

It appears to me, confining the decision to the practice of this House, that that judgment makes clear the distinction in our practice that costs alone you cannot appeal for : they will only be considered by this House when merits are brought up for consideration, and they will not even then be so considered if the bringing up of the merits is a colourable device for getting costs considered. I am humbly of opinion that all this is still law.

Home v. Pringle (8 Cl. and Fin., 264) was decided in 1841. Lord Chancellor Cottenham dealt with the question of costs on the same lines. He said at p. 293 :—

"If I had been sitting in the Court below, considering the failure of the case made against the trustees and the unjustifiable charges brought against them, I should perhaps have thought it just that they should be indemnified in costs by directing the pursuer to pay them. But in this House the case is different. A Court of Appeal does not interfere in the question of costs without reluctance in any case, and generally will not entertain an appeal for costs alone."

And the House decided accordingly.

Although I am citing the authorities presented to the House in their order, it seems clear to my mind that the general practice of the House was a practice not begun with those cases, but that the dicta of these three Lord Chancellors confirmed a rule of long and well-established standing. It is so treated in Mr. MacQueen's work on the Practice of the House of Lords and Privy Council. An appeal, says he, will not lie on costs alone, but it does not follow that the article of costs may not be taken into consideration when there is an appeal respecting other matters, and then he quotes Lord Brougham's judgment already cited.

In Wilson v. The Queen (L.R. 1 P.C., 405) an appeal had been presented to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Sierra Leone, restoring property seized for breach of the Customs laws. One of the appellants was proved not to be the owner of the goods, though so proceeded against. He, however, was cast in costs by the Court below. He made no appeal on the merits, the decision being in his favour. He, however, did appeal, and Lord Cairns, then Lord Justice Cairns, said at p. 408 :—

"With regard to one of the appellants, Cole, it was attempted to maintain his right to appeal, on the ground that, although he had been absolved from penalties in the Court below, he had not been awarded the costs of the proceeding against him. Their Lordships are of opinion that with regard to the appellant, Cole, the appeal is strictly and simply one for costs, under circumstances in which their Lordships have at all times laid down as a rule that an appeal for costs could not be entertained."

The rule thus enunciated by Lord Chancellors of the greatest eminence and covering a period of practice of over half a century is, however, argued to have been either changed or evaded by Yeo v. Tatem (L.R., 3 P.C., 696), decided in 1871. It was a case of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the brigantine Georgiana against the brig Orient and her owners, the appellant company being, as was assumed, their agents. A general denial was pleaded in answer, and a special defence was put in that the damage complained of had been already adjudicated upon in a court of law and judgment obtained and satisfied. At the hearing it was proved by a witness who was the principal defendant that the damage was occasioned by acts done by him on his own responsibility, but claiming certain rights as consignee. The Admiralty Judge held that the suit could not be maintained, but declined to give the defendants their costs or go into this special defence, although his judgment was asked thereon by the defendants' counsel. It was held by the Judicial Committee that the defendants were entitled to have the judgment of the Court as asked on the special defence, that the general traverse and denial were sufficient to justify the evidence, and that the appeal was not for costs alone.

It is plain that the merits of the case, and not costs alone, were thus brought before the Privy Council, and it is also clear that the Council so thought. A perusal of the judgment of Sir Joseph Napier demonstrates this. In the course of his opinion, however, he said this at p. 702 :—

"Their Lordships do not mean to question or recede from the decisions that have been pronounced regarding not allowing an appeal for costs, but where there has been a mistake upon some matter of law that governs or affects costs—some matter that involves the due application of principles of law—the party prejudiced is entitled to have the benefit of correction by appeal."

My Lords, I am clearly of opinion that the argument ably submitted in the present case to this House misconstrues these words here employed, namely, "mistake upon some matter of law that governs or affects costs." It seems plain to me that that refers to a matter of law on the merits of the case : it does not refer to a decision upon costs or a matter of law about costs, but it refers to a matter of law upon the merits of the case consequent upon which decision on merits the question of costs could hang. That there was such a decision on the merits given in Yeo's case (supra) is plain, and a most important decision as to practice it was, namely, as to whether the general traverse and denial were sufficient to justify certain evidence produced ; and, furthermore, it is plain that a substantial question on the merits equivalent to a plea of res judicata had to be decided. Merits accordingly being thus brought before the Judicial Committee, any question as to "costs alone" disappears. And it is to be noted that "Their Lordships do not mean to question or recede from the decisions that have been pronounced regarding not allowing an appeal for costs."

It is argued that in the case of Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 582) observations fell from the Court which essentially weakened the long-established rule of practice so frequently affirmed. I am humbly of opinion that this is not so. Upon the contrary, the rule was reaffirmed that an appeal must not be brought for costs or in relation to costs, "but an appeal against an order which imposes, as a condition to having a new trial, the payment, within a certain time, of the costs of the first trial does not fall within that principle." As Lord Selborne, Lord Chancellor, put it, at p. 584 : "The Court of Appeal conditionally discharged the order for the new trial, and in the alternative conditionally dismissed the appeal." It seems clear, accordingly, that the point before the House was whether the appellants "were entitled to retain the order which they had obtained from the Court of first instance, unclogged and unfettered by conditions." Lord Blackburn makes the distinction very emphatically when he says at p. 586 : "Your Lordships may possibly come to the conclusion that there ought to be a new trial absolute and simple, without any condition at all, or it may be that you will think it right for there to be a new trial with the condition which the Queen's Bench Division imposed, or with the condition which the Court of Appeal imposed, or it may possibly be that you will be of opinion that there should be a new trial with some other condition different from either." Lord Watson expressly concedes "the propriety of the rule that the Court of last resort ought not to entertain an appeal which involves nothing except the payment of costs. But," he adds, "it appears to me that that rule is limited to the case where the whole merits of the action or cause have been determined."

Instead, accordingly, of Hill's case (supra) casting doubt upon the rule, it follows it and confirms it, and, as appears from the language of Lord Watson just cited, applies it almost expressly to the present case now before the House, which is cited to be a case "where the whole merits of the action or cause have been determined."

In 1889 occurred the case of Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355 ; 14 App. Cas., 26). The case did not deal with the question now before your Lordships' House, but with the construction of a certain passage in Order LXV., rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, which applies to the discretion exercised by the Judge or Court in trials with a jury, the prescription of the rule being that in such cases "the costs shall follow the event unless the Judge . . . or the Court shall for good cause otherwise order."

The Judge trying the cause with a jury had refused to exercise his discretion or exercise any jurisdiction in the matter. The Court of Appeal sent it back to him, and he deprived the plaintiff of costs for the causes set out in his report. The questions before this House truly were whether the Lord Chief Justice by at first declining to determine costs had rendered himself functus officio, and what in practice and on merits was important, namely, what were the true procedure under, and the true construction of, the Statutory Order. The case does not appear to me to throw any light upon the point of practice before your Lordships.

It is different, however, with the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie ([1903] A.C., 126). The pure and broad question was there brought before a powerful Committee of this House, consisting of Lords Macnaghten, Shand, Davey, Robertson, and Lindley. It was an appeal against a judgment of the Court of Session in Scotland in an action directed against the railway company for injury to cattle being conveyed under a certain contract. The Sheriff-Substitute assoilzied the company, but gave them no costs. On an appeal to the Sheriff he cast the company in the costs of the case. It appeared that the company's behaviour was considered reprehensible ; it had denied to the cattle dealer any information as to the cause of the injury to the stock and had declined to allow any railway servant to be precognosced.

The First Division of the Court of Session by a majority affirmed the Sheriff. Lord Adam said that the case raised "a question of principle" depending on the construction and meaning of the correspondence between the parties and their actings. The Court accordingly applied their minds to the correspondence, &c., and held that the Sheriff was right. Lord McLaren dissented, holding that he was wrong. If there ever was a pure question of costs on which the House of Lords could have been induced to entertain the appeal, this was one. The successful party had been cast in the costs of the unsuccessful party. One Judge of Appeal had dissented and the other Judge had admitted that he decided the case upon principle. The Appeal Committee before whom the case was argued and decisions cited held as follows : "That the appeal being on the question of costs only was incompetent."

In Rieken v. Yorke Peninsula District Justices (24 The Times L.R., 821 ; [1908] A.C., 454) another attempt was made in the Privy Council to get the better of the rule. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord Collins, who cited Wilson v. The Queen (supra), Inglis v. Mansfield (supra), and Yeo v. Tatem (supra), and held that the rule was firmly established.

I have thus, my Lords, gone through all the relevant and important cases founded upon. They cover a period of over one hundred years. They appear to me to culminate in Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie (supra). It appears to me to be settled by authority that this appeal, admittedly in no respect upon the merits of the cause but solely upon costs, must be rejected as incompetent. It falls within no exception to which a statute applies. When an Act of Parliament or a Statutory Order or a recognized rule of law has prescribed that in a certain event there must be a certain result as to costs, then the Courts must follow that prescription, but this becomes part of the merits of the case itself. There is no such case here.

The exercise of discretion is a wide term. Suppose a decision demonstrably and confessedly resting upon elements derived illegitimately and improperly from material only imported into the case on account of some invidia in the Judge's mind, and not resting upon material in the cause, it may be that in such a case this House might think fit to break down or make that an exception to the rule. I do not suggest that the House would be foreclosed from doing so, although it stands to reason that such an invasion of practice would require to be founded upon extraordinarily strong grounds.

But I see nothing in the present case to give a right to an appeal to this House on the challenge that it was a legal matter for the House to determine as to what were the materials on which the Judge who tried the case should have exercised his discretion. These materials were admittedly to be found within the four corners of the consolidated actions by the company and the firm. The case, in short, is the familiar one of a discretion being alleged to have been wrongly exercised by a Judge ; the phrase used is that he misdirected himself, the equivalent of which is simply that he went wrong. If he took something into account which had entered into the case actually or by inference, but which he should not have allowed to enter his mind, and should have been blind to, then his discretion might have been erroneously exercised, and the Court of Appeal according to its practice was of course within its rights in correcting this error and exercising its own discretion without allowing such an error to creep in.

But, my Lords, the practice of the House appears to me to be plain, that at that stage finality upon costs with all the points as to the elements of discretion applicable thereto is definitely reached. The Court of Appeal in England and either Division of Court of Session in Scotland are charged with that final responsibility. This House respects that finality as does the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in regard to decrees upon costs alone pronounced by Indian and Colonial judicatories.

I desire to add this, my Lords : Of course I cannot testify specially upon the practice in England. But with regard to Scotland I can. I feel sure that legal practitioners and litigants in that country have looked upon the rule as so settled and have accepted that finality of their Supreme Court accordingly. I do not doubt that the same thing has happened in England. Your Lordships are thus confronted with an appeal made to upset not only a course of decision which has extended for over a century, but a uniform practice of the laws of the countries in conformity therewith. I think that practice was right and that this case falls within it.

My Lords, I will add but one word as to the argument submitted to this House in regard to the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876. Section 3 of that statute is as follows : "Subject as in this Act mentioned an appeal shall lie to the House of Lords from any order or judgment of any of the Courts following, i.e., (1) of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in England. . . ." It was argued in the present case, as it was in Secretary of State for Home Affairs v. O'Brien (39 The Times L.R., 638 ; [1923] A.C., 603), that this language is language of complete generality. It was held in the case cited that such language could not and was never meant to apply in the sense of extending the jurisdiction or practice of this House so as to make appealable an order of liberation pronounced upon a writ of habeas corpus, the practice of this House having been to respect the principle that when once liberation had been granted by any Court the cause is at an end.

I do not think that the enumeration in general terms as to all orders of the Court of Appeal was made to or does apply to a complete inversion of the practice of this House as to declining to entertain appeals solely upon costs. The long-settled practice to which I have referred could only have been inverted or invaded by language directly and distinctly aimed and settled for that purpose. The principles set forth in O'Brien's case (supra) and in Cox v. Hakes (6 The Times L.R., 465 ; 15 App. Cas., 506) appear to me to cover the present case.

I am humbly of opinion that the objection by the respondent to the competency of the present appeal is well founded, and that it should be sustained and the appeal dismissed with costs.

My Lords, the above was the opinion which I formed at the close of the first hearing. I have most carefully and respectfully considered the very able arguments of counsel at the second hearing and the views of your Lordships just delivered, and I adhere to my first opinion. In doing so the House will forgive me, I trust, while I merely note these supplementary points :—

1. This is a purely English appeal. Its decision turns out to be governed by the effect of Order LXV. of the Rules of the English Supreme Court and of the position and practice of the Court of Appeal under the English Judicature Act. It appears to be accepted that the Court of Appeal may rectify an error in law which it is satisfied the first Judge fell into, but that it itself exercises no discretion. In case of the present decision of this House ever being cited in any Scotch attempt at appeal from the Court of Session not on merits but upon costs alone, I think it right only to mention that in Scotland there is neither by enactment nor practice nor analogy any justification for holding that the long-standing practice with regard to Scotch appeals is now being invaded or altered. The Inner House of the Court of Session has itself a discretion as to the award, modification, or refusal of costs. Quoad an appeal to the House of Lords, if a decision upon costs has been reached by the Inner House that decision cannot, solely on costs, be challenged in this House, and must stand as final. The matter has been so treated by writers on practice, such as the learned Professor Æneas Mackay. And its clear and absolute character has, I can personally testify, been so treated during the more than half a century of my own professional life.

2. I venture to enter my special dissent from those opinions which have expressed either doubt or question of the decision of the powerful Appeal Committee which sat in Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie (supra). It is true that in the argument a reference was made to another question, namely, the effect of section 40 of the Judicature Act of Scotland, 1825 (which confines the range of facts to those found in the Court below). But that reference was an irrelevant and futile reference and had no bearing on the question of the competency of the appeal. The true question, namely, "whether there is an appeal to the House of Lords on a question of costs alone"—that question, as the private records of the case show, was thoroughly argued and the whole catalogue of leading cases already alluded to was cited; and when Lord Macnaghten in throwing out the appeal did so, he referred to the ground for doing so as one; and nobody can doubt that it was and was alone the one which is before your Lordships now.

3. I venture to call attention to what happened in the Court of Appeal on the form of that Court's judgment. It is as follows, namely, that such part of Mr. Justice Branson's judgment "as orders that no order be made as to costs be set aside and that judgment be entered for the defendant Raymond Pollak with costs."

My Lords, there is no record, and it is, I understand, not the fact, that any objection whatsoever was made by either party to the Court of Appeal itself deciding the question of costs. If their judgment was taken as merely a correction of an error or self-misdirection, the legal course was to send the case back to Mr. Justice Branson to eliminate that error and apply his discretion correctly to the case and make such a judgment on the whole case—without that error—as should seem right.

Why was this not done? It appears to me to be fairly clear that the reason was that it was accepted by both parties that the Court of Appeal should be allowed to arrange costs according to its discretion, that is to say, its idea of what a discretion on a review of the whole case should have come to. The astonishing fact remains that neither party in the case—by the reason formulated in his appeal—has taken any point of objection to the decision of the Court of Appeal on costs standing pro forma as it does. The argument presented to your Lordships is rather of the nature of an astute afterthought unsupported by either reason or suggestion upon the papers. I do not enter further upon the topic lest I should trench upon the merits.

4. On the general rule which excludes from this House appeals on costs alone, the invasion of that rule has, in my opinion, in the past been only allowed by reason of something like a statutory or other prescription—as already referred to—which arises ab extra and so compels by force of law the exception. But the case of the present appeal does not arise from a prescription ab extra; it is founded on something psychological, discoverable by an analysis of what is alleged to have operated in the minds of the Judges who settled the costs. It is here that I part company with those who invoke the suggestion of a failure of substantial justice. The cases are legion in which, even while assenting to the merits of the judgment, one or other or both of the parties think that substantial justice has not been done upon costs. And if the rule against excluding such questions from that salutary finality which has for generations made them find an end in the lower Courts—if that rule be either invaded or abrogated, then the way may possibly have been opened to powerful litigants to the perpetration of much duress and injustice by, it may be, the ruinous protraction of litigation.

Lord Blanesburgh (read by Viscount Dunedin).—My Lords: Lord Justice Turner when delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Attenborough v. Kemp (14 Moore, P.C., 351, at p. 353), deals with appeals upon costs alone in terms which may usefully be recalled. His observations are invariably referred to as the basis of the rule on this subject which, as elucidated in subsequent decisions, obtains with the Board.

Their Lordships, said the Lord Justice,

"do not wish to lay it down as a general rule, that in no case would there be an appeal in respect of costs, and of costs alone; because there might be cases where discretion has not been fairly exercised upon the question at issue, and the decision of the Court below has proceeded upon mistake or misapprehension. Their Lordships do not think that any general rule can be laid down which must apply to cases of this description. Such cases their Lordships desire to leave untouched; but where there has been bona fide care and discretion exercised on the part of the Judge who has decided the case, their Lordships have no hesitation in stating their opinion to be that in such a case no appeal will lie in respect of costs alone."

I may, at a later stage, have to refer to this passage in its entirety. At the moment I am concerned only with its last sentence. Upon that, I hazard the observation that in your Lordships' House also, the rule at least to the extent there stated is equally well established. And with a rule so limited, I know of no interference, legislative or other, which is or ever has been, threatened from any quarter.

How far further, if at all, the rule in this House extends or should be permitted to extend: at what point an appeal which may superficially retain the appearance of an appeal as to costs alone ceases under these words to be correctly so described in any sense relevant to its competence: at what point an appeal within the meaning of any rational rule on the subject ceases to be an appeal as to costs alone and becomes something quite different: at what stage it ceases in the same sense to be an appeal as to costs at all—these are the questions and the only questions upon which in a case like the present there is room for difference of opinion.

There emerges, however, on this appeal largely as the result of the conjoint effect of two decisions of this House, Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355; 14 App. Cas., 26), and Secretary of State for Home Affairs v. O'Brien (39 The Times L.R., 638; [1923] A.C., 603), a separate question of perhaps equal importance. We are here concerned with an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal in England. It is presented to your Lordships' House under and by virtue of section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876. The appeal quite clearly comes within the words of that section, and the separate question here is whether the appellants are not under its unqualified provisions entitled at your Lordships' hand to a hearing of their appeal whatever may be the true limits of any rule of the House applicable to appeals, not within the section.

It will, my Lords, be a convenient introduction to the consideration of all these questions if an attempt be made in the first instance to determine with precision exactly what this appeal is and what it is not, and incidentally to ascertain what the jurisdiction was which the Court of Appeal exercised in making the order now appealed from and how it became possessed of that jurisdiction. Whether there is or is not a duty laid upon your Lordships' House to entertain this appeal will, I believe, largely turn on the position as made apparent by that preliminary inquiry.

My Lords, after deciding the case in favour of the defendant, Mr. Justice Branson, who tried the action without a jury, gave judgment for him, but, as the formal order expresses it, he made no order as to costs. In the circumstances, these words were superfluous. The operation of the learned Judge's order would have been the same had it been silent as to costs. Its result intended and effective was that the costs did not follow the event for the reason that the learned Judge, purporting to exercise his judicial discretion in the matter, decided that they should not.

He explains his decision and the reasoning which led him to it in terms which do not admit of misunderstanding. But for one circumstance the defendant was, so the learned Judge intimated, entitled to his costs of action, as in ordinary course. But for that circumstance he would have exercised his discretion by ordering the plaintiffs to pay them. The plaintiffs, however, had called his attention to certain things touching the conduct of the defendant in an action which was at one time consolidated with this action but to which the plaintiffs were not parties: to these circumstances which he accepted as having been proved before him the learned Judge held that he was in law entitled to have regard in dealing with costs: and taking them into account, and them alone, he exercised his discretion by making no order as to costs at all, with the result that the defendant was thereby deprived of a very large sum to which it is quite clear that the learned Judge would otherwise have considered him entitled. It is true that that large sum was costs. But that, so far as the principle of the thing is concerned, is the merest accident. The legal question whether the learned Judge was justified in taking into account the circumstances which he did, might, in another case, just as easily arise with reference to a right to any kind of property made dependent upon the exercise of a judicial discretion.

In relation to costs the learned Judge's powers are derived from Order LXV., Rule 1. That order so far as material is in the terms following:

"Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the Court or Judge: Provided that nothing herein contained shall deprive an executor, administrator, trustee, or mortgagee who has not unreasonably instituted or carried on or resisted any proceedings, of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would be entitled according to the rules hitherto acted upon in the Chancery Division: Provided also that where any action, cause, matter, or issue is tried with a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless the Judge by whom such action, cause, matter, or issue is tried, or the Court, shall, for good cause, otherwise order."

My Lords, the action, as I have said, was not tried with a jury, and your Lordships have present to your minds the difference which exists under that rule in the matter of costs between an action tried with a jury and one, like the present, tried by a Judge alone. In the first case, the costs follow the event unless "for good cause" it is otherwise ordered. In the second case, the costs all through are in the discretion of the Judge, and the successful party, whether plaintiff or defendant, gets no costs unless the Judge awards them. But while that is the distinction there is in a case like the present no practical difference between the two. Had this action been tried with a jury and had the jury's verdict been for the defendant, the learned Judge would have found in the circumstances to which I have already alluded, the presence of the "good cause," which would have enabled him in his discretion to "otherwise order." And his order, then discretionary, would as now, have said that there was to be no order as to costs. The result and the mental process by which it was judicially reached would have been the same in each case. I desire, my Lords, particularly to emphasize this statement, and for the reason that had the learned Judge's order as to costs here followed the verdict of a jury instead of, as it did, a judgment of his own, the question whether in law he was entitled to make the order would without doubt have been open to final review in this House. Such is the result of Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra). In my eyes, it is not the least of the respondent's difficulties in this preliminary discussion that he is confronted with the problem, which I have myself found insoluble, of stating, as he must, your Lordships' rule as to appeals for costs alone in a form under which the "good cause" cases will be taken and appeals like the present will be left.

From the learned Judge's order, so far as it deprived him of costs, the defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal, and it is now essential to see exactly what the objection was which he there took to the order made. On its nature the competence of the Court to entertain the appeal turned. And, first of all, the objection had nothing to do with the manner in which the learned Judge had exercised his discretion. It has never been denied in these proceedings that the actual exercise of a proper discretion in relation to costs remained in this case a matter for the learned Judge and for no one else. Section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, which is the governing section, provided that "no order made by the High Court or any Judge thereof . . . as to costs only, which by law are left to the discretion of the Court, shall be subject to any appeal except by leave of the Court or Judge making such order." Such leave in the present case was never either asked for or given. And, the object of the section being that except with such consent the Court of Appeal shall not review a Judge's discretion with reference to costs—Bew v. Bew ([1899] 2 Ch., 467, at p. 471)—it follows that in the present case any such review was entirely beyond the competence of the Court of Appeal. Nor did that Court undertake any task of the kind. How, indeed, could it have, when the merits or demerits of the respondent's conduct in relation to the litigation were never before it. The order of the Court of Appeal took the form it does, only, I feel sure, because the learned Judge had in effect intimated how he himself would have dealt with the costs if the circumstances to which he had had regard were not open to his consideration. But for that intimation the Court of Appeal would have been bound to refer the case back to the learned Judge for him to exercise his discretion afresh on a consideration of the materials to which in the view of that Court he was confined. In the circumstances that would have been a needless formality. The order accordingly gave to the defendant his costs at once. But in so giving them there was no exercise by the Court of Appeal of a discretion of its own. Sure it is that this appeal, whatever else may be said of it, is not, in any sense, an appeal from the exercise by the Court of Appeal of any discretion at all. It is not, I submit, open to your Lordships to refuse to entertain it for any such non-existent reason.

The point is of first importance. On that very ground the present case is at once distinguished in principle from many which have been referred to, and notably from one on which great reliance was placed by Mr. Jowitt—I mean Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie ([1903] A.C., 126). There the learned Sheriff-Substitute had exercised his discretion as to costs on the facts which were all before him. On appeal, the Sheriff-Principal first, and the Inner House in turn, exercised on their view of the same facts, but in another way, what they treated as being and what was apparently on all hands accepted as being their own discretion. There was then an appeal to this House, and if its rejection by the Appeal Committee was in fact based on the ground that it was an appeal from the exercise of that last discretion one can feel no surprise at the result. For Barrie's case (supra) is only another illustration of the Privy Council rule as above expounded by Lord Justice Turner : an illustration of a rule of this House as accepted on all hands.

Very different was the case raised here in the Court of Appeal and decided by that Court. It was that the learned Judge, bound by law to deal with the costs of the action in the exercise of a judicial discretion, had, so far from doing so, avowedly based his order upon circumstances which in the submission of the defendant were not before him and to which in law he was not entitled to have any regard at all ; that, in other words, on the learned Judge's own avowal, the only discretion he had exercised was no discretion whatever.

And that contention of the defendant he was entitled to raise by appeal. "No doubt," says Lord Halsbury in Civil Service Cooperative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10; [1903] 2 K.B., 756, at p. 765), "where a Judge has exercised his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, it may not be, and I think is not, within the power of the Court of Appeal to overrule that exercise of discretion. But the necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials upon which the discretion can be exercised must be satisfied. In the present case, so far as the evidence before me goes, I can see no materials whatsoever upon which the learned Judge could exercise a discretion at all. . . . That is not exercising a discretion upon materials properly before the Judge ; but it is depriving a litigant of rights of which he is by law possessed, upon grounds which it is not competent for the Judge to treat as grounds for the exercise of his discretion. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the cross-appeal must succeed, and that the defendants are entitled to their costs."

The deprivation of a party of his costs, if upon a ground not warranted in law is a determination of the Judge in point of law, see per Mr. Justice Phillimore in Westgate v. Crowe (24 The Times L.R., 14 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 24, at p. 27). Accordingly, the order of Mr. Justice Branson, as to costs, objected to, as it was, on the ground stated by Lord Halsbury in the judgment just cited, was an appealable order under section 19 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, just as for a reason completely analogous is appealable the question, whether there exists in law "good cause" enabling a Judge after verdict of a jury and in the exercise of his discretion to order that the costs shall not follow the event but shall be dealt with in some other way.

Thus is brought to view the exact question which your Lordships on this preliminary point have first to decide. Is there any existent rule of this House as to appeals for costs alone, be its terms what you will, which is effective to stop in limine this particular appeal of the appellants from this order of the Court of Appeal made in the circumstances and on the grounds stated ?

Now excluding as I do from consideration any possible suggestion that the appeal is an abuse of your Lordships' procedure—no one in the circumstances of this case has made or could have made such a suggestion—I venture to assert in answer that for two reasons quite independent of each other, there can be no such rule.

First, this appeal is in this matter of costs indistinguishable in principle from the appeal as to the presence of "good cause" which was entertained and decided by the House in Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra). In such cases, as had been observed by Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, in Jones v. Curling (13 Q.B.D., 262, at p. 267), the Court [of Appeal] is bound to inquire whether the condition exists which gives a judge jurisdiction to make an order as to costs. In Huxley's case (supra), this House entered upon the same inquiry—its reason for doing so being, I think, correctly expressed in the head note in the words, "that if [the Court or Judge] give effect to considerations which do not constitute 'good cause' within the meaning of the rule they exceed the limits of their jurisdiction ; and on that ground their decisions are not protected from review." Equally so, here, my Lords. The question is, and is only, whether or not the learned Judge did not for an analogous reason exceed his jurisdiction. As Lord Blackburn observed in Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 582, at p. 586). "it is not because the condition involves the payment of costs, that, therefore, the question whether there is to be a condition or not is to be considered a mere dispute about costs." The real question here raised is only accidentally concerned with costs.

But, my Lords, there is another reason which leads to the same result. It is that under section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, the House has the duty imposed upon it of hearing this appeal. In my judgment that conclusion results from the decision in Secretary of State for Home Affairs v. O'Brien (39 The Times L.R., 638 ; [1923] A.C., 603), as embodied for this purpose in the following passage from Lord Dunedin's judgment at p. 620 :—

"The generality of expression of a clause which gives an appeal . . . to the Court of Appeal is indistinguishable from the generality of the clause which gives an appeal from the Court of Appeal to this House. It follows that the considerations urged in the case of Cox v. Hakes (6 The Times L.R., 465 ; 15 App. Cas., 506), which case decided that appeal was not competent, are equally applicable when the question is whether appeal in such a case as the present lies from the Court of Appeal to this House."

My Lords, the converse here is the case. By common consent, for Mr. Jowitt in terms adhered to that position in his reply, an appeal in this case lay to the Court of Appeal under section 19 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 : by section 3 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876—a clause of equal generality—an appeal is given to this House. Why then does no appeal lie in this case ? The only answer I have heard made is that just as in O'Brien's case (supra), the words, although wide enough to cover an appeal from an order for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus, could not have been intended to include such an appeal, so here the words of section 3 must be read so as to exclude the competence of an appeal which impinges upon your Lordships' rule against hearing an appeal for costs alone.

My Lords, I cannot think that O'Brien's case (supra) can be invoked to support that answer. I cannot think that the exception there introduced—on the high ground that if it were not, the sections would have retraced what had been "the evolutionary development of the constitutional liberty of the subject"—a backward step which a majority of your Lordships were satisfied Parliament had no intention of taking, can justify a similar exception in favour of a mere rule of procedure so undefined in its scope that it offered no hindrance to the free discussion in this House of Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra), an appeal indistinguishable from the present, as I hope I have shown.

On this ground, also, my Lords, I am of opinion that this preliminary point should be determined in the appellants' favour.

I come now to the question of the actual ambit of the rule. On that I have little to say. I have had the advantage of reading in print the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and with that judgment upon this matter I am in entire agreement. I would venture, upon it, to add only these observations of my own.

First. The rule has never been described as one peculiar to your Lordships' House. Lord Brougham in his statement of it in Inglis v. Mansfield (3 Cl. and Fin., 362, at p. 371), says it is common to this House, the Privy Council and the Court of Chancery. The Lord Chancellor has, I think, clearly shown that to extend it beyond the limit which he sets for it would carry the rule in this House beyond that of the Privy Council, the Court of Appeal in Chancery or the Court of Appeal as now constituted. His review of the authorities, I think, also establishes that this appeal would to-day be cognizable in the Privy Council, and it was, of course, entertained from the respondent's point of view by the Court of Appeal. No case since the passing of the Judicature Act has disclosed the existence in this House of any rule which would make it incompetent here. Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra) and less pointedly Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill (supra) show that no such rule was then operative. These cases on the one hand, with Caledonian Railway Company v. Barrie (supra), as reported, on the other, prove to my mind that the existing rule in this House is really in accord with the statement of the Privy Council rule as contained or implied in the words of Lord Justice Turner, with which I commenced this judgment. Since Barrie's case (supra) the question has apparently not been raised in this House, and from that fact and from the further fact that no attempt was made in such cases as Jones v. Curling (supra), and Civil Service Co-operative Society, Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company (supra), to test in this House the decision of the Court of Appeal, it has been suggested that since Barrie's case (supra) the sense of the profession has been that the avenue to this House has been closed. But, if so, the profession misunderstood Barrie's case (supra), and, next, Jones v. Curling (supra) was a "good cause" case. The Civil Service Society's case (supra), as the extract from Lord Halsbury's judgment in it above cited shows, was identical with the present. And truly there was no further appeal in either. But whatever may have been the reason for that omission in the Civil Service Society's case (supra)—poor prospects seem a sufficient explanation—your Lordships' rule ought to have had nothing to do with the absence of an appeal in Jones v. Curling (supra), for as Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (supra) subsequently showed, it would have imposed no barrier whatever to the appellant's progress to this House.

Secondly. The wider statement of the rule would seem to exclude from your Lordships' competence an appeal for his costs either by a trustee or by a mortgagee: and some colour for the suggestion that these costs are to be regarded like any other costs is to be found in the judgment of Lord Cottenham in Home v. Pringle (8 Cl. and Fin., 264, at p. 293). Mr. Jowitt, if I recollect aright, in his opening argument on the first discussion of this preliminary point contended that such costs were within the supposed rule, and most certainly no statement of the rule brought to your Lordships' notice has in terms excluded them. But no rule of practice could ever be supposed to go so far as to embrace within its operation questions touching the contractual right of trustees and mortgagees to their costs, and I can hardly suppose that any of your Lordships would desire to lay down or support a rule of practice for this House which would deprive either a trustee or a mortgagee of the privilege of having enforced here, if they had been denied elsewhere, his rights in this matter, as defined once for all by Lord Selborne in Cotterell v. Stratton (L.R., 8 Ch., 295, at p. 302) and by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in Turner v. Hancock (20 Ch.D., 303, at p. 305).

But how eloquent upon the extreme vagueness of the rule, if carried beyond its admitted purview, is this necessary but hitherto unexpressed exception to it?

Thirdly. It is suggested that the rule of this House on this subject may properly be more strict than the rule either of the Court of Appeal or of the Privy Council, inasmuch as an appeal to your Lordships is always at least a third hearing. To my mind, this suggestion would be more convincing if the rule were applicable only where the findings below had been concurrent. But there is no such limitation upon its operation.

Fourthly. The rule as defined by the Lord Chancellor protects the House from every mischief in relation to appeals for costs alone, against which it needs protection. Any extension of the rule beyond that point can, I suggest, only be justified by clear and irresistible authority, for it is surely highly inexpedient that except to that extent the right to receive or the liability to pay costs representing frequently and in this case very large sums should be placed beyond your Lordships' cognizance not by statute but by your Lordships' own act.

In the result, I am of opinion that this preliminary objection from whatever angle it be regarded should not be sustained, and I concur in the motion which the Lord Chancellor has made.

RADCLIFFE v. BUCKWELL.*

Merchant Shipping—Load-line—Not submerged at loading port—Heavy weather—Deck cargo—Saturation—Submersion of load-line on arrival—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 60), s. 442 (1).

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By s. 442 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, "If any owner or master of a British ship fails without reasonable cause to cause his ship to be marked as by this Part of this Act required, or to keep her so marked, or allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc indicating the load-line . . . he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds."

Held, that where the centre of the disc indicating the load-line is not submerged at the time of starting on the voyage but owing to the cargo being partly on deck and to its becoming saturated by heavy weather the centre of the disc is submerged on the arrival of the vessel at her destination, the master is liable to be convicted under the above provision.

This case, stated by the Hull stipendiary magistrate, was described by counsel as of great importance to shipowners and masters, and raised the question whether the master of a ship was liable to conviction for allowing his Plimsoll line to be submerged when such submersion was due solely to saturation in bad weather of the deck cargo, which was dry when the ship was loaded to the proper level.

The appellant, Albert John Radcliffe, was the master of the British ship Olavus. He was charged with unlawfully allowing the ship on September 22, 1926, at the Victoria Docks, Hull, to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc indicating the load-line contrary to section 442 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

On September 14 the Olavus completed loading at a Finnish port a cargo of sawn boards. The total cargo was 695 standards, of which 194 standards were carried on deck. The cargo at the time of loading was very dry and it was loaded in fine weather. The hatches were properly secured.

The ship left port with the centre of the disc not submerged and almost at once encountered a gale of hurricane force. The master had to heave to for a whole day, the ship listed to starboard, and a quantity of water was shipped. When the Kiel Canal was reached the ship was deep, but the master did not do anything to lighten her, as he had faith in her ability to reach Hull, and there were no facilities for discharging at Kiel.

Heavy weather was again encountered in the North Sea. On entering the Humber the ship had a list and was found in the dock to have the centre of the disc submerged 8½in. after making the proper allowances for water in the bilges and the specific gravity of the water. That submersion indicated an excess of 134 tons over the proper load.

All the timber on the fore deck and 20 per cent. of that on the after deck was found to be saturated. That below deck was dry except just below the hatches. Ninety-seven standards of timber, weighing when dry 247½ tons, were found to be so saturated as to account for the 134 tons excess weight.

The magistrate was of opinion that the master had allowed the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc indicating the load-line and accordingly convicted him and fined him £50 and £5 5s. costs, or 60 days' imprisonment.

Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Cyril Miller appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Bowstead for the respondent.

Mr. Clement Davies contended that the words of the Act were limited to the moment of completion of loading, over which the master had control. He referred to Massey v. Morris (10 The Times L.R., 517; [1894] 2 Q.B., 412). In that case the vessel was overloaded at the port of loading without the knowledge of the owner but with the knowledge of the master. The owner was prosecuted, and it was held that there was no evidence that he had allowed her to be overloaded.

The Lord Chief Justice.—Is the master not bound to exercise reasonable foresight and allow for bad weather? The Act makes the load-line the maximum point. Ought not the master, in the exercise of a reasonable and scientific imagination, to allow a margin of safety?

Mr. Clement Davies.—The margin of safety is provided by the load-line itself. The shipping of water on the voyage was not in his control.

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon to argue.

The Lord Chief Justice, in the course of his judgment, said that it was to be observed that the Victoria Dock was not the place where the process of putting the timber on board was carried out. That process was carried out on September 14 in Finland. Section 442 was one of a group of sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, dealing with the safety of those who go down to the sea in ships, and was not the least important of those sections. It provided:—

"(1) If—(a) any owner or master of a British ship fails without reasonable cause to cause his ship to be marked as by this Part of this Act required, or to keep her so marked, or allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc indicating the load-line . . . he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds. . . ."

No doubt as a mere matter of grammatical construction, the words "allows the ship to be so loaded" were ambiguous. They might refer to the actual process of loading, but they might equally refer to the condition of the loaded ship. In his opinion, they were wide enough to cover this case.

The very same words occurred in section 439 dealing with the detention of unsafe ships. If the contention of the appellant were correct, the moment, and the only moment, at which the question might be raised was the moment at which the process of putting the cargo on board had just been carried out.

If the vessel were then overloaded she would be liable under section 459 to be detained. But if she received a considerable addition from the sky or the waves to her cargo on the voyage and was driven to take refuge in another port, being then in a condition which would have made her an unsafe ship at the port of loading, still, if the appellant were right, she was not an unsafe ship there and could not be detained. With all respect to the counsel who had put forward that argument, it seemed to him to be a reductio ad absurdum of the matter.

He thought that the words meant the same in both sections and covered a case where a master was charged with allowing the mark, by reason of the way in which the vessel had been loaded, to be submerged at the port of arrival. In his opinion the magistrate was right.

Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Shearman delivered judgment to the same effect.

BOWKER v. WOODROFFE. BOWKER v. PREMIER DRUG COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Sale of Food and Drugs—Extract of meat and malt wine—No fixed standard of quality—Analyst's certificate—Duty of Court to fix standard—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 63), s. 6—Wholesaler charged with aiding and abetting retailer—Not present at sale—No evidence of knowledge of composition of article sold.

Where an article of food or a drug has no recognized standard of quality, it is the duty of the Court before which a person is charged with supplying that article or drug not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by the purchaser, and to his prejudice, to fix a standard in the sense of considering whether the article supplied must be held to fall below a reasonable minimum, whatever it might in fact be. Where an analyst's certificate is before the Court, and is uncontradicted, the Court ought to act upon it, if it asserts that the article is deficient.

A wholesaler who supplies an article to a retailer for re-sale cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting if he is not present when the re-sale takes place, nor in the absence of evidence that he knew the composition of the article.

BOWKER v. WOODROFFE.

This was a case stated by the Stipendiary Magistrate of Salford.

An information was preferred by the appellant, Walter Stanley Bowker, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, against Frederick James Woodroffe, the respondent, for that he on June 30, 1926, did sell to the appellant, and to his prejudice, a certain article of food, to wit, Extract of Meat and Malt Wine, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.

The appellant was an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and on June 30, 1926, he purchased from the respondent a bottle of Extract of Meat and Malt Wine for the purpose of analysis. The bottle was labelled "Extract of Meat and Malt Wine. Guaranteed prepared from Liebig's Extract of Meat. This Wine will be found invaluable as a stimulant to digestion. A tonic and a food. Non-alcoholic." The appellant paid 4s. 6d. for the bottle of Extract of Meat and Malt Wine, and complied with the formalities required by section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

The City Analyst gave a certificate in the following form, so far as material :—

"I am of opinion that the said sample contained the parts as under :—

Water	..	81.2 per cent.
Total sugars	..	16.4 ,,
Other extractive matter	..	2.4 ,,

"No change had taken place in the article that would interfere with the analysis. A genuine meat and malt wine should contain at least 5 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts with a wine basis. The above 'other extractive matter' contains 0.06 per cent. phosphoric anhydride, indicating the possible presence of not more than 2 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts. This opinion is based on the fact that a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts contains about 3 per cent. phosphoric anhydride. The sample is therefore deficient of at least 60 per cent. of the minimum amount of meat and malt extract and is entirely deficient of wine. This is not a meat and malt wine. Its composition is little different from that of an ordinary flavoured cordial."

There was no fixed standard of quality for Extract of Meat and Malt Wine, but the amount of extract of meat and malt that had been put in the article supplied was very small—namely, 2.4 per cent.

The value of the bottle of Extract of Meat and Malt Wine, for which 4s. 6d. was charged and paid, did not exceed 6d., which included 3d. for the bottle.

The respondent did not tender any evidence.

The appellant contended that the use of the term "wine" implied the presence of the fermented juice of the grape, that in view of the certificate of the public analyst the sale in question was a sale of an article of food not of the nature, substance and quality demanded, and that the appellant was thereby prejudiced.

The respondent contended (a) that the article of food sold by him to the appellant was in accordance with the description specified on the label affixed to the bottle containing the said article, and the appellant was not thereby prejudiced ; (b) that the article had no recognized standard of quality and the sale in this case was not an offence within the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts ; and (c) that the term "wine" did not imply the presence of the fermented juice of the grape nor even that grape juice in any form was present.

The magistrate, whose attention was directed by the respondent to Davidson v. Macleod (42 J.P., 43) ; Morton v. Green (8 Rettie (J.C.), 36) ; Smith v. Wisden (18 The Times L.R., 92), was of opinion that the article of food purchased by the appellant was one for which there was no recognized standard of quality, and that he was bound by the decision in Davidson v. Macleod (supra), and on that ground dismissed the information.

Mr. T. Eastham, K.C., and Mr. E. L. Fleming appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Wingate-Saul, K.C. (Mr. Macbeth with him), for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by the learned Stipendiary Magistrate for the City of Salford. The question arises in the following way :—An information was preferred by the present appellant under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, against the present respondent for selling to the appellant and to his prejudice a certain article of food—namely, extract of meat and malt wine, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. The magistrate, having heard the information, dismissed it, and the question raised by this case is whether in so doing he came to a correct decision in point of law. It is not necessary to repeat all the findings of fact ; it is enough to say that on a certain day in June last the appellant, seeing in the window of the respondent's shop bottles of what was described as "extract of meat and malt wine," entered the shop and asked for a bottle of extract of meat and malt wine. It is found as a fact that that substance is a food. The label upon the bottle bore, amongst other things, the words "Extract of meat and malt wine. Guaranteed prepared from Liebig's Extract of Meat. This wine will be found invaluable as a stimulant to digestion. A tonic and a food." The stuff in the bottle was analysed by the public analyst, and the certificate of analysis was offered in evidence. His conclusion was that the contents of the bottle were, water 81.2 per cent., total sugars 16.4 per cent., other extractive matter 2.4 per cent.; in other words, everything in this bottle was water or sugar except 2.4 per cent. The public analyst continued: "A genuine meat and malt wine should contain at least 5 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts with a wine basis. The above 'other extractive matter' contains 0.06 per cent. phosphoric anhydride, indicating the possible presence of not more than 2 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts. This opinion is based on the fact that a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts contains about 3 per cent. phosphoric anhydride. The sample is therefore deficient of at least 60 per cent. of the minimum amount of meat and malt extract, and is entirely deficient of wine. This is not a meat and malt wine. Its composition is little different from that of an ordinary flavoured cordial."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case further finds that there is no fixed standard of quality for extract of meat and malt wine. It was a contention, and no doubt the main contention, of the respondent that the article purchased had no recognized standard of quality, and therefore the sale was not an offence. The learned magistrate having had an opportunity since December 16 last, when this case at the request of the respondent was remitted to the magistrate for further consideration, has re-stated the case in exactly the same terms as those which he first employed.

The opinion to which the learned magistrate came is as follows: "I was of opinion that the article of food purchased by the appellant was one for which there is no recognized standard of quality, and that I was bound by the decision in Davidson v. Macleod (42 J.P., 43)." Now, with regard to the decision in Davidson v. Macleod (supra), I think it is necessary to make two observations. The first is that it has no real bearing upon this case, and the second is that, if it had, it would not be binding upon the magistrate sitting in Salford. Section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, provides as follows: "At the hearing of the information in such proceeding, the production of the certificate of the analyst shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant shall require that the analyst shall be called as a witness. . . ."

What are the facts stated in this certificate? The statements with regard to the constituent elements of this compound are undoubtedly statements of fact. The statement of the relative proportions in which those elements are found is undoubtedly a statement of fact. Then the certificate contains a sentence which it is suggested is really a statement of opinion, or it may be an aspiration: "A genuine meat and malt wine should contain at least 5 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts, with a wine basis." Speaking for myself, I read that sentence as meaning that a genuine meat and malt wine does normally contain at least 5 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts with a wine basis.

Starting from that axiom, the certificate proceeds step by step to demonstrate that there was here a deficiency to the extent of at least 60 per cent. of the minimum amount of meat and malt extracts, and having set out the stages and the factors in the conclusion, it sets out this final statement: "This is not a meat and malt wine." Now it is said that these are not statements of fact, but are expressions of opinion. The distinction between the two becomes a little metaphysical. In form they seem to me to be statements of fact, and if it had been desired to say that these are not statements of fact but mere statements of opinion, the proper course was for the respondent to require the attendance of the analyst so that he might be cross-examined, and it was open to the respondent to tender evidence per contra. This case, however, states in the clearest terms, in paragraph 6: "On the hearing of the information, the respondent did not tender any evidence."

In those circumstances, what was the true conclusion for the magistrate? I think that the matter is made quite clear by two cases. One is the case of Harrison v. Richards (45 J.P., 552), where Mr. Justice Lindley, as he then was, said at page 553: "The magistrate in this case seems to have treated the certificate as matter of opinion and not of fact. He sets out his own opinion against the certificate, but I think that cannot be done, for the certificate is prima facie evidence, and it could not be thrown over merely by an opinion not founded on the evidence. No evidence was given to contradict the certificate." That was a certificate in which, the constituent elements having been set out, the analyst said: "I am of opinion that the same is a sample of milk adulterated with 20 per cent. of water." That case was in the year 1881. In a much more recent case, in the year 1917, the case of Robinson v. Newman (81 J.P., 187), it was said by this Court (per Lord Reading, C.J.), at page 188: "The magistrates have to act upon the certificate of the analyst, which appears to be in the form in the schedule to the Act. The observation inserted in the certificate is justified by the note in the form in the schedule, and I do not think it is necessary to say more than that the analyst was entitled to express his opinion, and in the absence of a request that he should be called as a witness or of evidence to the contrary the justices should have acted upon it. The case of Harrison v. Richards (supra) is in point, and the appeal must be allowed." Finally, I should like to refer to a passage in the case of Roberts v. Leeming (69 J.P., 417) where, at page 419, Mr. Justice Ridley, who was one of the majority of the Court, said: "We have to consider the case of an article compounded for the purposes of commerce. It is not a natural product. You cannot say there is a certain standard which nature has laid down which is the proper standard for the qualities to be possessed by this particular article, and, as I think, it is like the Scotch case, Wilson and M'Phee v. Wilson (68 J.P., 175), quoted by Mr. Bartley, in which the Court must lay down for itself a standard. In this case, therefore, the justices had to make their own standard according to the evidence before them, and they had to say, Was this article in accordance with the standard, or was it not?" And in like manner, Mr. Justice Lawrance, at page 420, said: "That the Court can and must, unless the enactment is to be brought to nothing at all, fix some standard is, I should have thought, abundantly clear. There is nothing in the Act to show what margarine is. If it were not so, and if evidence of that kind were not admitted, it would be perfectly impossible to get at what margarine is under the Margarine Act at all"; and again, "But the decision in the case of Wilson and M'Phee v. Wilson (supra) is absolutely clear, and I think that the Court has power to, and must, dealing with an Act like the Margarine Act, fix some standard for itself."

Now, undoubtedly the words "fix some standard" are ambiguous. I do not think that those learned Judges meant that there must be a quantitative standard, drawing a hard and fast line. That is, of course, one way of fixing a standard, and in some cases it may be the best way, but there is clearly another way of fixing a standard, and that is, to have regard to a minimum and to say with regard to the contents of a particular admixture that, upon any reasonable view of the true minimum, this compound must fall short of it.

In the present case, the learned magistrate seems to have come to the conclusion that as there was no recognized standard of quality he was, so to say, functus officio, and anything could be sold under the name of "Extract of meat and malt wine." It has been suggested that there was some other evidence before him which caused him to doubt. It is upon no such matter that he has stated this case and re-stated it upon further consideration. The evidence in this case as to the contents of this bottle, and as to the real meaning of "Extract of meat and malt wine," at least so far as the minimum required is concerned, is to be found in this certificate. Having set out that certificate, the learned magistrate says that "On the hearing of the information, the respondent did not tender any evidence."

In those circumstances, that being the state of the evidence, I think it was the duty of the magistrate to say that this mixture fell below the requirements which were placed before him, by the only evidence worth regarding, as to the true nature, substance, and quality of extract of meat and malt wine, and, therefore, he ought to have convicted the respondents. In these circumstances and for these reasons, I think that this appeal ought to be allowed, and the case ought to go back to the magistrate with a direction to convict.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. This certificate, upon its face, states as a fact that this article, which has been analysed, is not a meat and malt wine. In the absence of any evidence qualifying or contradicting that statement of fact, I think it was the duty of the learned magistrate to find that the article which had been sold had been sold to the prejudice of the purchaser, and I agree that the case should be remitted to him to do so.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to say a few words about the authorities. Section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, provides that: "At the hearing of the information in such proceeding the production of the certificate of the analyst shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated." That is usually paraphrased by saying that the certificate of the analyst is conclusive unless contradicted. I think a very serious question arises as to what is the meaning of those words. It is merely a certificate of an expert analyst, and it is conclusive as to the facts therein stated. I do not know whether extract of meat and malt wine, under the Food and Drugs Acts, is a food or a drug; it is said to be a food, but it certainly is not a well-known article of diet. In this particular case the analyst not only made an analysis, but he goes on in this form: "A genuine meat and malt wine should contain at least 5 per cent. of a mixture of equal parts of meat and malt extracts, with a wine basis," and from that proposition he goes on to draw various inferences, and says that this does not comply with the standard. If it were not for the authorities, which, in my opinion, bind this Court, I should hesitate to say that those are facts stated in the analysis. To my mind it is an expression of opinion, and, having regard to this analysis, he thinks the Court ought to convict, and wants them to convict, and it amounts to no more. There is no doubt also that, since this Act was passed, there is a form of analysis which provides, in terms, that the analyst can express his opinion as to whether the mixture was for the purpose of rendering the article colourable or preservable, and state whether the excess is ordinary or not.

There are two authorities to which my Lord has referred; one is Harrison v. Richards (45 J.P., 552), and the second is Robinson v. Newman (81 J.P., 187). The last case is 10 years old, the other is a great many years old. Although in neither of those cases was more than one side represented, and that the side in whose favour judgment was given, it is quite clearly laid down in both those cases—I do not think it is possible to discriminate—that the analyst is entitled to express his opinion as to what the standard should be, and if that is uncontradicted, the magistrates are bound to accept it. The odd thing is that there are two reported cases: one Reg. v. Field—Ex parte White (11 The Times L.R., 240), and the other Shortt v. Robinson (63 J.P., 295), where this Court has decided the exact reverse, where the analyst had attempted to express a view and the magistrates declined to accept the view, and the Court declined to interfere with their finding, but in my opinion the two other cases to which I have referred have for a long time been regarded as the leading cases. The later one is 10 years old, and I do not think this Court ought to disturb the principle laid down by them. That principle is that the analyst is entitled to express his opinion as to what the standard of any article should be, in order that the thing sold should not be sold to the prejudice of the purchaser, and if he expresses his opinion in his analysis, the Court is bound to accept it unless it is contradicted. That, I think, is the present state of the law which we have to accept. That being so, I think that this appeal should be allowed.

BOWKER v. PREMIER DRUG COMPANY, LIMITED.

This case was connected with the previous one, 16 respondents in the present case being charged with aiding and abetting Woodroffe. These respondents were the wholesale firm who, on December 31, 1925, sold to Woodroffe for re-sale a dozen large and a dozen small bottles of extract of meat and malt wine. The magistrate, having dismissed the information against Woodroffe, also dismissed this information.

The same counsel appeared on both sides.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a case stated by the learned Stipendiary Magistrate for the City of Salford. It is closely connected with the case of Bowker v. Woodroffe, upon which we came to a conclusion earlier to-day. It is not necessary to repeat the details of this case.

The present respondents, the Premier Drug Company, Limited, were charged with aiding and abetting Woodroffe to commit the offence referred to in the previous case, namely, to sell to the appellant and to his prejudice a certain article of food, that is, extract of meat and malt wine, which was not of the nature, substance and quality of the article demanded, contrary to section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The learned magistrate came to the conclusion that the information ought to be dismissed, and he dismissed it. The question for us is whether he came to a correct determination and decision in point of law. One thing at any rate is perfectly obvious : if he did come to a correct decision it was not for the reasons that he gives. His reasons are as follow in paragraph 9 : "Having dismissed an information preferred by the appellant against the said Frederick James Woodroffe in respect of an alleged contravention by him of section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 . . . I was consequently of opinion that the facts did not disclose the offence charged in the information preferred by the appellant against the respondents." In other words, the learned magistrate seems to say, and to say clearly : "As I have dismissed the case against the principal offender I have no alternative but to dismiss the case against the alleged aiders and abettors."

We have now found that he was wrong in dismissing the case against the principal offender, and have sent back that case to him with a direction to convict. It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that this case cannot be decided in favour of the respondents upon the ground upon which the learned magistrate dismissed the information. Yet it may appear that there are facts stated in the case which show that accidentally the learned magistrate arrived at the right conclusion, and that the information ought to have been dismissed, although for quite different reasons.

It is found as a fact, and is not denied, that this compound or mixture was sold by the respondents to Woodroffe. It is further found that these respondents induced the unfortunate Woodroffe to buy this stuff for re-sale. It is further found that at the time when the stuff was delivered to Woodroffe it was labelled, as it was labelled when it was sold, amongst other things, as extract of meat and malt wine and so forth.

I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that these respondents could not be held liable, and that for more than one reason : First, they were charged as aiders and abettors, but they were not present at the time of the sale complained of ; secondly, there is no evidence to show that they knew at any material time that this mixture was not what it purported to be, and what the label said it was ; and, thirdly, there is no evidence to show they knew that although they sold this stuff labelled as extract of meat and malt wine Woodroffe was not going to sell it subject to the warning which he might conceive to be appropriate, as for example : "You ought to understand that this is really water," or "This is not wine at all."

In these circumstances I think that the learned magistrate was right in dismissing the case against these respondents, and I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that this appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree that the learned magistrate was right in dismissing this summons against the respondents, not on the ground on which he did dismiss it, but upon the ground that there was no evidence that the respondents aided and abetted Frederick James Woodroffe to commit the offence of selling to the prejudice of the appellant a certain article of food. Even if the summons had been amended, as Mr. Eastham rightly says it might have been amended at the hearing, into a charge that they did counsel and procure Frederick James Woodroffe to commit that offence, there still, in my opinion, would not have been any evidence to justify their conviction for that offence.

Quite apart from the point that there was no evidence that they knew how this article was compounded, there was no evidence showing that they did not inform Woodroffe at the time when they sold it that it only contained 2 per cent. of malt and meat extract, and that he must therefore warn purchasers before he sold it. Further, there was no evidence that they knew that in selling it on this particular occasion on June 30 he was selling it to the prejudice of the purchaser, that is to say, selling it without any warning or notice to the purchaser that it was not actually what it was represented to be by the label.

For those reasons I think it was impossible upon the evidence that was before the learned magistrate for him to have convicted either of aiding and abetting or of counselling and procuring the commission of this particular offence.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—I am of the same opinion. The magistrate dismissed this charge against the Premier Drug Company, Limited, of being aiders and abettors because he had already dismissed the charge against the principals. Naturally, he had nothing more to consider. This Court has decided that he was wrong in his previous decision. There is no reason to suppose, however, that if he had considered this question on its merits he would have arrived at a wrong decision.

We are entitled to look at the stated facts, and if according to the stated facts he ought to have so decided we can dismiss the appeal. I know that moralists say that the person who provides the means to commit a crime is worse than, or just as bad as, the man who commits the crime, but that is not a sound maxim of criminal law. A crime must be a specific intentional act, and I know of no case saying that a man can be an aider and abettor if he knows nothing of the act or the date or the person against whom the criminal offence is committed. It will not do to say : "You gave the means of doing it." A man is not an aider and abettor unless he was present actively or constructively assisting the act which is an illegal act. There is no evidence of that at all, and therefore the magistrate, if he had considered the matter, would have been quite right in doing as we are doing now, namely, in dismissing the summons.

HOLY LAW SOUTH BROUGHTON BURIAL BOARD v. FAILSWORTH U.D.C.*

Private Street Works—Apportionment—Exemption of burial ground "attached" to place of worship—Physical attachment or contiguity required—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict., c. 57), s. 16.

The exemption from liability for the expenses of private street works given by s. 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to a burial ground "attached" to a "place appropriated to public religious worship which is for the time being by law exempt from rates for the relief of the poor" extends only to a burial ground in physical attachment or contiguity to the building, and does not include a burial ground at a distance "attached" to the place of worship in the functional sense that it is owned and maintained by the congregation of the place of worship for their members.

This was a case stated by Lancashire justices.

An application was made by the Failsworth Urban District Council, the respondents (hereinafter called the Council), under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, against the appellants, the Holy Law South Broughton Burial Board (hereinafter called the Burial Board), to a court of summary jurisdiction for determining the matter of an objection made by the said Burial Board to a proposal by the said Council with respect to the charge on the said Burial Board, as owners of premises shown in the provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with £376 5s. 3d., a part of the expense of executing certain private street works on part of road No. 2, within the said urban district. On November 17, 1926, the said court of summary jurisdiction determined that the said objection of the said Burial Board was bad, and overruled it.

The following facts were admitted or proved [in addition to the due compliance by the Council with the several provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, as to resolutions, specifications, plans, &c., and notices thereof to the Burial Board, who were charged in the provisional apportionment as owners of the Jewish burial ground abutting on the said street]. By letter dated May 25, 1926, the Burial Board gave notice of objection to the proposals of the Council, and claimed exemption under section 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, on the ground that the cemetery or burial ground was attached to the synagogues of the Holy Law Congregation and the South Broughton Congregation, respectively situate at Red Bank, Cheetham, and Bury New-road, Strangeways, Manchester, and being places appropriated to public religious worship and exempt from rates for the relief of the poor within the meaning of that section.

The synagogue of the Holy Law Congregation was situate in Red Bank, Cheetham, in the City of Manchester, and the South Broughton Synagogue was situate in Bury New-road, Strangeways, in the City of Manchester. Both synagogues were situate about five miles distant from the said burial ground, and neither synagogue was within the district of the said urban authority.

Both synagogues were places appropriated to public religious worship and exempt from rates for the relief of the poor. The said burial ground was assessed for poor rate, and poor rate was paid in respect thereof to the said Council.

By an indenture made on October 25, 1922, between certain persons therein named as vendors, and certain other persons of the second part and of the third part therein named as purchasers, it was recited that the parties of the second part were members of the said Holy Law Congregation, a religious community of persons of the Jewish persuasion whose place of worship for the time being was known as the Holy Law Synagogue, and that the parties of the third part were members of the congregation of the South Broughton Synagogue, another religious community of persons of the Jewish persuasion whose place of worship for the time being was known as the South Broughton Synagogue, and that the plots of land and hereditaments thereby conveyed were conveyed to the use of the said parties thereto of the second and third parts thereinafter referred to as trustees upon trust to permit the same or such part or parts thereof as might from time to time be set apart and appropriated for that purpose to be used in perpetuity as a burial ground for the members of the said Holy Law Congregation and the members of the said South Broughton Synagogue, or, if the trustees should so permit, for the members of other congregations, subject to such payments and conditions as the trustees might from time to time determine.

A Burial Board was formed to carry out the terms of the said indenture, and was named the Holy Law South Broughton Burial Board. Rules were made by such Board.

The land which formed the premises of the Burial Board, and in respect of which the Council desired to levy the said charge, had at all material times been used by the said Burial Board as a burial ground only, and in accordance with the said indenture and the said rules.

On the hearing of the said application it was contended on behalf of the Council :—

(1) That the said burial ground was not attached to the said synagogues or either of them within the meaning of section 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, in that the distance between the said burial ground and the said synagogues was five miles; (2) that the word "attached" in the said section 16 had a physical significance.

It was contended on behalf of the Burial Board :—

(1) That the said burial ground was attached to both of the said synagogues within the meaning of section 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892; (2) that the word "attached" in the said section 16 had not a physical significance; (3) that the word "attached" in the said section 16 had a purely functional significance.

The justices were of the opinion that the said burial ground was not attached to the said synagogues or either of them, within the meaning of section 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

The material words of the section are set out in full in the second paragraph of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Mr. N. J. Laski appeared for the appellants; Mr. W. Gorman, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices for the county of Lancaster sitting in Manchester. The short question arises under the words of section 16 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The question was whether in respect of a burial ground situate some five miles from two synagogues in Manchester there was exemption from liability under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, by reason of the fact that the burial ground was in some sense connected or associated with each of those two synagogues.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents, the Urban District Council, that the word "attached" which is found in section 16 had a physical significance. On behalf of the present appellants it was contended that the word "attached" had no physical significance at all, and that it concerned only the purpose or function of the burial ground in relation to the place of worship. The words of the section are as follow: "The incumbent, or minister or trustee of any church, chapel, or place appropriated to public religious worship, which is for the time being exempt by law from rates for the relief of the poor, shall not be liable to any expenses of private street works as the owner of such church, chapel, or place, or of any churchyard or burial ground attached thereto. . . ."

The topic which is being dealt with is the expenses of private street works, which, of course, must always be carried out in a particular street, and where there is liability for such works the proportionate part of the total expenses which any particular person has to pay depends upon the extent of the frontage of the premises in which that person is interested in relation to the street works that have been or are about to be carried out. What is being dealt with throughout is not something abstract, theoretical or notional, but physical and actual frontage, paving and streets. The section begins by postulating the existence of a physical place—a building—where there is public religious worship. In order that the section may have any application at all one must first find a church, a chapel, or a place appropriated to public religious worship. That physical structure having been identified, then if that structure is exempt from rates for the relief of the poor, it follows that it is also exempt from the expenses of private street works, and the exemption is carried beyond the four walls within which the religious worship takes place to that which is connected with it in a physical and also in a functional sense, if the word may be employed, namely, the churchyard or the burial ground. If there is a churchyard or burial ground attached to that church, chapel, or place appropriated to public religious worship, and that place is exempt from rates for the relief of the poor, then the burial ground also is exempt; the Act does not impose liability upon the owner of the church, chapel, or place by reason of the fact that it has a frontage upon the street or streets where the street works are being carried out.

In my opinion the whole scheme and framework of this section make it plain that what is being considered is physical connexion, physical contiguity. It may well be that that is not enough; in addition to the physical connexion and contiguity the churchyard or the burial ground must be the churchyard or burial ground of the particular church, chapel, or place appropriated to public religious worship which is exempt from rates. But I cannot imagine within the meaning of this term that a place which is five miles off is attached to the synagogue merely because it is associated with the synagogue as a place where members of the synagogue and other persons may be buried. It is not necessary to discuss the question how close the actual physical contiguity must be, but that there must be physical attachment and association I am satisfied, and on any fair view of the meaning of this word "attached" it could not be held that this burial ground, distant five miles, was "attached" to these synagogues within the meaning of section 16.

The justices were of the opinion that the burial ground was not "attached" to the said synagogues or either of them within the meaning of this section. The only question for this Court is whether in coming to that conclusion the justices came to a correct decision in point of law. Mr. Laski, if I may say so, has urged with ingenuity everything that can be urged on behalf of these appellants, but I am satisfied that these justices did not misdirect themselves, and that the contention of the respondents was right, namely, that the word "attached" in this section has a physical significance.

In these circumstances I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. The appellants here are the Holy Law South Broughton Burial Board, who, in fact, are in occupation of this burial ground, and who pay poor rates in respect thereof. The only question is whether this burial ground can be said, within the meaning of section 16, to be "attached" to the synagogue of the Holy Law Congregation, or the synagogue of the South Broughton Congregation, situate at Manchester.

I am of opinion for the same reasons that have been given by my Lord that this burial ground cannot be said to be attached to either of those congregations, and, therefore, it is not exempt under section 16.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I agree.

K.B. Div. (Acton and Talbot, JJ.) 1927. May 12.

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol—Possession by landlord—Meaning of "landlord"—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

By the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 2 (1), "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Act of 1920] applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

Held, that "landlord" in the above section, as generally in the Rent Restriction Acts, includes not only an owner, freeholder, or head landlord, but also any person who has a tenant holding under him; and, accordingly, even a quarterly tenant, who has sublet on a weekly tenancy, may be a landlord for the purposes of the section.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from the Judge of the Guildford County Court, who had given judgment for the defendant in an action for trespass. The defendant, Mrs. Edith Matilda Wilson, was a quarterly tenant of a cottage known as the Princess Christian Cottage Home, Woking, and she had sublet the same to the plaintiff, Mr. Henry George Oakley, on a weekly tenancy. The cottage was a dwelling-house within the limits of the Rent Restriction Acts, and the defendant had taken proceedings for possession of the same before the justices under the Recovery of Small Tenements Act, 1838, and a warrant of possession had been granted by the justices.

The issue which the County Court Judge had to decide was whether the defendant was the landlord of the cottage in question within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, under the provisions of which, if the defendant were the landlord, the premises would be decontrolled and the defendant would therefore have a lawful right to possession.

The County Court Judge, in his judgment, referred to Doulin v. Parcell (43 The Times L.R., 140), where "Mr. Justice Horridge regarded the tenant as an effective landlord for the purpose of decontrol and would have held him to be such if the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 did not apply"; to Catto v. Curry (42 The Times L.R., 243; [1926] 1 K.B., 460), where Mr. Justice Talbot said: "If the Legislature had stopped there [at the end of the first paragraph of section 2 (1) and before the proviso], since by section 12 of the Act of 1920 "landlord" is to be interpreted as including a tenant who sublets to a subtenant, the Act of 1920 would have ceased to apply"; and to Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196; [1926] 1 K.B., 360) in the following terms: "The point was taken in the Divisional Court that the landlord was a tenant and not the freeholder. That point was not raised in the County Court and Lord Justice Bankes declined to deal with it, observing that the landlord, who was treated in the Court below as the owner, had obtained actual possession, executed certain repairs and then relet. In these circumstances the tenant is estopped from saying that the landlord is not in effect the landlord." The County Court Judge then continued: "Apart from the expressions of judicial opinion I have referred to I should have been inclined to come to the conclusion that a quarterly tenant cannot come within the meaning of 'landlord' for the purpose of section 2 (1) of the Act; but, having regard to these opinions and to the fact that here only the first part of the section is applicable and not the proviso, and further having regard to the definition of 'landlord' in section 12 of the Act of 1920, I do come to the conclusion that Mrs. Wilson was a landlord of these premises within section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 and that in these circumstances she had a lawful right to possession at the time when the warrant for possession was granted by the magistrates." Accordingly he gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. John Harris appeared for the appellant; Mr. F. W. Beney for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court, which was read by Mr. Justice Acton, was as follows:—

This was an appeal from a decision of His Honour Judge Harington giving judgment for the defendant in an action for damages for trespass. The defendant was a lady who was the local representative of a Sailors' and Soldiers' Help Society at Woking and as such she had taken, on a quarterly tenancy at a rental of £2 12s. a quarter, the tenant paying rates and taxes, a cottage which was a dwelling-house within the Rent Restriction Acts. She had been the tenant of this cottage for some 18 years. In the latter part of 1925 it was in the occupation of one Riordan to whom the defendant had sublet it, but on December 4, 1925, Riordan died and the cottage became vacant. The defendant then obtained the keys, took possession of the cottage, had it cleaned out, and after an interval of about ten days let it to the plaintiff as a weekly tenant at a rent of 2s. 6d. per week, as the County Court Judge found, though for some time after the plaintiff entered into occupation he had in fact paid no rent at all. From July, 1926, however, the plaintiff had been called upon to pay and had paid a rent of 2s. 6d. a week.

There was no question that the defendant between December 4 and 14, 1925, had come into actual possession of the cottage. In August, 1926, some differences arose between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the defendant gave the plaintiff notice to quit expiring on September 2, 1926. Subsequently other notices to quit were served, and on a notice to quit served on September 21, 1926, to expire on October 4, 1926, proceedings were taken under the Small Tenements Act Recovery, 1838, by the defendant against the plaintiff. These proceedings failed on the ground that that notice to quit was bad. A fresh notice to quit was then served on October 19, 1926, to expire on October 28, 1926, and upon this notice a warrant of possession was granted by the justices on November 13, 1926. On December 10, 1926, the plaintiff by plaint in the County Court brought an action for damages for trespass as he was entitled to do by virtue of section 3 of the Act of 1838, alleging that the defendant had not, when the warrant was granted, legal right to the possession of the premises, and it is from the decision of the County Court Judge in this action that the plaintiff now appeals to this Court.

On these facts the County Court Judge held that the defendant Mrs. Wilson was "the landlord" of the dwelling-house in question within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. It is agreed that, if he was right in this, this appeal must fail, for there was no question that she had come into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house after the passing of the Act and before she let the dwelling-house to Oakley. The appellant's case therefore depends upon whether it can be shown that the Judge was wrong in so holding.

This raises a point for the decision of the Court which is, so far as we are aware, novel. It is convenient to consider the question from two points of view:—(1) What is the meaning in law, independently of the Rent Restriction Acts, of the word "landlord"? and (2) whether there is a special meaning to be given to the words "the landlord" in the particular section of the Act of 1923 with which the present case is concerned?

The relation of landlord and tenant in its ordinary legal significance arises whenever one party confers on another the right to exclusive possession of premises, e.g., of a dwelling-house, for a time which is either subject to a definite limit originally, as in the case of a lease for a term of years, or which, though originally indefinite, can be made subject to a definite limit by either party, as in the case of a tenancy from year to year or of a quarterly, monthly, or weekly tenancy. This relation is created by contract to which there is usually, though not necessarily, incident a right on the part of the landlord to receive from the tenant payment for the use of the premises in the shape of rent. "The word 'landlord' does not mean the lord of the soil, but the person between whom and the tenant the relation of landlord and tenant exists" (per Baron Bramwell, in Churchward v. Ford (2 H. and N., 446)). The relation of landlord and tenant is, of course, fully established only when the tenant has entered on the premises let. If that has happened pursuant to a contract of the kind indicated the parties to such a contract are accurately described as the landlord and the tenant.

With regard, however, to the recent legislation on the restriction of rents, the argument for the appellant was that "the landlord" in section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 means either the owner of the premises or what is somewhat vaguely described as the "head landlord," by which we understand to be meant the person who by contract first creates a tenancy of the premises in question, subject perhaps only to the provisions of section 12 (7) of the Act of 1920 and the consequences of those provisions as illustrated by the case of Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 322).

It was said that, in any event, one who is himself no more than a quarterly tenant and has sublet the premises of which he is but a quarterly tenant on a weekly tenancy cannot be said to be a head landlord within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. It was not conceded that a lessee of a dwelling-house for a term of years, however long, who sublet the whole of the premises on a tenancy of an originally indefinite character, such as a tenancy from year to year, or a quarterly, monthly or weekly tenancy, could be the "landlord" within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. But it was contended that, even if that had to be conceded, it was still correct to say that a quarterly tenant who sublet on a weekly tenancy was not "the landlord" within the meaning of this subsection.

These very words, "the landlord," appear not only in this subsection but elsewhere, and very frequently in the Act of 1923. It is, therefore, expedient to consider how these words are used elsewhere, for we are of opinion that the same meaning should be given to them wherever they occur, unless there is something in the context which clearly indicates that a different meaning is intended.

It is probably unnecessary, and it would be tedious, to consider separately all the passages in which the words are used ; but they are used in many cases where the context seems to show that their meaning cannot be limited to that of "owner," or "freeholder," or "head landlord," whatever that may mean. The most striking of such passages is, perhaps, that to be found in section 2 (6) of the Act of 1920—"Any question arising under subsection (1), (2), or (3) of this section shall be determined on the application either of the landlord or the tenant by the County Court . . . " as qualified by section 7 (3) of the Act of 1923 :—"In subsection (6) of section 2 of the principal Act the expression 'landlord' shall, in relation to a subtenancy, be taken to include not only the person who is immediate landlord of the subtenant, but also the landlord of that person."

Other examples of the use of these words with an apparently similar meaning are to be found in section 3 (2), section 5 (1) (c), (d), (f), and (h) (as substituted by section 4 of the Act of 1923), section 11, section 14 (1) and (2), and section 15 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1920.

These sections call for no comment, and in our opinion there is nothing which indicates that the words of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 intend any different meaning. It is, indeed, to be observed that the first proviso to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 appears to assume that a tenant of a dwelling-house may also in his turn be the landlord of that dwelling-house if he sublets the whole of or any part thereof which is in itself a dwelling-house within the meaning of the principal Act.

The authorities which were reviewed and discussed by the County Court Judge do not seem to us to contain anything which is in conflict with the conclusion at which he arrived, namely, that Mrs. Wilson was "the landlord" within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923. In our opinion, the Judge's comments upon the cases of Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 360), Catto v. Curry (42 The Times L.R., 243 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 460), and Doulin v. Parcell (43 The Times L.R., 140), were apposite and unexceptionable and led him to a correct conclusion.

We are, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. Mr. Beney, for the respondent, indicated other points upon which he proposed to rely, if necessary, but, in view of the conclusion at which we have arrived on the main question, consideration of these points is unnecessary.

Leave to appeal was granted conditionally upon payment into court by the plaintiff within 21 days of the rent and mesne profits due.

PRATT v. PRATT.*

Husband and Wife—Jurisdiction of justices—Separation order discharged on ground of wife's adultery—Husband's divorce petition dismissed — Discharged order revived by justices — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), s. 7—Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 58), s. 30 (3).

The decision of a Judge of Assize on a petition for dissolution of marriage that on a specified occasion the wife did not commit adultery is that of a court of record and, after the time for appeal has expired, is conclusive against all the world. Such a decision when brought to the knowledge of the justices is a new fact on which they can revive a separation order previously revoked by them on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery on the same specified occasion.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Leicester justices on December 4, 1926, reviving a separation order granted by them to Violet Elizabeth Pratt, wife of John St. Clair Pratt, on the ground of persistent cruelty, on November 28, 1924, when the husband was ordered to pay 20s. a week for the maintenance of his wife. She was granted the custody of the child of the marriage, a girl of eleven. On July 25, 1925, the order was revoked by the justices on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery. The husband filed a petition as a poor person for the dissolution of the marriage, charging the wife with the same act of adultery as that upon which the justices had revoked the separation order. On November 5, 1926, this suit was tried at Leicester Assizes by Mr. Justice Sankey who held that the wife had not committed the adultery alleged and dismissed the petition. On December 4, 1926, the wife's summons for the revival of the separation order under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, section 30 (3), was heard by the justices. They revived the order on the ground that fresh evidence had been given and the assize judgment was binding on them.

The husband appealed, as a poor person, on the following grounds : (1) that the decision of the justices was bad in law ; (2) that they had no power to revive the order ; (3) that they admitted evidence which was not legally admissible ; and (4) that the matter was res judicata.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. W. K. Scrivener appeared for the husband, and Mr. C. E. Loseby for the wife.

The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, section 30 (3) provides :—

"Any order made either before or after the commencement of this Act by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction for the periodical payment of money may, upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the Court, be revoked, revived, or varied by a subsequent order."

Mr. SCRIVENER said that in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, section 7 was the relevant section and that gave the justices no power to revive the order. The Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, did not apply in the circumstances of this case as the evidence upon which the finding of adultery was upset was not fresh evidence, since it was available at the time of the hearing at which the original order was revoked. He referred to Colchester v. Peck (42 The Times L.R., 535 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 366) and Johnson v. Johnson (16 The Times L.R., 26 ; [1900] P., 19).

LORD MERRIVALE.—Here was a case where the husband, who was the subject of a maintenance order obtained by his wife upon grounds sufficient to support such an order, had gone before the magistrates and had convinced the Bench which was sitting that his wife had committed adultery upon a specified occasion. The justices thereupon, as they had jurisdiction to do and as they had no alternative but to do upon their finding of fact, rescinded the order for maintenance. The statutes which govern their jurisdiction empower justices, if they do not direct them, upon proof of adultery by a wife after an order for maintenance, to discharge the order.

The husband, having obtained the discharge of the order, filed a petition in this Court for dissolution of his marriage on the ground of adultery, alleging the adultery which had been found in point of fact by the justices. The decision of the justices was effective for the purpose for which it was applied, but it did not conclude the matter. The difference as between that and the decision of the learned Judge who heard the petition for divorce was that the learned Judge could make a conclusive finding, and the learned Judge after hearing the evidence tendered by the husband came to the conclusion that the wife had not committed the alleged adultery, and he so found.

Thereupon the wife was advised to proceed before the justices under the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914, section 30 (3), for an order that the revoked order of the justices should be revived. The husband was represented before the justices. The wife was able to show to the justices that it had been conclusively established beyond challenge or appeal that she had not been guilty of the alleged adultery. This was a new fact.

On reading the notes of the proceedings before the justices I find other facts, an officer of a benevolent authority casting great discredit upon the evidence of the husband on the previous occasion. Those were facts which were alleged to have occurred since the making of the previous order, but as to the fact that the wife had not committed adultery and the establishment of that fact, that was a fact newly established, and the finding of the learned Judge was itself a fact. Those matters having been brought to the notice of the justices and they having statutory jurisdiction to revive an order which had been revoked, they exercised that statutory jurisdiction.

The justices acted not only within their jurisdiction but quite properly. I may say this with regard to this magisterial jurisdiction in respect of maintenance to find women guilty of adultery, that it is only by the most jealous care on the part of the magistrates to avoid injustice that the gravest injustice can be avoided. If it was once supposed that, because an order had been discharged upon an allegation of adultery which had been held by justices to be established, the matter was closed finally once and for all, it would be to my mind a means of injustice which would need most serious attention. No such injustice has occurred in this case. The Court below has taken a reasonable course, within its jurisdiction, and I think a proper course.

The appeal, therefore, fails in my judgment.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON.—I agree.

Mr. LOSEBY.—I ask your Lordship for an order for costs.

The PRESIDENT.—Yes.

Aliens—Name—Addition of "and Co."—Offence—Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 92), s. 7 (1).

The addition of "and Co." to a name makes a different name within the meaning of s. 7 (1) of the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919, and it is therefore an offence under that section for an alien to assume or use for any purpose the name by which he was known on August 4, 1914, with the addition of "and Co."

This was a case stated by a Metropolitan magistrate.

At Marlborough-street Police Court on November 5, 1926, an information was preferred by the appellant, Edward Evans, an inspector of the Metropolitan Police, against the respondent, Pierre Piauneau, for that he, being an alien—namely, a French citizen—did on September 15, 1926, use a name other than that by which he was ordinarily known on the 4th day of August, 1914—namely, "Pierre Piauneau and Co." —for the purpose of business, contrary to section 7 (1) of the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919.

By the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919, section 7 : "(1) An alien shall not for any purpose assume or use or purport to assume or use or continue after the commencement of this Act the assumption or use of any name other than that by which he was ordinarily known on the 4th day of August, 1914.

"(2) Where any alien carries on or purports or continues to carry on, or is a member of a partnership or firm which carries on, or which purports or continues to carry on any trade or business in any name other than that under which the trade or business was carried on on the 4th day of August, 1914, he shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed to be using or purporting or continuing to use a name other than that by which he was ordinarily known on the said date. . . ."

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

The respondent was a French subject registered as such. He had resided in London since the year 1907. On January 28, 1926, the respondent commenced business at 56, Poland-street, in the county of London, in the name of Pierre Piauneau and Co., as sole agents for Great Britain and Ireland of Félix Potin of Paris, a firm of wholesale grocers. His notepaper was headed :

PIERRE PIAUNEAU AND CO.
(Pierre Piauneau).

The true name of the respondent was Pierre Piauneau, and by that name he was ordinarily known on the 4th day of August, 1914.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that these facts constituted a breach of section 7 of the Aliens Restriction (Amendment) Act, 1919.

On the part of the respondent it was contended : (1) that the words "and Co." were a mere addition which did not amount to a change of name ; (2) that section 7 (1) of the said Act applied only to an individual and not to a business ; (3) that section 7 (2) had no application because the respondent did not on the 4th day of August, 1914, carry on any business.

The magistrate was of opinion and held that the addition of the words "and Co." did not constitute a change of name within the meaning of section 7 of the above statute, but amounted merely to a change of style, and that section 7 (2) had no application to a business not existing on August 4, 1914. He accordingly dismissed the information.

Mr. Christmas Humphreys (Sir Travers Humphreys with him) appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Claude Grundy for the respondent.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a case stated by one of the learned magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis, and the point is quite a short one. The magistrate dismissed the information, and the question is whether he came to a correct decision in point of law.

The facts are not in dispute. The respondent's name is Pierre Piauneau ; he carried on business as Pierre Piauneau and Co. In order to contend that there has been no infringement it is necessary to contend that "Pierre Piauneau and Co." is the same name as "Pierre Piauneau." It seems an impossible proposition. It is the same as saying that $x+y=x$ if y is a comparatively small quantity. It seems to me manifest that "Pierre Piauneau and Co." is a different name from "Pierre Piauneau," and there was no course open to the magistrate but to convict.

The question what the penalty should be, or whether there should be any penalty at all in this case, is entirely for the magistrate.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. Although subsection (2) of section 7 does not apply as the respondent was not carrying on any business on August 4, 1914, I have come to the conclusion that the appellant was assuming or using a name other than that by which he was known on that date.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I agree. I think the words "Pierre Piauneau and Co." constitute a name. If so, it is a name other than "Pierre Piauneau." The point is a fine one.

MACNAGHTEN v. DOUGLAS.*

Medical Acts—Osteopath—Treatment—Advice—Fees—Recoverability—Medical Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. 90), s. 32.

Section 32 of the Medical Act, 1858, though it precludes an osteopath who is not a registered medical practitioner from recovering for advice, does not preclude him from recovering for treatment and services rendered, at all events where they have not been accompanied by advice.

Hall v. Trotter (38 The Times L.R., 30) followed.

Quaere, whether where advice accompanies the treatment such an osteopath can recover anything at all.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a decision of the deputy Judge of the Bloomsbury County Court. The case raised the question of the right of an osteopath to recover fees for treatment undertaken by him.

The plaintiff, Mr. Edmund Loftus Macnaghten, of 40, Weymouth-street, W., claimed £30 9s. for osteopathic treatment for nervous disability and facial neuralgia rendered by him to the wife of the defendant, Mr. Cecil Herbert Douglas, of 5, Grove-road, E.11. The defendant relied on section 32 of the Medical Act, 1858, which provides :—

"No person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any Court of law for any medical or surgical advice, attendance, or for the performance of any operation or for any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied, unless he shall prove upon the trial that he is registered under this Act."

The deputy Judge stopped the case and entered judgment for the defendant, with costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. A. C. Jackson appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Laporte Payne for the respondent.

MR. JACKSON said that the claim arose in respect of osteopathic treatment rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant's wife between March 10 and April 25, 1926. The plaintiff was a B.A. of Trinity College, Dublin, but that degree was in subjects other than medicine. He had, however, an American degree of Doctor of Osteopathy, osteopathy being a recognized profession in that country. He had no British medical degree. The plaintiff claimed in respect of manual treatment and not for advice given, the defendant's wife having been perfectly acquainted with the nature of osteopathic treatment at the time when she first visited him.

Counsel submitted that in the case of Hall v. Trotter (38 The Times L.R., 30) it had been held that, in almost exactly similar circumstances, an osteopath was entitled to recover fees for treatment rendered. The deputy Judge was, he contended, wrong in holding that section 32 of the Medical Act, 1858, applied to treatment of this kind.

MR. PAYNE submitted that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover inasmuch as he had usurped the functions of a medical man. The plaintiff's occupation was analogous to that of a masseur who might be able to recover for treatment in certain circumstances, but not in a case where he had been called upon to give advice.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—This is an appeal from a decision of the learned deputy Judge of the Bloomsbury County Court, by which he decided that the claim of the plaintiff in this action was barred by the operation of section 32 of the Medical Act of 1858. The plaintiff is an osteopath, and it appears that he had taken his degree at Trinity College, Dublin, not in surgery or medicine, but in Arts. He gave evidence that he had studied osteology in America with a view of becoming an osteopath, that he had received a diploma from an American school or college of osteopathy, and that he had thereupon started in practice as an osteopath at 40, Weymouth-street, W. He said that his degree was taken in September, 1923, and he agreed that any qualification in the profession of osteopathy is not recognized in this country. The particulars of claim are expressed in these terms :— "The plaintiff's claim is for £30 9s. for professional services rendered by the plaintiff as an osteopath to the defendant's wife from March 10, 1926, to April 25, 1926"; and the plaintiff claims that on March 10, 1926, the defendant's wife came to him and said that she desired osteological treatment, that he thereupon examined her and came to a certain conclusion in regard to what she was suffering from and what was likely to prove remedial, and that he thereupon treated her according to the principles of osteopathy which he had studied. He treated the bones in the neck and other bones and the lumbar region, and he continued this treatment up to the last date mentioned in the particulars of claim, April 25, 1926. He said that the lady gave him a general description of her symptoms, that is to say, that she was not feeling well, and so on, and particulars of her sensations in the morning, and upon that he came to the conclusion that the treatment was likely to prove remedial. It would appear from what he said that he not only came to that conclusion, and put it into practice, but that he acquainted her with his conclusions, and advised that the kind of treatment which he was about to carry out was treatment which would be remedial.

It appears that the case was originally set down for hearing on a day on which it was not reached, and up to that stage the defence under section 32 of the Medical Act, 1858, which was ultimately relied upon, and which prevailed, had not been raised ; but before the case came on again notice had been given that the defence would be raised, and when the case was before the learned deputy County Court Judge he allowed an amendment to be made by the defendant setting up this statutory defence. The question which we have to decide is whether in these circumstances the plaintiff's claim is or is not wholly barred by section 32 of the Medical Act of 1858.

Now the question is undoubtedly one of some importance, and at first sight one which might appear to present some little difficulty ; but the very question raised in this case has already been raised and decided in this Court in the case of Hall v. Trotter (38 The Times L.R., 30). That was a case in which there was an appeal from a decision of His Honour Judge Bray, at the Bloomsbury County Court, in which the plaintiff sued the defendant for £58 17s., the amount of his fee for osteopathic treatment given to the defendant, his wife, and his daughter during the year 1920 ; and the female plaintiff in that case was in much the same position as the plaintiff in the present case, for she was a lady who had a diploma from an American college of osteopathy, but was not registered in England as a medical practitioner, though she was carrying on business as an osteopath and treating people for reward in that behalf. In that case the question before the learned County Court Judge was the same question as that which is raised here. It is perhaps to be regretted that such a case only appears in The Times Law Reports, and that the facts are not more fully set out than they are in that report. They are indeed very scanty in what we are invited to regard as an important part of the case, namely, whether any diagnosis or advice was given by the plaintiff as distinguished from the actual manual or manipulative treatment, and, if so, how far that diagnosis and advice went. A feature of the case, of which it seems to me that sight ought not to be lost, is that the learned County Court Judge held, according to the report, that osteopathic treatment was not within the Act, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. There was then an appeal to this Court, a Court consisting of Mr. Justice Horridge and Mr. Justice Shearman, who dismissed that appeal, and it would appear from the report that in substance those learned Judges listened to the same kind of argument to which we have listened. In the result, Mr. Justice Horridge, after referring to the section of the Medical Act, 1858, and the Judge's finding of fact—the cardinal finding of fact being, according to this report, that osteopathic treatment is not within the Act—said : "In his view of the findings of the Judge the plaintiff did not give any advice. She gave certain treatment to the bodies of these three persons. He declined to be led into definitions. He was satisfied that this case did not fall within the Act. The judgment must therefore be affirmed and the appeal dismissed." Mr. Justice Shearman agreed, and said that "they had only to consider what this woman did ; she did not profess to advise anyone what was the matter, but, after having got a diploma from a college in America, she applied her knowledge of anatomy to help her to determine the part of the body to which she should apply the treatment which she had been specifically called in to give. In applying the section the Judge must bear in mind the recital in the Act." It would appear that that is not improbably a slip on the part of the reporter for "preamble," for the reference must be to the preamble of the Act. Mr. Justice Shearman continued : "He thought that the Judge here was right, but he was far from saying that anyone who chose to call himself an osteopath could charge for any service which he chose to render." Now Mr. Jackson, who has argued this case for the appellant, said that the attitude which he took up was that in the present case the whole claim for the £30 9s. was, as expressed in the particulars of claim, "for professional services rendered as an osteopath," and that there might be a question whether, if the charges were analysed, or capable of analysis, and if it were proved that any part of these charges was for advice, the plaintiff might not be in a position to recover them by reason of this section of the Medical Act, 1858. What he complained of was that, in the circumstances of this case, the learned deputy County Court Judge stopped the case after the evidence to which I have referred had been given, and said that by the operation of that section of this Act the plaintiff could not recover anything at all, and that his claim was wholly barred.

Speaking for myself, in view of the decision in Hall v. Trotter (supra), though it must be admitted that it would have been much more satisfactory if the report had been fuller and more detailed alike as to the facts and as to the judgment, it really is not open to this Court to do otherwise than follow the decision of the learned Judges who constituted the Court on that occasion. In the result, in my view, this case ought to be sent back for a new trial on the ground that, apart from any question whether any charges for advice as distinguished from treatment or services may be recoverable, the deputy Judge was wrong in saying that no part of these charges could be recovered. Therefore the only course open to us is to send the case back in order that there may be a new trial.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.—I am of the same opinion.

I must say, had it not been for the decision in Hall v. Trotter (38 The Times L.R., 30), I should have thought there was a very strong argument in support of the judgment of the learned deputy County Court Judge. It is quite true that there are points on which the facts are distinguishable, and in particular the matter to which attention was called in the course of the argument, that in this case it appears that the plaintiff gave certain advice to the defendant's wife. It is very difficult to imagine any case of this kind in which some advice would not be given. It seems undesirable in view of that decision to distinguish this case on a narrow ground, and on the whole I think we are doing what we ought to do if we follow the case of Hall v. Trotter (supra), and hold, in the circumstances of this case, that the learned deputy Judge was not right in declining to proceed further with the case and in deciding that the whole of the plaintiff's claim was barred by the Act.

I express no opinion whether it is possible in the interests of either party to split up the case into treatment and advice, and I content myself with saying that I agree that the case must go back.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—I should like to associate myself with the remark that my brother has expressed. I also desire to express no opinion upon the question whether this case is or is not capable of any such analysis.

Leave to appeal was granted.

JAMES DURNFORD AND SONS, LIMITED v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Contract — Indemnity — Undertaking to indemnify against all claims—Whether inclusive of claims by the persons giving the undertaking—Claim for negligence—Whether the damage arose out of such negligence.

The plaintiffs took a lease of premises from the defendant railway company, and, by an agreement supplemental to the lease, the defendants gave the plaintiffs permission, on certain terms, to use for the transport of materials a portable gangway which could be moved over certain of the defendants' railway lines. One of the terms was that the plaintiffs "agree and undertake to indemnify the said [railway] company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway." When the plaintiffs were using the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line, and the gangway was destroyed. In an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty the defendants denied liability and pleaded the aforesaid term of the supplemental agreement. On a preliminary point as to the construction of the agreement,

Held, that although the words "all claims whatsoever" included a claim arising out of negligence on the part of the defendants' servants, and although, even if such negligence might have been the cause of the accident, the damage "arose out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway," yet the undertaking was only one to hold the defendants harmless against claims by third parties, and the preliminary point must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

This case, placed for argument in the Special Paper, raised a question as to the construction of an agreement.

Mr. Wilfrid Lewis and Mr. J. A. Stainton appeared for the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company; and Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. E. H. C. Wethered appeared for the plaintiffs.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for negligence, and an order had been made that before dealing with the claim on the facts a preliminary point of law, turning on the true construction of an agreement between the parties, should be tried before the Judge taking the Special Paper.

The facts out of which the case arose were as follow:—

In 1914 the Great Western Railway Company let certain premises to the plaintiffs at Bristol. The plaintiffs were contractors, and, in the course of their business, required to move large quantities of materials by rail. To facilitate the transport of materials they constructed a portable gangway which could be moved over certain railway lines belonging to the Great Western Railway Company. The railway company gave them permission to use the said gangway upon certain terms, which were embodied in a memorandum drawn up in 1921 and indorsed on the plaintiffs' lease.

The plaintiffs proceeded to make use of the gangway, and on August 27, 1926, they were using it for the purpose of discharging a load of lime from a motor-lorry into a railway truck when shunting operations were in progress on the railway. While the lorry was on the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line over which it was standing, with the result that the gangway was struck and destroyed and the motor-lorry was thrown to the ground and so badly damaged that it was rendered useless.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for negligence and/or breach of duty. The Great Western Railway Company denied liability, and relied on a condition in the memorandum of 1921. The condition was in the following words:—

"[The plaintiffs] agree and undertake to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway. . . ."

Mr. WILFRID LEWIS submitted that the expression "claims and demands or liability whatsoever" covered every kind of claim whether made by third parties or by the plaintiffs themselves. "Whatsoever" was equivalent to "however caused and by whomsoever made." The wording of the condition showed that the railway company intended to protect themselves against that very kind of accident. In view of the course of business it was most probable that if any accident occurred at all it would be the plaintiffs who would be damaged. The words "in connexion with" were very wide and, though there seemed to be no authority as to their true construction, he submitted that they must cover a claim by the plaintiffs themselves.

* Reported by W. B. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He referred to Joseph Travers and Sons, Limited v. Cooper (30 The Times L.R., 703 ; [1915] 1 K.B., 73) ; Rutter v. Palmer (38 The Times L.R., 555 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 87) ; and Ashendon v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (5 Ex. D., 190).

Mr. Rayner Goddard submitted that the contract was one of indemnity and of indemnity only. In law a contract of indemnity was a contract by A to hold B harmless against a claim made by C and did not release B from any liability which he might be under to A. The words of the clause in question were not apt to release the railway company from a claim by the plaintiffs themselves. The words must be construed strictly against the company and it was for them to show that the words were apt to give the protection desired.

Further, the damage in this case did not arise out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the gangway. The real cause, the causa causans, of the accident was the negligence of the servants of the railway company. The word "whatsoever" in the condition was only comprehensive of the claims, not of the causes of claims.

Mr. Wilfrid Lewis, in reply, submitted that the railway company was in the position of a landlord and was not an insurer. If the words of the condition were to be construed strictly as Mr. Goddard contended, then the condition really was an insurance granted by the plaintiffs and must be read strictly against them as it would be against an insurance company. The words "arising out of" might refer only to proximate causes, but the further words "in connexion with" must have some meaning given to them and were wide enough to cover this case.

He referred to Coxe v. Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 664 ; [1916] 2 K.B., 629).

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that the action had been brought for negligence on the part of the railway company's servants,' and, besides raising other defences, the railway company relied on a condition in the supplemental agreement of 1921. The company contended that even if the accident was due to the negligence of their servants the plaintiffs could not recover because they had agreed to hold the company indemnified against claims for damage to property arising out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway.

The case involved three questions of construction, each of them very difficult owing to the slovenly and inartistic language employed. The first question was : Did the undertaking to "indemnify" include the abandonment of any claim which the plaintiffs themselves might have against the company ? The second was : Did the words "all claims whatsoever" include a claim arising out of negligence by the servants of the railway company ? The third was : Did the damage in this case arise out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway ?

Dealing with the latter questions first, he thought that the words "all claims whatsoever" were wide enough to cover claims arising out of negligence on the part of the railway servants. The case seemed most near to Rutter v. Palmer (38 The Times L.R., 555 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 87), where the words employed were held to protect against negligence. He also thought that the damage in this case was damage to property arising out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway. But the first question still remained for consideration. On the whole, he had come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were right and that the undertaking was only one to hold harmless against claims by third parties. Prima facie, the word "indemnify" meant "insure against third party risks," and the word was inapt if the intention was to exclude a claim by the plaintiffs themselves. At the least the expression was ambiguous and must be construed contra proferentem. The result was, therefore, that he must decide the preliminary point in favour of the plaintiffs.

On the application of Mr. Wilfrid Lewis leave to appeal was given.

LEIGH v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue—Supertax—Arrears of interest on bonds—Several years' arrears paid in one sum—Whether income of year in which payment was made—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 5 (3) (c).

Where a taxpayer purchases bearer bonds on which the interest for several years is in arrear and his purchase confers upon him the right to the arrears, and several years' arrears are subsequently paid to him in one sum, the whole of that sum forms for the purpose of supertax, under s. 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, part of his income for the year in which payment was received.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

At a meeting of the Special Commissioners held on September 17, 1924, Mr. A. H. Leigh, the appellant, appealed against an assessment to supertax in the sum of £3,603 for the year ending April 5, 1923, made upon him under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts. The sole question which was raised by the appeal and upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether certain arrears of interest received by the appellant in August, 1921, in respect of mortgage bonds of the Mexican Electric Light Company, Limited (which interest had accrued due and was payable on dates prior to the purchase of the bonds by the appellant), ought to be included in the computation of his income for the purposes of supertax for the year ending April 5, 1923.

The appellant made purchases to a total amount of $25,000 between August 9 and August 16, 1918, through a firm of brokers on the London Stock Exchange, of 5 per cent. mortgage bonds to bearer of the Mexican Electric Light Company, Limited, a company incorporated in Canada. The interest on those bonds was due and payable half-yearly on January 1 and July 1 in each year, and coupons for each half-year's interest were attached to the bonds, each coupon bearing the half-yearly date on which such interest became due.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Owing to the unsettled condition of affairs in Mexico the company had not been able to pay any half-year's interest since that which became due and payable on July 1, 1914, and the coupons for the interest which had become due and payable on January 1 and July 1 in each year from 1915 onwards were still attached to the bonds purchased by the appellant. In accordance with the rules of the London Stock Exchange they became his property at the dates when he made the purchases.

The company resumed payment of interest in 1921. In May, 1921, a scheme of arrangement was put forward by a committee which had been formed to protect the interests of the bondholders of the company and other allied companies. Under that scheme, which was approved by the bondholders in June, 1921, and sanctioned by the Canadian Courts in July, 1921, it was arranged that concessions should be made by the bondholders as to the payments due to be made to a sinking fund for redemption of the bonds and as to the date of maturity of the bonds. The arrears of interest were to be paid to the bondholders, as to the coupons due from January 1, 1915, to July 1, 1919, inclusive, immediately upon the sanction of the Court to the scheme; as to the coupons due January 1, 1920, and July 1, 1920, on or before June 30, 1922; and as to the coupon due January 1, 1921, on or before June 30, 1923. The payment of current interest was to be resumed with the payment of the coupon due July 1, 1921. In accordance with the scheme arrears of interest up to and including that due on July 1, 1919, were paid to the bondholders in August, 1921.

In the case of the bonds belonging to the appellant the arrears of interest due on the coupons dated January 1, 1915, to July 1, 1919, inclusive, and the interest on the coupon dated July 1, 1921, were collected by the Westminster Bank, Limited, on behalf of the appellant in August, 1921. Income-tax at the rate of 6s. in the £, being the rate in force for the year ending April 5, 1922, was deducted from that interest and paid over to the Revenue authorities in accordance with the provisions of Rule 7 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The balance of the interest was credited to the appellant's account at the Westminster Bank, Limited. The appellant was not required by the contracts of purchase to pay over any part of that interest to the persons from whom he had purchased the bonds, and he did not in fact do so.

It was contended by the appellant that the interest which had accrued due and was payable on January 1, 1915, and on succeeding half-yearly dates down to and including July 1, 1918 (in arrear at the time when he purchased the bonds), had not arisen or accrued to him; that the interest was not receivable by him, but was receivable by the vendors of the bonds; that such interest had been purchased with his capital and was in his hands capital and not income; that the fact that the vendors of the bonds had sold the right to interest which had accrued to them and which had become payable to them before the sale did not transfer to the appellant any liability for supertax in respect thereof; and that such arrears of interest ought not to be included in the computation of his income for the purposes of assessment to supertax.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown, inter alia, that the whole of the interest received by the appellant in August, 1921, formed part of his income for the year in which payment was received from the company—namely, the year ending April 5, 1922, and was properly included in the computation of his income for the purposes of assessment to supertax for the following year—namely, the year ending April 5, 1923.

The Special Commissioners held that the sum of £1,858 7s. 11d. paid to the appellant as interest on the bonds in August, 1921, was part of his income for supertax purposes for the year ending April 5, 1923, and confirmed the assessment.

Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the appellant in August, 1918, bought a number of bonds of a company incorporated under the laws of Canada. The bonds bore interest, but at the time of his purchase the interest was unpaid since July 1, 1914. After his purchase those arrears remained unpaid, and the succeeding instalments of interest remained unpaid until the middle of 1921, when a scheme was adopted and sanctioned by the Court in Canada in that year. In consideration of certain terms as to sinking fund and repayment, the company undertook to pay the arrears of interest, and they at once paid the arrears up to 1919, as the scheme provided.

The appellant, therefore, soon after the decision of the Court, was paid the arrears for 1914-19, inclusive, subject to deduction of income-tax before payment. The Revenue authorities had assessed him to supertax for the next year on the basis that all that income was the income of 1921, and, therefore, assessable to supertax for 1922-23. That assessment was objected to on the ground that those payments were "received," but not "receivable" in 1921; that they were "receivable" in 1914 and subsequent years, and, therefore, the liability to supertax belonged to those years, and the sellers of the bonds were in the position of having the income "receivable" down to 1918.

The Attorney-General took a point that, even assuming that that was the correct construction of the statute, on the facts of this case this interest only became payable under the order of the Court—i.e., in 1921. He (his Lordship) did not think that that was a good point. It was "receivable" at each date as the coupons fell due; it continued "receivable." The Court did not fix a new date, but provided that there should be no more delay. It was not suggested that the old debts were merged in a new debt. The payments of interest due on particular dates were made under the order because they were already due on those dates.

That conclusion brought him to the real point, which was of great importance. The taxable income for supertax was the total income for the previous year, and one had to find out what that was. If it had been directly assessed to income-tax that settled the matter, but if it had not it remained to be dealt with. Mr. King said that the matter was settled by section 5 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

That section, in his (his Lordship's) judgment, was designed to eliminate any question of accrual or gradual growth of the income. In certain cases for income-tax purposes when tax was deducted before receipt it was deducted according to the rate in force when the money accrued, which in some cases meant an average rate. But for supertax purposes there was to be one rate only. It was intended in the case of supertax to avoid any variation in the rate. In doing so the statute had used the word "receivable" —and that was the whole trouble and that was what Mr. King had fastened upon.

It was to be remembered that, for income-tax purposes, "receivability" without receipt was nothing. Before a good debt which was due was paid there was no such thing as income-tax upon it.

The meaning of the section must be "receivability," speaking of a debt which had been received, and meant the date on which it was paid as distinct from the date on which it was accruing. He did not know if he had expressed it properly, or if it could really be expressed.

He would not have had any doubt about it but for a Scottish case which caused him considerable doubt. In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Earl of Haddington (8 Tax Cas. 711), a man who had come into some estates found them burdened with payment of a jointure to his mother. Owing to some dispute as to the amount he did not pay it in the first year, but paid two years together in the second year. It was held that he could not deduct the whole payment in the second year, but must spread it over the two years. It seemed to follow that "payable" and "receivable" were correlatives and that the mother was entitled to spread the receipt over two years. But the point was never argued there and never occurred to anyone. The whole question was the liability of the Earl.

He (his Lordship) thought that if the point had been taken, and if his judgment in the present case was correct, the decision in that earlier case would have had to be the other way. But in view of the terrible confusion which would arise if he accepted the appellant's arguments, he thought that he must have courage and dismiss the appeal, with costs.

TEMPERANCE LOAN FUND v. ERWOOD.*

Practice—Costs—County court—Moneylenders' action — Harsh and unconscionable transaction — Excessive interest — Transaction reopened—Reduction of claim—Discretion to deprive plaintiffs of costs — County Courts Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 43), s. 113—Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 51), s. 1 (1).

In an action by moneylenders in the county court for money lent and interest, where the Judge is satisfied that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable and the interest excessive, and where, after reopening the transaction, he gives judgment for the plaintiffs for a reduced amount, he has a discretion to deprive the plaintiffs of costs.

This was the plaintiffs' appeal from a decision of the Judge of the Wandsworth County Court, who had refused to give costs to moneylenders who had recovered a sum of £26 10s. on a claim on a promissory note for £50.

The plaintiffs, the Temperance Loan Fund, who were registered moneylenders carrying on business at 12A, Station-parade, Balham, S.W., sued the defendant, Mr. William Leycester Erwood, of 12, Stamford Brook-mansions, on a promissory note for £50. The original transaction between the parties was a loan of £30 in February, 1925. From that sum 15s. was deducted or retained by the plaintiffs for expenses, and in consideration of the loan the defendant gave the plaintiffs his promissory note for £50. The note was twice renewed, and an action was brought on the third note. Before action the defendant had paid altogether £24. No money was paid into Court and there was no counterclaim.

The defendant relied on section 1 (1) of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, alleging that the interest charged was harsh and unconscionable. On each renewal a further 15s. was charged for expenses, which the Judge found were never incurred.

The Judge, being satisfied that the transaction which culminated in the promissory note sued on was harsh and unconscionable, and that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent was excessive, reopened the transaction and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for £26 10s. That sum, according to his calculation, gave the plaintiffs interest at the rate of about 50 per cent. on their advance. He gave no costs, stating as his reason that the defendant had succeeded in getting the transaction reopened.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Charles Bray and Mr. E. Terrell appeared for the appellants. The respondent appeared in person.

At the request of MR. JUSTICE ACTON, the considered judgment of the Court was read by MR. JUSTICE TALBOT.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT, after stating the facts, continued: The plaintiffs appealed to this Court on the ground that the county court Judge had no power to deprive them of costs. It was said that they had a good legal cause of action to which there was in law no defence; that they had no alternative but to bring this case into Court; and that, in the absence of any payment into Court, it was impossible for them to do anything but sue for the whole sum due on the note.

It was said that if a defendant who has made a contract good at law seeks and obtains discretionary relief from the full obligation of it under the special provisions of a statute, he should do so on the terms of paying the costs necessarily incurred by the plaintiff in recovering what is due. On the other hand, the bulk of the costs was, no doubt, incurred in the discussion of the question whether the defendant had made a case for relief under the Act and to what extent it was just to relieve him. The Judge appears to have considered that, the bulk of the costs having been so incurred, it was not right to give the whole of the costs to the defendant. There is obviously much to be said on each side of the question, and we have no doubt that the Judge fully considered it. If he had a discretion in the matter, there is nothing to justify us in interfering with the conclusion to which he came. The appellants' case is that he had no discretion, but that he was bound by law to give them their costs.

Though the Moneylenders Act, 1900, has been in force nearly 27 years, and though we do not doubt that in many cases judgment has been given without costs both in the High Court and in the county court where the moneylender has recovered a substantial sum, this point has, so far as we know, never come up for decision. And it is remarkable that the Act itself is silent in regard to costs.

The matter of costs in county courts is regulated by section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which provides :—

"All the costs of any action or matter in the Court, not herein otherwise provided for, shall be paid by or apportioned between the parties in such manner as the Court shall think just, and in default of any special direction shall abide the event of the action or matter. . . ."

This clearly contemplates that it is within the power of the Judge to give a special direction in regard to costs and it may be taken that his power to do so is generally the same as that of a Judge of the High Court in a case tried without a jury. In such cases he has discretion, but the discretion must be exercised judicially—that is to say, there must be some grounds upon which, acting judicially, he is justified in making an exception to the ordinary rule.

Most of the reported cases upon this subject have turned upon the question what, on trial with a jury in the High Court, amounts to "good cause," within the meaning of Order LXV., Rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, justifying an order of the Judge by which the costs do not follow the event. In such cases the powers of a Judge, so far as they differ from his powers at a trial without a jury, are less ; and therefore it is safe to take the language of judgments referring to cases tried with a jury as being at least not too wide for application to cases tried without a jury ; for example, the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in Forster v. Farquhar (9 The Times L.R., 338 ; [1893] 1 Q.B., 564, at p. 568).

On these principles it seems to us impossible to say that where a plaintiff makes a claim which the Court, acting under statutory powers, materially reduces on the ground that it is in respect of a transaction harsh and unconscionable and involves a charge of excessive interest, the Judge has not, in the absence of some enactment to the contrary, power to refuse to impose upon the defendant the payment of the plaintiff's costs. We may observe that one of the examples of good cause for a special order in regard to costs, given in Jones v. Curling (13 Q.B.D., 262, at p. 268), is the fact that a plaintiff "has made an exorbitant claim by carelessness or recklessness."

It was further argued that, even if the Judge had power to give a special direction in this case, he should, instead of making the order which he did make, have apportioned the costs and have given the general costs of the action to the plaintiffs and the costs incidental to the question whether the transaction should be reopened under the Money-lenders Act, 1900, to the defendant. There are no issues in the technical sense in the county court, but costs can be apportioned according to the way in which different questions are decided. See Dunn v. South-Eastern and Chatham Railway Company (19 The Times L.R., 161 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 358). We do not say that it was not within the power of the Judge to make some such apportionment in the present case, but we do not think he was bound to do so, and there are considerations which might well lead him to the conclusion that the order which he has made is the more appropriate in the circumstances.

In our opinion the contention that the Judge had exceeded his powers in refusing to allow the plaintiffs their costs cannot be supported, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

AKTIESELSKABET DAMPSKIBS STEINSTAD v. W. PEARSON AND CO.*

Ship—Charterparty—Discharge—Total expense paid by shipowners — Mistaken belief as to effect of custom—Settlement with charterers on this basis—Subsequent judicial decision as to real effect of custom—Partial liability of charterers — Action by shipowners against charterers to recover charterers' share of expense.

The plaintiffs, as owners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to bring to West Hartlepool a cargo of pit props, to be "taken from alongside at the charterers' risk and expense as customary." The custom at West Hartlepool varied according as the discharge was to be into railway wagons or on to the quay. In this case the discharge was into railway wagons, and the props, after being swung over the wagons by a crane, had to be stowed in the wagons. The plaintiffs and the defendants settled accounts on the basis that the plaintiffs were liable for the whole cost of discharge, but afterwards it was held in The Rensfjell (40 The Times L.R., 458) that by the custom at West Hartlepool from the moment when the cargo was released from the sling the cost of handling it and stowing it in the wagons fell on the charterers. The shipowners, therefore, in this action sought to recover from the charterers such share of the cost of discharge as ought to have been borne by the latter, the claim being for breach of contract in not providing the men to stow the cargo, and alternatively for money paid to the defendants' use.

Held, that as both parties believed it to be the duty of the plaintiffs to provide the men for stowage and therefore the defendants had not committed a breach of contract, and as the plaintiffs had made a voluntary payment under the mistaken belief that they were liable to make it, the action failed.

In this action the plaintiffs, Aktieselskabet Dampskibs Steinstad, as shipowners, claimed from the defendants, W. Pearson and Co., as charterers, a sum of money as damages for breach of contract, or, alternatively, as money paid to the use of the defendants or at their request.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Guy Cooper for the defendants.

In August, 1921, the plaintiffs, as owners, chartered a steamer, the Steinstad, to the defendants to go to Finland and bring a cargo of pit props to West Hartlepool. The charterparty was in the Scanfin form and contained, inter alia, a provision that the cargo should be "taken from alongside at the charterers' risk and expense as customary." It also contained a provision that the shipowners should employ stevedores nominated by the charterers.

The Steinstad arrived at West Hartlepool on October 3, 1921, and the local agents of the plaintiffs instructed certain stevedores nominated by the defendants to discharge the cargo. The customary method of discharge at West Hartlepool varied according as the discharge was to be into railway wagons or on to the quay, and the custom was fully stated in the judgment of the President in The Rensfjell (40 The Times L.R., 458, at p. 459).

In this case the discharge was to be into railway wagons, and that the wagons should be properly loaded it was necessary that two men should be placed in a wagon to stow the props which were lifted out of the steamer's hold and swung over the wagon by a crane. The stevedores duly carried out the discharge. After it was completed accounts were settled between the plaintiffs, their local agents, and the defendants, and the whole matter then passed out of mind.

Subsequently, in 1922, the case of The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) raised a doubt as to the liability of the shipowner to pay the whole cost of discharging. Other cases followed on the point, and, in 1924, the respective rights and liabilities of shipowner and charterer at the port of West Hartlepool were made clear by The Rensfjell (supra).

It then became clear that where discharge was made into railway wagons the duty of the shipowner was to sling the cargo out from the ship over the wagon, and that from the moment when the sling was loosened and the cargo was released in the wagon the cost of handling it and stowing it properly in the wagon must be paid by the charterer.

In this case the stevedores had sent in an account for £509 odd to cover the whole process of discharge, and the plaintiffs had paid the amount believing at the time, as the defendants also believed, that the whole cost should properly fall on the shipowners. But now that subsequent litigation had shown that part of the cost ought to have been borne by the charterers the plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendants the amount which the defendants ought to have paid as their share of the cost. The actual figure was not material, the only question for the Court being whether the defendants were under any legal liability.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, after stating the facts, said that the plaintiffs were claiming for breach of contract, or, alternatively, for money paid to the use of the defendants or at their request. As to the first point, it was suggested that the defendants committed a breach of contract by not providing the necessary two men to stow the cargo in the railway wagons. But the reason why they did not have the men there was that both they and the plaintiffs themselves thought at the time that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to provide them, and the plaintiffs actually did provide them. In those circumstances it was quite impossible to hold that the defendants had committed a breach of contract.

On the second head of claim, that the money had been paid to the use of the defendants or at their request, cases such as Bleaden v. Charles (7 Bing., 246) and Pownal v. Ferrand (6 B. and C., 439) showed that where a person was compelled to pay a sum of money for which another person was legally liable he could recover the amount from that other person. But alongside that principle was the equally clear principle that a person who of his own free will paid the debt of another did not acquire any right of action against that other. That was clear from Leigh v. Dickeson (15 Q.B.D., 60) and North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (67 L.J., Q.B., 972).

In his judgment the payment made by the plaintiffs in this case was a purely voluntary payment. No doubt if they had known the law as it was laid down in the subsequent cases they would not have made it, or would have only made it subject to a reservation of their rights. But as matters were they made a voluntary payment under the mistaken belief that they were under a liability to make it, and there was no legal ground on which they could now recover the money from the defendants. There must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

COLLINS v. H. WHITEWAY AND CO., LIMITED.*

Defamation—Libel—Privilege—Absolute privilege—Unemployment insurance—Proceedings before Court of Referees—Letter written to official of Ministry of Labour—Whether part of proceeding before a judicial tribunal—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 11.

A letter written by an employer to the Divisional Controller of the Ministry of Labour on the subject of an employee's claim to unemployment benefit, in regard to which the decision of the Court of Referees under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, has not been promulgated, although it has been arrived at, is not absolutely privileged, and therefore is actionable, if defamatory and written with malice, inasmuch as the Court of Referees, though they have to bring a judicial mind to bear on the performance of their duties, are nevertheless acting administratively and are not a body deciding between parties to a judicial proceeding, and as consequently such a letter cannot be said to form part of the proceedings before a tribunal acting in a manner similar to the procedure of a Court of justice.

His Lordship delivered his considered judgment in this case, in which the jury on May 13, 1927, awarded the plaintiff £150 damages in respect of a libel contained in a letter of July 17, 1926, which they found the defendants wrote with malice. The defendants succeeded on the other issues.

The action was brought by Miss Louisa J. Collins, of 16, Bolney-street, Clapham, who, suing by Mr. William James Collins, her next friend, claimed from her late employers, Henry Whiteway and Co., Limited, cider manufacturers, of Whimple, Devonshire, and Albert-embankment, Vauxhall, damages for alleged malicious prosecution, false imprisonment, and libel.

* Reported by W. E. Hurt, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants denied that they acted maliciously or without reasonable cause in prosecuting the plaintiff, and that she was falsely imprisoned. They admitted publication of the alleged libels, but they denied that the words complained of were defamatory and pleaded privilege.

Mr. E. J. C. Neep and Mr. G. A. Edinger appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. St. John Micklethwait, K.C., for the defendants.

The plaintiff was a girl of 18 and was formerly in the employment of the defendants. On June 7, 1926, she and others were charged with stealing tin foil. Mr. Henderson, the defendants' works manager at Vauxhall, gave evidence, and in the middle of his cross-examination the magistrate stopped the case, and the plaintiff and the others were discharged.

The plaintiff had been dismissed from her employment, and she subsequently called at the Brixton labour exchange for unemployment pay, and the exchange, having been informed that she had been dismissed, sent to the defendants the following request for information: "Will you please furnish your observations on the applicant's statement overleaf, giving any further particulars regarding the termination of her employment which may assist the Court of Referees to arrive at a decision in this case? Was this her first offence? Had she prior to dismissal been warned against a repetition of the offence?"

To this Mr. Henderson replied on behalf of the defendants as follows:—

"July 13, 1926.

"The Divisional Controller, Ministry of Labour, Employment and Insurance Department, 59-63, Queen's-gardens, Bayswater.

"Dear Sir,—The charge before your committee is 'misconduct—wasting and taking valuable foil belonging to the company.'

"Our forewoman states that she has frequently warned the girls not to waste foil, and the claimant must have heard these warnings, but it does not seem to be material whether she did or not.

"As regards taking new foil, the claimant admitted this in the presence of Detective-Sergeant Smith and the writer. The foil taken is costly (about 3s. 3d. to 4s. 3d. per lb.), and was smuggled out without the knowledge of the company, and the claimant must have known she was stealing it.

"As soon as we became aware of what was going on we called in the police.

"We are not bound to warn our employees against theft.

"A charge of stealing foil was preferred against the claimant and three others at Westminster police-court.

"After the magistrate had addressed the prisoners and, in our view, admonished and warned them, he dismissed them.

"Although the claimant has issued a writ for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, this does not affect the matter.

"We are resisting the writ, and if we had anticipated it we would have appealed against the magistrate's decision.

"In any event we press the charge which is before your committee, and the writer will endeavour to attend the Court on July 15 at 2 p.m.

"Yours faithfully,

"H. Whiteway and Co., Ltd.,

"J. Henderson, Works Manager."

The plaintiff's case was considered by the Court of Referees, and, after they had arrived at their decision but before it had been promulgated, the defendants on July 17, 1926, wrote the following letter:—

"The Divisional Controller, Ministry of Labour.

"Dear Sir,

"Unemployment Claim—Miss L. Collins, Brixton.

"With reference to your inquiry form dated July 12 and our letter of July 13, you will gather from the correspondence and the evidence given at the Court of Referees that this is one of four cases of dismissal in which we have the following:—

"(1) The seizure by us of a quantity of foil on the premises of a local metal merchant.

"(2) The arrest of four employees for theft of foil and of the receiver of the foil.

"(3) A magistrate's decision which was obviously not in accordance with the evidence or of the prisoners' admission of guilt.

"(4) Failure on our part to realize the gravity of the situation and omission to give notice of appeal.

"(5) An attempt by certain of the parties concerned to make capital out of what was evidently a faulty decision.

"In compliance with your request our works manager (Mr. J. Henderson) attended the Court of Referees and gave evidence.

"We understand also that Miss Collins attended the Court and again admitted having taken foil.

"We look for a verdict in accordance with the evidence and admission of guilt, unbiased by any feeling of compassion or by any improper suggestions that the claimant should have been warned.

"We are not in any doubt as to what the result ought to be, but please inform us as to the decision of the Court of Referees.

"Yours faithfully,

"H. Whiteway and Co., Ltd.

"Secretary."

The Court of Referees informed the plaintiff that they had recommended that she should be disallowed benefit for three, instead of six, weeks. Thereupon she appealed to the umpire, denying that she had been guilty of the alleged misconduct, and the umpire allowed her appeal, with the result that she was allowed benefit.

His Lordship asked the jury to answer the following questions:—

1. Did the plaintiff admit having taken any tin foil other than waste?

2. Did the defendants take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case?

3. Did the defendants honestly believe the case which they laid before the magistrate?

After an absence of about an hour the jury returned into Court and said that they could not agree upon answers to the first two questions, but that they could upon the third, the answer to which was in the affirmative.

His Lordship said that in view of that answer—that the defendants honestly believed the case which they laid before the magistrate—he did not think that there was any evidence of malice to go to the jury with regard to the alleged malicious prosecution, and he ruled accordingly.

That left only the alleged libels of July 13 and 17, 1926, and the question for the jury was whether in writing the letters of those dates or either of them the defendants were actuated by any indirect motive or whether they acted honestly and without malice.

His Lordship then asked the jury to answer the following further questions:—

Were the letters of July 13 and 17, or either and which of them, written with malice?

Damages with regard to the letters of (a) July 13, (b) July 17 ?

The jury having retired,

Mr. BIRKETT submitted that the two letters were absolutely privileged, having been written in the course of judicial proceedings.

Mr. NEEP argued that the Court of Referees was an administrative and not a judicial body. He pointed out that the persons before the Court could not be represented by solicitor or counsel, and that the parties in the present action were not before the Court, which had simply to decide whether or not the claimant was entitled to unemployment pay.

The jury found that the letter of July 13 was written without malice, and that the letter of July 17 was written with malice, and they awarded the plaintiff £150 damages in respect of that.

Mr. NEEP asked for judgment for the plaintiff for the £150, with the costs to which she was entitled.

Mr. BIRKETT asked for the costs on the issues of false imprisonment and malicious prosecution and the alleged libel on which the defendants had succeeded.

His LORDSHIP said that the plaintiff claimed damages for (1) false imprisonment, (2) malicious prosecution, (3) alleged libel contained in a document dated June 17, 1926, (4) alleged libel contained in a letter of July 13, 1926, and (5) alleged libel contained in a letter dated July 17, 1926.

As regarded the claim for false imprisonment, there was no evidence in support of the claim, and Mr. Neep did not press it.

As regarded the claim for malicious prosecution, the jury found that the defendants honestly believed the case which they laid before the magistrate, and there being no other evidence of malice on that issue he held that the defendants were entitled to succeed.

With regard to the claims for libel he held that all the letters were written on privileged occasions.

As to the first claim for libel, there was no evidence of malice to go to the jury, and as to the letter of July 13 the jury found that it was written without malice.

The only remaining question, therefore, related to the letter of July 17 in respect of which the jury found that it was written with malice and they assessed the damages at £150. But it was contended before him that that letter was written on an occasion which was absolutely privileged.

It was written in the following circumstances :— The plaintiff had applied to the insurance officer, and the tribunal which was called in the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, a "Court of Referees" had investigated the matter. The letter in question had been written to the Divisional Controller, Ministry of Labour, who, on the evidence, was proved to be the person to whom communications with regard to unemployment insurance ought to be addressed. It was stated by Mr. Henderson, on behalf of the defendants, that he wrote the letter after he had heard that the Court of Referees had arrived at their decision, although it had not been promulgated.

By section 11 (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, all claims for unemployment benefit and certain other matters were to be determined by one of the officers appointed under that Act, referred to as insurance officers. By subsection (2) of that section, where unemployment benefit was refused or was stopped, or where the amount of the benefit allowed was not in accordance with the claim, the person claiming the benefit could require the insurance officer to report the matter to a Court of Referees constituted in accordance with the Act. That Court, after considering the circumstances, must make to the insurance officer such recommendations on the case as they thought proper and the insurance officer, unless he disagreed, must give effect to those recommendations.

By subsection (3), if the insurance officer disagreed with any recommendation made by a Court of Referees under this section he must, if so requested by the Court of Referees, refer the recommendation, with his reasons for disagreement, to the umpire appointed under the Act.

By subsection (5), where a recommendation had been made under section 11, in the case of any person, by a Court of Referees, any association of employed persons of which that person was a member, and with the consent of the Court that person, might require the insurance officer to refer the matter to the umpire, and by subsection (6) the decision of the umpire was to be final and conclusive.

By subsection (9) the Arbitration Act, 1889, was not to apply to proceedings under the Act except so far as it might be applied by regulations under the Act, but he had not found that any regulation applying the Arbitration Act, 1889, had been made.

By section 22 penalties were imposed for making any false statements for the purpose of obtaining benefit or payment.

Certain regulations called Courts of Referees Regulations and Courts of Referees Amending No. 2 Regulations, 1921, laying down certain matters with regard to the Courts of Referees, were made with regard to the constitution and procedure of the Courts of Referees.

It was contended before him that, as the letter in question was written after the Court of Referees had given a decision and before the insurance officer had promulgated it, it formed part of the proceedings before a tribunal acting in a manner similar to a Court of justice, and, therefore, any such communication was entitled to absolute privilege.

He was informed by counsel that the question whether statements made in connexion with such inquiries were absolutely privileged had arisen at Leeds Assizes before Mr. Justice Acton, who had disallowed the claim for absolute privilege, but no report of the case was produced.

In the case of Copartnership Farms v. Harvey-Smith (34 The Times L.R., 414 ; [1918] 2 K.B., 405) Mr. Justice Sankey held that a local military tribunal was such a judicial body and the decision was approved by Lord Justice Bankes in the case of Gerhold v. Baker (35 The Times L.R., 102).

Mr. Justice Sankey stated in his judgment that he conceived the principle to be that where a tribunal was a Court of justice or a body acting in a manner similar to that in which a Court of justice acted, any statement made by a member thereof was absolutely privileged and no action could be brought thereon.

In Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society v. Parkinson (8 The Times L.R., 352 ; [1892] 1 Q.B., 431) Lord Justice Fry, at page 447, said :—

"Consider to what lengths the doctrine would extend, if this immunity were applied to every body which is bound to decide judicially in the sense of deciding fairly and impartially. It would apply to assessment committees, boards of guardians, to the Inns of Court when considering the conduct of one of their members, to the General Medical Council when considering questions affecting the position of a medical man, and to all arbitrators. Is it necessary, on grounds of public policy, that the doctrine of immunity should be carried as far as this ? I say not.

I say that there is ample protection afforded in such cases by the ordinary law of privilege."

MR. JUSTICE HORRIDGE went on to say that on the best consideration which he could give to the sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and the regulations thereunder he thought that the result was that by such Act and regulations the Court of Referees was created for the purpose of deciding claims made upon the insurance funds. It was not a body deciding between parties, nor did the decision affect criminally or otherwise the status of an individual. He therefore did not think that he ought to extend the protection which was given in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (L.R., 8 Q.B., 255; L.R., 7 H.L., 744) to the present case, which, in his opinion, came within the second definition in the following passage of the judgment of Lord Justice Lopes in the Royal Aquarium case (supra) at page 452:—

"The word 'judicial' has two meanings. It may refer to the discharge of duties exercisable by a Judge or by justices in Court, or to administrative duties which need not be performed in Court, but in respect of which it is necessary to bring to bear a judicial mind—that is, a mind to determine what is fair and just in respect of the matters under consideration."

The Court of Referees was merely discharging such administrative duties.

He thought that the communication in question was not entitled to be regarded as absolutely privileged, and that inasmuch as the jury had found malice the plaintiff was entitled to succeed in respect of the £150.

There would be verdict and judgment for the defendants on the issues of (1) false imprisonment; (2) malicious prosecution; (3) libel alleged in the letter of June 17, 1926; and (4) libel alleged in the letter of July 13, 1926; and verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for £150 for libel in the letter of July 17, 1926.

WITTS v. MACKAY AND OTHERS.*

Education — Non-provided school — Teacher's salary—Burnham Report—Adoption by local education authority — "Carry-over" — Payment by instalments—Alleged unsatisfactory service after adoption—Refusal to pay third instalment — Powers of local education authority.

The plaintiff was appointed head teacher of a non-provided school in 1904, and in 1921 the Burnham Report on Standard Scales of Salaries for Teachers in Public Elementary Schools was adopted by the local education authority. That report provided by clause 9: "All teachers shall be brought to their correct positions on the standard scale adopted by the authority in the following manner. . . . (e) Nothing in this Report is intended to preclude an authority from dealing specially, for the purposes of the 'carry-over,' with the case of a teacher whose service has been declared to be unsatisfactory and continues to be so regarded, provided always that no teacher shall be penalised in respect of years of satisfactory service." The "carry-over" meant the difference between the salary which a teacher would have received at the date of the adoption of the report by the local education authority if throughout the teacher's service the Burnham scale had been in operation, and the salary which at that date the teacher was in fact receiving. The effect of the adoption of the report was that the plaintiff became entitled to an increase of salary, and it was agreed that the payment of the "carry-over" should be spread over three years. The education committee, however, refused to pay the third instalment of the "carry-over," namely, for the year ending March 31, 1924, on the ground that in 1923 the plaintiff's service had been unsatisfactory. In an action by the plaintiff against the managers and the local education authority for the third instalment, Held, that the local education authority had no power, under the terms of the report, to withhold from a teacher any part of the "carry-over" by reason of unsatisfactory service after the date of the adoption of the report, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a decision of Judge Lias given at Sheffield County Court in a case involving the interpretation of one of the clauses of the Burnham Report on Standard Scales of Salaries for Teachers in Public Elementary Schools. The appeal, it was stated, affected the cases of a large number of teachers.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Louisa Mary Witts, a certificated school teacher and the head teacher of the St. Silas Church of England non-provided School for Girls at Sheffield, claimed from the Rev. H. W. Mackay, the Rev. Harold Ewbank and the Rev. W. G. Largie, the managers of St. Silas School, and from the Sheffield Corporation, the local education authority, an instalment of the "carry-over" to which she said that she was entitled under clause 9 of the Burnham Report.

That clause provides:—

"All teachers shall be brought to their correct positions on the standard scale adopted by the authority in the following manner. . . .

"(e) Nothing in this Report is intended to preclude an authority from dealing specially, for the purposes of the 'carry-over,' with the case of a teacher whose service has been declared to be unsatisfactory and continues to be so regarded, provided always that no teacher shall be penalised in respect of years of satisfactory service."

The "carry-over," it was explained, meant the difference between the salary which a teacher would have received at the date of the adoption of the Report by his education authority if throughout his service the Burnham scale had been in operation, and the salary which at that date he was in fact receiving.

Mrs. Witts was appointed head teacher of St. Silas School in 1904 and was re-engaged under a new agreement in 1925. On February 28, 1921, the Burnham Report on Standard Scales of Salary was adopted by the education committee of the Sheffield Corporation, who paid Mrs. Witts's salary, and Mrs. Witts became entitled to an increase of salary amounting to £46 19s. Subsequently, it was agreed that the payment of the carry-over should be divided over three years so that too great a strain should not be thrown on the finances of the education authority.

In 1922 the Sheffield Education Committee instituted an examination for entrance to secondary schools to which children of from 11 to 12 years of age submitted themselves. In March, 1922, and again in March, 1923, children from Mrs. Witts's school did badly, and in November, 1923, the committee complained to her and to her managers that her service had not been satisfactory. They informed her that they were unable to recommend that the third instalment of her "carry-over," which would otherwise have been due for the year ending March 31, 1924, be granted to her.

Mrs. Witts therefore brought this action in the county court claiming £15 13s., the amount of the third instalment. The County Court Judge gave judgment against her, and she appealed against his decision.

Mr. Willoughby Jardine, K.C., and Mr. A. A. Thomas appeared for the appellant; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., Mr. Paley Scott, and Mr. W. A. Macfarlane for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON, in giving judgment, said that it had been argued on behalf of the defendants that paragraph (e) of clause 9 of the Burnham Report conferred on them the right to withhold the money which they had withheld from Mrs. Witts on the ground that her service had been unsatisfactory. For Mrs. Witts it had been contended that the words "has been declared" in paragraph (e) of clause 9 related only to a declaration of unsatisfactory service anterior to the adoption of the Burnham Report by the education authority.

In his view the County Court Judge had taken an erroneous view of the true construction of clause 9. It was important to observe the introductory words of the clause—"All teachers shall be brought to their correct positions . . ." In his opinion, those were the controlling words of the clause, and they indicated that the clause had the primary object of giving instructions regarding how the case of each teacher was to be dealt with in computing his or her "carry-over." The scheme was that the period of service of each teacher must be reviewed and figures prepared by the authority up to the date of the adoption of the Report, which would show (a) the salary of the teacher on the existing scale at the date of the adoption of the Report; and (b) the salary which the teacher would have reached at that date if throughout his term of service he had served on the terms of the Burnham scale. The difference between those figures formed the minimum "carry-over."

For the purpose of that computation the term of service would be assumed in the first place to have been completely satisfactory. There might, however, be cases where, on one or more occasions before the adoption of the Report, a teacher's service had been declared to be unsatisfactory, and it was, therefore, contended that paragraph (e) of clause 9 gave the authority a discretion to "deal specially" with the cases of such teachers so as to secure fairness to the authority and to other teachers.

The construction of paragraph (e) contended for on behalf of Mrs. Witts seemed to be quite proper and clear when applied to the process which a person would have to follow in computing the "carry-over" applicable to a number of different teachers in the way in which he had indicated. The wording of paragraph (e), however, seemed singularly inappropriate to express that the education authority should have power to withhold from a teacher by reason of unsatisfactory service after the date of the adoption of the report any part of the "carry-over" which had become payable to him.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT delivered judgment to the same effect.

The appeal was accordingly allowed with costs.

Leave to appeal was given.

LALA INDAR PRASAD AND ANOTHER v. LALA JAGMOHAN DAS AND ANOTHER.*

India — Oudh — Partition suit — Affirmations before a family deity—Indian Oaths Act, 1873.

In partition proceedings in a Hindu family one of the parties (the first plaintiff) made an offer to the other party to give up such items as the other, in the presence of the family deity, might claim to own. After the admissions and denials before the deity had been recorded by Commissioners who were present the first plaintiff contested the agreement on two grounds—(1) that the condition had not been carried out, and (2) that it was not binding under the Indian Oaths Act, 1873.

Judgments of the two Indian Courts affirmed and both objections rejected. What took place before the deity was evidence on oath or solemn affirmation within the meaning of section 8 of the Act, and was binding on the first plaintiff.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh affirming a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Lucknow.

Mr. De Gruyther, K.C., and Mr. S. Hyam were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Dunne, K.C., and Mr. B. Dube for the respondents.

LORD BLANESBURGH, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—

This appeal arises out of a partition suit which has been pending in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Lucknow for a period of nearly 12 years. The plaintiffs and defendants are, in each case, father and son, all members of a Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara School of Hindu law and at one time joint. The first plaintiff is the elder brother of the first defendant. The sons, being both of them infants during the greater part of the critical period, do not, except for one incident concerning the second plaintiff, enter into the story. It will be convenient, therefore, frequently throughout this judgment to refer to the respective fathers as if they represented the entire interest on either side. When their Lordships refer to them as plaintiff or defendant they will do so in this sense.

The family owned property, both moveable and immoveable, of considerable extent and value, including a banking and pawnbroking business. Some time in 1914 the first plaintiff left the family house, not, as has been found, on account of any differences with the first defendant, but because of illness. Subsequently, however, differences arose between the brothers, so acute that the resumption of joint residence was apparently regarded by both as impracticable. It was in these circumstances that this suit for the partition of the entire family property, including that relating to the business, was commenced on September 23, 1915. It has been proceeding ever since.

To the plaint are attached lists, particularizing the properties to be partitioned. These included the immoveable properties, the debts due, and the gold and silver ornaments pledged to the firm, together with brass and silver articles and other moveables in possession of the parties.

In the plaint it is also alleged that in kothris, in the family dwelling-house, there had been locked up by the first defendant joint property in the shape of jewellery and cash, and also ornaments pledged to the firm. These articles the plaintiff could not completely specify, but he claimed that with any other joint property later discovered they should be included in the suit. The existence or non-existence of this property so referred to is the dispute which has mainly led to the altogether inordinate prolongation of the proceedings.

At first it seemed that there would be no serious difference on any question. On January 31, 1916, there were filed in Court two petitions for compromise, intimating the intention of the brothers to partition the immoveable property amicably out of Court, and praying that a Commissioner of partition should be appointed to divide the moveables. On that day a preliminary decree of partition was made. Peace was in the air, and so far as the immoveable properties were concerned it has not been broken. These were shortly afterwards duly partitioned by mutual agreement, and no further question arises with reference to them.

But with regard to the moveable property, disputes were resumed and became highly embittered. The first defendant denied possession of any such further property as had been referred to in the plaint, and contested many payments alleged by the plaintiff to have been made on the joint account. The proceedings before the Commissioner were interrupted by proceedings in Court; there were several interlocutory orders; some of these were carried to appeal. The first plaintiff was examined and cross-examined in Court for nine days; the first defendant, called by the plaintiff, for 33 days. On May 6, 1921, the learned Subordinate Judge delivered a judgment in which, in a sense very unfavourable to the first defendant, he reviewed the history of the protracted litigation up to that date. The first defendant, he found, was in possession of and had not discovered moveable properties of very considerable value, and he made an order in the following terms:—

"I therefore order that the Commissioners will find out from the statements of [the first plaintiff] and his wife the special items of properties and their value. Any property on which the Commissioners can identically lay their hands will be taken in possession by them. The value of such property will be determined from the evidence of the first plaintiff and his wife already on the record and by obtaining expert opinion if necessary. Such of the properties as are not forthcoming will be valued so far as possible from the evidence contained in the statements of [the first plaintiff and his wife]. The value of them to the extent of the plaintiffs' share shall be debited against the share of the defendants to be arrived at as a result of the partition of the entire property which is the subject of the suit."

This was, of course, an order which, in an evidentiary sense, if their Lordships may be permitted such an expression, was highly favourable to the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed against it to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, but on August 29, 1921, his appeal was dismissed as incompetent at that stage. The proceedings accordingly continued on the basis of the order appealed from. Lists and counter-lists were exchanged between the parties; the first plaintiff was further cross-examined for four days between February 28, 1922, and March 4, 1922, and, as a result of it all, the first plaintiff and first defendant on March 16, 1922, appeared before the Subordinate Judge and made the following statements, which were duly recorded by the Judge. The defendant, Jagmohan Das, said:—

"Whatever lists Indar Prasad (plaintiff) gives written with his own hand of the village collections, house rents and other accounts, including Ugahi, I shall accept as true and correct. And I shall admit whatever moveables with their value he says upon his belief remained with me."

The plaintiff, Indar Prasad, said:—

"I shall give written with my own hand to Lala Jagmohan Das whatever the accounts are, including village collections, house rents, Ugahi account, &c., and I shall write with my own hand and verify upon my belief a list of moveables with their value that remained with Lala Jagmohan Das."

In pursuance of that agreement the first plaintiff, on March 30, 1922, filed seven lists, of which six only remain material. These six were all in his handwriting. With the exception of the immoveable property, as to which the dispute was ended, they covered the whole range of the suit. If they were conclusive, as by the agreement of the defendant they were to be, they would have secured for the plaintiff a decree for practically the whole of his claim and there would have been due to him from the defendant a sum exceeding two lakhs of rupees.

But then a strange thing happened. For some reason unknown—the Subordinate Judge describes it as "a fit of responsive generosity" on the part of the first plaintiff—he on March 30, 1922, when filing his lists, made in Court, in the presence of the first defendant, the offer on which everything now turns. It is thus recorded by the Subordinate Judge:—

"Lala Indar Prasad says he will give up out of his lists such items as Jagmohan Das denies before the deity Lachmi Narsinghi. Jagmohan Das accepts this."

It would appear that, unexpected though the first plaintiff's offer must have been, the first defendant was not slow to see the advantage which this agreement gave him, and a few days later he took a further step to make it completely effective. The first plaintiff's son and co-plaintiff had recently attained majority, and on April 4, 1922, the first defendant applied that it should be placed on record whether he also relied or not on the special oath of the first defendant. On April 7 the young man appeared in Court. He had already intimated that he, too, rested the matter on the special oath of the first defendant as his father, the first plaintiff, had done, and he replied to the learned Judge, who explained the whole position to him, that he was willing it should be so, even if the first defendant struck out all the items claimed by the plaintiff. "Now," comments the Judge, "both the plaintiffs were within the eagle claws of the defendant No. 1."

On April 8, 1922, the Commissioner, appointed by the Judge in terms to be referred to later, went to the plaintiff's house, and in a kothri of the family deities and in the presence of the Dibba known as Lachmi Narsinghia Dibba he recorded the admissions and denials by the defendant Jagmohan Das of the items in the lists filed by the plaintiff.

On April 10 the Commissioner submitted to the Court his report of the proceedings, together with the first defendant's recorded statement. Plaintiff No. 2 had indeed been taken at his word. By admitting, as the Judicial Commissioner put it, practically all the items which involved any liability on the part of the first plaintiff, and denying practically all the items which involved any liability on his own, the first defendant had transformed lists which disclosed an indebtedness of over two lakhs from him to the plaintiff into a bill ultimately adjusted at Rs.93,672.15.3 due by the plaintiff to himself and his son.

The plaintiff, now thoroughly alarmed, on April 11, protested to the Subordinate Judge that the proceedings of March 30, 1922, and anything done thereunder were not warranted by the Indian Oaths Act No. 10 of 1873; that the first plaintiff's offer of that day was vague and indefinite in its wording and did not contemplate a total denial of some of the lists as recorded by the Commissioner; that the denial by the first defendant of the possession of any joint family property—this he had done—was opposed to the Court's finding in its judgment of May 6, 1921, and that the denials showed that the first defendant had taken undue advantage of the offer of the first plaintiff, and that the Court should not consider the result to be binding and conclusive on the plaintiff.

After a full hearing the learned Subordinate Judge, on May 22, 1922, declared that the admissions and denials of the first defendant recorded in the presence of the deity Lachmi Narsinghi stood good, and he directed the Commissioners to make a report of the net result of all that had gone before. This report the Commissioners made on July 6, 1922, and thereon a final decree was passed on July 25, 1922, awarding as to the moveables to the defendant the above sum of Rs.93,672.15.3 with future interest on that amount from decree until realization. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, which by its judgment of March 10, 1924, upheld the decree of the Subordinate Judge. The plaintiff's present appeal is from that judgment.

Their Lordships have been at pains to set forth in some detail the facts which have led to the existing situation. They recognize that the appellants, by their own act, have completely thrown away the favourable position which in this litigation they had obtained for themselves by the order of May 6, 1921—a position which may well have induced the first respondent's concessions of March 16, 1922. Accordingly their Lordships have thought it right, before proceeding further with the consideration of this appeal, to assure themselves that the appellants had, to the full extent alleged, become bound by the agreement of March 30, 1922.

Their Lordships were, in the light of the earlier proceedings in the suit, particularly struck by one feature of that agreement as interpreted by the Courts in India. As so interpreted it binds the plaintiff by the special oath of the first defendant, not only to matters which were directly within the first defendant's own knowledge—for example, as to the jewellery, cash, and ornaments retained by him—but even to matters immediately within the knowledge of the first plaintiff and testified to by himself, and only at second hand, if at all, within the knowledge of the first defendant. To their Lordships' minds this seems, in the circumstances, a strange arrangement for the first plaintiff to have offered the first defendant, and they have scrutinized very narrowly the terms of the recorded agreement to see whether such is its effect, or whether it could not fairly be interpreted as directed, for example, to the plaintiff's list numbered 1, which comprised the property of the first class, and as excluding, for example, list numbered 3, which recorded the first plaintiff's own transactions. But, on full consideration, their Lordships are, in this matter, constrained to adhere to the view of the agreement taken by the Courts below. It was common ground between the parties there that the recorded statements of March 16 and March 30, 1922, were to be read together. So read these statements relate to all, and not to some only, of the plaintiff's final lists which, as has been said, covered the whole range of the suit. There is no room for any discrimination in either statement, each of which the Board must assume to be correctly recorded. Their Lordships accordingly must conclude that if the agreement of March 30, 1922, is effective for any purpose at all it is effective to the fullest extent of the six lists, so that the result in figures arrived at on that footing must inevitably follow.

But it is, however, contended by the appellants that, however the agreement be construed, they, for two separate and distinct reasons, are no longer bound by it. The first reason is that it has not been observed by the first defendant. The second is that the statements made by the first defendant and recorded as above set forth are not, as a result of defects in procedure, made binding upon the appellants by the Indian Oaths Act, 1873.

As to the first contention, it is said that in two respects the agreement was not observed by the first defendant in the proceedings before the Commissioner of partition. First of all, it is asserted, the deity was not present on that occasion. His Dibba was in the kothri, but the deity was not himself within it. To this assertion their Lordships can give no countenance. It was indeed only faintly made before them, although apparently strongly urged in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. It cannot survive examination. The deity in question was the family deity of the plaintiff; the proceedings took place in the first plaintiff's presence in a kothri of the deities in his house; the Dibba of the deity was there by the first plaintiff's own direction; he knew exactly what the first defendant had to do, because he himself had dictated the procedure; he made no objection at the time to any irregularity or omission; he and the first defendant acted as if they both believed, as their Lordships cannot doubt they did, that the deity was present in the Dibba. If, to the knowledge of the first plaintiff, the deity was not so present, the whole proceeding was reduced to a farce, if not to something worse. There is, however, no affidavit or sworn statement by the first plaintiff or anyone else that the deity was not actually present. The point was not, it seems, taken at all before the Subordinate Judge. It appears for the first time on October 3, 1922, in the plaintiff's grounds of appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. Like that Court, their Lordships are unable to countenance the suggestion, which was, they think, to say the least of it, ill-advised on the part of the plaintiff.

But there is, it is alleged, another respect in which the agreement was not observed. It was thereby contemplated, so it is said, that the deity would be actually invoked by the first defendant when he attended to make in the presence of the god his admissions and denials. And no such invocation was made. The agreement, therefore, say the appellants, has not been performed in an essential particular. Now, it is the fact that on the occasion in question there was no invocation of the deity. It is not, however, true to say that the agreement made between the parties called for any such invocation. Their Lordships feel no doubt that the actual proceedings before the Commissioner amounted to a literal compliance with the terms of that agreement, and a substantial compliance also. For their Lordships are of opinion that the learned Subordinate Judge correctly interprets the views on this subject both of the plaintiff and of the defendant when he says that "the very presence of the god or idol on the spot when the statement was made, so to speak, within his sight and hearing was tantamount to his invocation by name in case of his absence. When the god or idol had been brought purposely on the scene to witness the statement of defendant 1, it was by no means necessary to call upon him to bear witness, for having been brought to the scene he could not be suspected to be inattentive or asleep."

The first objection therefore fails in both respects.

The second objection may be expanded thus: apart from such an invocation as has just been referred to and which was never made, and in the absence of anything done on the occasion that could properly be described as the administration to the first defendant of an oath or affirmation in the ordinary sense of these words, his admissions and denials are not, within the Indian Oaths Act, 1873, binding on the plaintiffs. As an aid to the consideration of this objection, which is much more formidable than any of the others, it will be convenient to set out, for facility of reference, the sections of the Indian Oaths Act, 1873, on which its determination must mainly turn.

The sections are the following:—

"5. Oaths or affirmations shall be made by the following persons:—

"(a) All witnesses, that is to say, all persons who may lawfully be examined, or give, or be required to give, evidence by or before any Court or persons having by law or consent of parties authority to examine such persons or to receive evidence;

"(b) Interpreters of questions put to, and evidence given by, witnesses, and

"(c) Jurors.

"Nothing herein contained shall render it lawful to administer, in a criminal proceeding, an oath or affirmation to the accused person, or necessary to administer to the official interpreter of any Court, after he has entered on the execution of the duties of his office, an oath or affirmation that he will faithfully discharge those duties.

"6. Where the witness, interpreter or juror is a Hindu or Muhammadan,

"or has an objection to making an oath,

"he shall, instead of making an oath, make an affirmation.

"In every other case the witness, interpreter or juror shall make an oath.

"IV. Forms of Oaths and Affirmations.

"7. All oaths and affirmations made under section five shall be administered according to such forms as the High Court may from time to time prescribe.

"And until any such forms are prescribed by the High Court, such oaths and affirmations shall be administered according to the forms now in use. . . .

"8. If any party to, or witness in, any judicial proceeding offers to give evidence on oath or solemn affirmation in any form common amongst, or held binding by, persons of the race or persuasion to which he belongs, and not repugnant to justice or decency, and not purporting to affect any third person, the Court may, if it thinks fit, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, tender such oath or affirmation to him.

"9. If any party to any judicial proceeding offers to be bound by any such oath or solemn affirmation as is mentioned in section eight, if such oath or affirmation is made by the other party to, or by any witness in, such proceeding, the Court may, if it thinks fit, ask such party or witness, or cause him to be asked, whether or not he will make the oath or affirmation:

"Provided that no party or witness shall be compelled to attend personally in Court solely for the purpose of answering such question.

"10. If such party or witness agrees to make such oath or affirmation, the Court may proceed to administer it, or, if it is of such a nature that it may be more conveniently made out of Court, the Court may issue a Commission to any person to administer it, and authorize him to take the evidence of the person to be sworn or affirmed and return it to the Court.

"11. The evidence so given shall, as against the person who offered to be bound as aforesaid, be conclusive proof of the matter stated."

The judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge makes a careful record of the Indian authorities on this subject. The result of them, their Lordships are inclined to think, is that the point now raised has not so far been the subject of express decision. Safe, however, it is to say that in the decisions which have been brought to their Lordships' notice where a so-called "special oath" has been upheld there is no clear indication, one way or the other, whether the person who took that oath recited any formula by way of invocation or did anything else which in the ordinary sense of the words amounted to the making of an oath or affirmation. The question, accordingly, now that it has been raised must be determined on principle, and to this task their Lordships proceed.

It is not denied that the statements made by the first defendant here in the presence of the deity were specially binding on his conscience by reason of the fact that they were so made. It is also recognized that the Subordinate Judge before he appointed a Commissioner was himself satisfied that the particular ritual to be followed fulfilled the conditions of section 8 of the Act. Equally clear is it that the learned Judge intended to act in pursuance of section 10, when on March 30, 1922, he made this order of appointment:—

"With the consent of parties I appoint Bahu Mahesh Prasad pleader for going with the plaintiff's list before Lachmi Narsinghi in plaintiff's house and take defendant's admissions and denials of the list items before the deity."

The question, therefore, is whether the evidence of the first defendant, given in the presence of the Commissioner before the deity, was, in these circumstances, evidence on oath or solemn affirmation administered by the Commissioner within the meaning of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act, and their Lordships, in agreement both with the learned Subordinate Judge and the Judicial Commissioner, are of opinion that this question must be answered in the affirmative. In their judgment, upon a sound construction of the sections, neither an invocation nor an oath or affirmation in the technical sense of these words is in any way an essential part of the so-called oath or solemn affirmation referred to in section 8 of the Act.

Their Lordships are led to this conclusion by reference to the sections alone. They are confirmed in it, however, by recalling the stage of development which the law of India had reached on the subject of oaths by the date when the Act came into force.

Upon the point of construction the cardinal consideration to note is that the "oath or solemn affirmation" referred to in section 8 and following sections is something quite distinct from the oaths and affirmations referred to in section 5. These are to be in such form as the High Court shall prescribe (section 7). With regard to the oath or solemn affirmation referred to in section 8, however, all that is said is that it may be "in any form common amongst, or held binding by, persons of the race or persuasion to which [the deponent] belongs, and not repugnant to justice or decency." That is to say, it may be as infinite alike in form and content as racial custom or the dictates of any religious persuasion may, within the prescribed limits, sanction or require. But from its very nature and essence it can never be in any part of it dependent upon the direction or dictation of the High Court or of any other extra-racial or secular administrative authority. It would or might at once lose its essential distinctive sanction if any such outside interference were permitted to have effect. And this brings their Lordships to the second matter which it is necessary to note in the construction of these sections. There is no suggestion in either section 8, 9, or 10 that when the separate "oath or solemn affirmation" is permitted the ordinary oath or affirmation, as prescribed, or any part of it, is to be administered as well. The "oath or solemn affirmation" when permitted is a complete substitute for the other. There is in the sections no warrant for the suggestion that any part of a procedure which, be it remembered, is only appropriate where it is gone through before any evidence at all is given, and is designed to cover that evidence when given, is to be transferred to a taking of evidence which, as in the present case, is solemnized only by its being given and while it is given in the actual presence and hearing of the deity himself.

Indeed, this case shows that such a requirement, not, their Lordships think, made by the sections, would in many cases be entirely out of place. When, as here, the whole meaning of the procedure is that a statement made by a witness in the corporeal presence and hearing of his god will be true by reason of the fact that it is so made, introductory words of invocation, appropriate enough in other circumstances, become entirely unsuitable. For if the deity be removed before the statement is made the words are nugatory; if the statement be made in his presence they are superfluous.

It is said further, however, that this construction of the sections attaches no adequate signification to the words "oath or solemn affirmation" in section 8. Their Lordships, on consideration, do not agree. It appears to them that the use of the alternative expressions "oath" and "solemn affirmation" as a description of the special ritual envisaged in section 8 is intended to indicate that the ritual is to be at least as solemn for the deponent and attended by the same consequences to him as is an ordinary oath or affirmation for and to an ordinary witness. The words, their Lordships opine, were selected primarily to put it beyond the possibility of doubt that the temporal consequences of corrupt falsehood would follow as inevitably for the one class of witness as for the other: they are descriptive of the nature and result of the ritual: they are in no way concerned with its form—a conclusion which is confirmed by the consideration that historically an affirmation, technically so-called, is merely a substitute for an oath: that the description includes both "oath" and "affirmation," although, except in the quality of solemnity, these are quite distinct, the one from the other, and that its purpose is revealed by the addition to the word "affirmation" of the adjective "solemn," which is not in use in connexion with affirmations in the technical sense of the word.

But, lastly, it is said that the "oath or solemn affirmation" must, as appears from section 10, be something which either the Court or a Commissioner appointed by the Court can "administer" to the witness; it must, under section 8, be something that can be "tendered" to him. Upon this it is to be remembered that "administer" is, in the law, a word of wide and not of restricted import. It would be for instance beyond question that an oath is "administered," not only where the English form is adopted, but where, in the presence of the Court, it is "taken" by the witness in the Scottish form. Their Lordships do not doubt that the terms of the section were here in this respect fully complied with when the admissions and denials of the first defendant were made, not only before the deity, but in the presence of the Commissioner. The word "tendered," in section 8, does not appear to their Lordships to create any difficulty.

On construction alone, therefore, their Lordships reach the same conclusion as the Courts below. That conclusion is, however, in their judgment, confirmed by a reference to the course of development of the Indian law on this subject. That law was derived from the English law, with some modifications suggested by Indian conditions. Just as in England, so also in India, it was at one time the rule that there could be no evidence without an oath in the strict sense of the word, and only gradually were exceptions grafted by statute upon that rule. Before 1840 the privilege of making an affirmation instead of taking an oath was enjoyed only by Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists. By that time it had been found that the taking of an oath was highly objectionable to Hindus and Mahomedans, and Act V. of 1840 was passed for the purpose of prohibiting the administration of oaths to persons belonging to those communities, a form of affirmation being substituted for an oath. With some extension in 1869 the law so remained until the Act VI. of 1872 was passed. By that Act it was provided that every witness who objected to take an oath might instead make a simple affirmation, and in section 4 will be found the statutory provision which, before 1873, enabled volunteers to make oaths in special cases. Sections 8 to 13 of the present Act of 1873 correspond to and have taken the place of that section, and their Lordships can have no doubt that long before that time the Indian view, embodied afresh in the Act, had come to be that which may, briefly, be taken from the words of the Lord Chancellor in Omychund v.

Barker (1 Atk., 22, at pp. 49-50), and quoted by the Judicial Commissioner :—

"The next thing I shall take notice of is the form of the oath. It is laid down by all writers that the outward act is not essential to the oath. It has been the wisdom of all nations to administer such oaths as are agreeable to the notion of the person taking."

For all these reasons their Lordships dealing on this branch of the appeal with the one aspect of the matter brought before them by the appellant for consideration are constrained to agree with both Courts in India that the statements made by the first defendant in the presence of the family deity and before the Commissioner were conclusive upon the plaintiff.

An objection was taken by the appellants to certain items in the accounts which their Lordships at the hearing intimated that they could not entertain for reasons which they then gave. They do not repeat these reasons. In their Lordships' judgment the order of the Judicial Commissioner objected to was in all respects right, and they think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

And their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

K.B. Div. (MacKinnon, J.) 1927. May 20.

NORSKE ATLAS INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. LONDON GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Arbitration — Award—Reinsurance contract—Provision for arbitration in Norway—Contract not a policy—Not properly stamped as a policy — Action on award — Proper law applicable.

The plaintiffs, an insurance company in London, and the defendants, an insurance company in Norway, entered into a written contract headed "Reinsurance contract—Marine insurance." The contract was not a policy as it did not contain the particulars required by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, and was not stamped as a policy, but it contained the usual terms of a reinsurance treaty, the plaintiffs being the reinsured and the defendants the reinsurers, and there was a clause providing that in the event of disputes an arbitration should take place in Norway. The contract was signed by the plaintiffs in Norway and by the defendants in London and was stamped with an English sixpenny stamp, but it was not stamped in accordance with the English law as to contracts of marine insurance. It was, however, valid by the law of Norway. An arbitration under the contract was held in Norway, and an award was issued in favour of the plaintiffs. In an action on the award the defendants submitted that, as the defendants resided in England and therefore the award against them could be enforced only in the English Courts, the law applicable to the whole contract must be the law of England, and that, since the contract neither was a policy as required by English law nor was properly stamped as such a policy, the plaintiffs could not recover on the award.

Held, that as the action was brought on the award and not on the contract of reinsurance, and as the proper inference from the provision as to the arbitration being held in Norway was that the parties intended the law of Norway to govern the contract, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum awarded.

In this case the plaintiffs, the Norske Atlas Insurance Company, Limited, claimed a sum of £4,675, and also interest on a smaller sum, which they alleged to be due to them from the defendants, the London General Insurance Company, Limited, under an award.

Sir Robert Aske (Mr. Porter, K.C., with him) appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. McNair for the defendants.

In 1919 a treaty of reinsurance was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs being the reinsured and the defendants being the reinsurers. The treaty was terminated at the end of 1921, and in an arbitration for the settlement of transactions between the parties the award was made which was the foundation of the present action.

The defendants admitted the making of the award, but they denied that they owed anything under it. They contended that the treaty of reinsurance was a contract of sea or marine insurance, and was not expressed or embodied in a policy so as to satisfy the Stamp Act, 1891, section 93, or the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, sections 22 and 23. They also contended that the sums granted by the award were payable in respect of risks of sea insurances ceded by the plaintiffs to the defendants under the treaty of reinsurance, and that neither the treaty nor certain addenda to it were properly stamped and that the sums were, therefore, irrecoverable by virtue of section 97 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

By their reply the plaintiffs contended that the contract was to be performed in Norway, and must be governed by Norwegian law, and that by that law the contract was valid and enforceable.

Sir Robert Aske submitted that on the wording of the treaty it was not a mere contract of indemnity, but was something in the nature of a partnership, or an agency, or an equitable assignment of risks. The case of Admiralty Commissioners v. Ropner and Co. (33 The Times L.R., 362) showed that a contract might have the results of a contract of marine insurance without being such a contract. In this document there was no agreement in terms to reinsure. It was not a contract of insurance at all, but an agreement to share profits and losses in partnership. Further, the contract was first executed by one party in Norway and later by the other party in England and the proper law applicable to it was the Norwegian law.

What law to apply was ascertained by seeing what law the parties themselves intended to apply. (Dicey on "The Conflict of Laws," 4th edit., p. 609) ; Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation v. Sjoforsakrings Aktiebolaget Vega (18 The Times L.R., 714 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 384) ; Hamlyn and Co. v. Talisker Distillery Company (10 The Times L.R., 479 ; [1894] A.C., 202). The Courts would always hold, if possible, that the parties were making a contract which could be enforced and which was not illegal.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Evidence was given that the contract was a valid contract under Norwegian law.

Mr. Le Quesne submitted that the treaty was clearly a contract of marine insurance and the law applicable to it must be decided from all the circumstances. There was in the treaty an arbitration clause which said that proceedings must begin with an arbitration in Norway. But the defendants resided in England and an award made against them in Norway could only be enforced in the English Courts and the law applicable to the whole contract must be the law of England. He referred to Genforsikrings Aktieselskabet (Skandinavia Reinsurance Company of Copenhagen) v. da Costa (27 The Times L.R., 43 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 137) ; Home Marine Insurance Company, Limited v. Smith (14 The Times L.R., 459 ; ([1898] 2 Q.B., 351).

The contract was one of marine insurance, and the plaintiffs could not evade that fact by saying that they were suing on the award and not on the contract ; for the award and the original cause of action were not separable. As this contract was not a policy since it did not contain the particulars required by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, and, though it was stamped with an English sixpenny stamp, it was not stamped with the stamp proper for a contract of marine insurance, it was inadmissible in evidence.

Mr. Porter replied.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs were an insurance company in Norway and the defendants were an insurance company in London. In 1919 the parties entered into a written contract headed :—"Reinsurance contract—Marine insurance." That document contained the usual terms of a reinsurance treaty. It also contained an arbitration clause providing that if any dispute should arise under the contract the parties should not resort to any Court of law, but that arbitrators should be appointed, who should be chairmen or directors of marine insurance companies in Norway, and if either party should fail to appoint its arbitrator the chief officer of the maritime Court of Christiania should appoint. The arbitrators were to meet in Christiania. That document was signed by the plaintiffs at Christiania on November 28, 1919, and by the defendants in London on December 9, 1919.

Under that contract business went on for a time between the parties, but disputes arose and the plaintiffs claimed arbitration. The defendants refused to appoint their arbitrator, and the plaintiffs, in accordance with the contract, got the officer of the Christiania Court to appoint an arbitrator on the defendants' behalf. On April 14, 1926, an award was issued, and on May 18, 1926, the plaintiffs started this action to recover the sum awarded.

If the plaintiffs had been suing here on the treaty of reinsurance for marine losses incurred in insurances the defence raised would have been fatal to them, because the contract was one of marine insurance which was not effected by a policy and was not properly stamped. The plaintiffs, however, were not suing on the contract, but on the award, and the only things to be proved by them were (1) the submission ; (2) the conduct of the arbitration in accordance with the submission ; and (3) the fact that the award was valid according to the law of the country where it was made.

As to (1), the defendants admitted that the award was made pursuant to the contract. The treaty had been put in with a 6d. stamp on it and a statement that it had been adjudicated on by the Commissioners. If it had been put in as evidence of a contract of marine insurance it could have been objected to, but it was only put in as evidence to prove the submission and for that purpose was admissible.

As to the validity of the award, the law applicable depended ultimately on the question what was the law which the parties intended to apply. If the intention was not expressly stated it could be inferred from the general tenor of the document, or from the place where the contract was drawn up. In this case the contract was signed both in Norway and in London, so no guidance could be obtained from the place of signature. But from the provision that arbitration should take place in Christiania he thought that the proper inference was that the parties intended the law of Norway to be the law governing the contract. Evidence had been given that the contract was valid by the law of Norway and the defendants had not suggested that any impropriety had occurred in the conduct of the arbitration. The award, therefore, was a Norwegian award and was perfectly good and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum awarded.

There must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

A stay of execution was granted on terms.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON SUGAR SUPPLY v. HARTLEPOOLS SEATONIA STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Ship—Charterparty—Bill of lading—Construction of clauses — Cargo of sugar in bags — Discrepancy between bill of lading number and out-turn tally — Meaning of "error" — Proof by inference excluded.

The claimants chartered a ship from the respondents, the owners, to convey a cargo of sugar from Cuba to a British port, the charterparty providing that mate's receipts should be signed for each parcel and that bills of lading in accordance therewith should be signed by the master, and "Quantity stated on bills of lading to be conclusive evidence as to number of bags of sugar shipped unless error or fraud can be proved." The mate signed receipts and the master signed bills of lading in accordance with the receipts. The bills of lading provided that "the carrier shall not be concluded as to the correctness of statements herein of . . . quantity." The bags discharged at Greenock were found to be short of the number in the bills of lading, and a claim by the charterers against the shipowners in respect of the shortage went to arbitration. No fraud was alleged, and the arbitrator held that there was no evidence how the discrepancy arose and that under the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty the shipowners were liable in the absence of proof of some definite error in the bills of lading or tallies otherwise than by inference from the fact that all the bags shipped were discharged, and he made an award in favour of the charterers.

Held, that variations of the bill of lading from the charterparty were of no account, and that on the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty the shipowners could not escape liability by giving evidence from which a mistake might be inferred but they must prove a mistake in the mate's receipts so that it could be seen how the mistake arose, and therefore the award must be upheld.

The Court upheld the award of the arbitrator, Mr. Harold Claughton Scott, K.C., who found in favour of the claimants, in a special case stated dealing with the liability of the respondents in respect of an alleged short out-turn of a cargo of sugar in bags.

By a charterparty dated March 10, 1920, made between Messrs. Hessler and Co., on behalf of the Hartlepools Seatonia Steamship Company, Limited (the respondents), and the Royal Commission on Sugar Supply (the claimants) it was agreed that the steamship Seatonia should proceed to certain ports in Cuba and there load a full cargo of sugar in bags and thence proceed to one safe port in the United Kingdom. It was also provided that the mate's receipts should be signed for each parcel of sugar when on board, and that bills of lading in accordance therewith should be signed by the master. The following clause was also included in the charterparty: "Quantity stated on bills of lading to be conclusive evidence as to number of bags of sugar shipped unless error or fraud can be proved."

The Seatonia duly proceeded to Cuba and loaded at Manzanillo and Cienfuegos. The mate duly signed receipts for each parcel of sugar put on board and the captain signed bills of lading for each parcel in accordance with the mate's receipts. No dispute arose with regard to the cargo loaded at the former port. When the portion of the cargo loaded at Cienfuegos was discharged at Greenock it was found according to three independent tallies that the out-turn of a parcel of bags marked "San Lino" was 183 short of the total of 2,860 as stated in the bills of lading signed by the master. The bills of lading provided (inter alia): "It is mutually agreed . . . that the carrier shall not be liable for any loss or damage arising from the insufficiency of packages . . . and that the carrier shall not be concluded as to the correctness of statements herein of quality, quantity. . . ."

The claimants claimed in respect of the alleged shortage the sum of £1,460 11s. 1d. and deducted that sum from the respondents' freight account. On agreement that the dispute should be submitted to arbitration the claimants paid to the respondents £1,460 11s. 1d., and thus became the claimants in the arbitration.

At the hearing the claimants based their claim upon the charterparty and the "conclusive evidence" clause therein. The respondents relied upon the terms of the bills of lading, and denied that the bills of lading number of bags were received on board, and alleged that all the bags received on board were discharged at Greenock. The arbitrator found (inter alia): (a) That the out-turn tallies at Greenock were correct; (b) that all the bags of sugar shipped under the mark "San Lino" were discharged and delivered; (c) that there was no evidence to show how the discrepancy between the bills of lading number and the out-turn number arose; (d) that the bills of lading, taken in conjunction with the charterparty, were conclusive evidence against the respondents as to the number of bags shipped, save on proof by them of error or fraud in regard thereto; (e) that the words "unless error or fraud can be proved" meant, upon the true construction of the charterparty, unless some definite error in making out the bills of lading or in the tallies, such as clerical error or error in copying or addition or omission or the like or some definite fraud be proved, and that it excluded proof by or inference from the fact that all the bags of sugar shipped were discharged.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether upon the facts and upon the true construction of the charterparty and bills of lading the arbitrator had come to a correct determination in point of law.

Mr. Langton, K.C., and Mr. G. E. Cooper appeared for the respondents; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead appeared for the claimants.

Mr. Langton, after referring to the facts and the material clauses of the charterparty and the bills of lading, dealt with the meaning of the word "proved." He submitted that clerical errors were demonstrable and did not require proof, and referred to Best on Evidence, 12th Edition, page 5: "The word 'proof' seems properly to mean anything which serves . . . to convince the mind of the truth or falsehood of a fact or proposition; and as truths differ, the proofs adapted to them differ also." In this case the word "proved" was used both for fraud and error. He contended that the respondents had proved that an error had been made, and he added that an error was not necessarily either small or blameworthy. Fraud would certainly mean that someone had written in a number knowing it to be untrue and for a purpose; error, in the broadest sense, would be a mistake made in tallying in. He further submitted that both the charterparty and the bills of lading must be looked at for the contract, and that the bills of lading were a most highly qualified receipt. On this point he referred to page 56 of the 12th Edition of Scrutton on Charterparties and Bills of Lading. He had two submissions: (1) the error could be any error, and not necessarily a special error; (2) the bills of lading were not conclusive at all.

The Solicitor-General submitted that the conclusive evidence clause meant something very definite, and was put in for a definite purpose—to serve as a protection. The error would be one which a charterer ought to be in a position to correct. Definite evidence could be given by the production of the mate's receipts and the bills of lading; but the error as submitted by Mr. Langton was wider than this. He (the Solicitor-General) contended that on the construction of the whole clause it was not enough to say that one must infer from the facts proved that there must have been a mistake, but the mistake must be proved

Mr. Langton replied.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon, in giving judgment, said that the case raised the shortest point possible, founded on a clerical mistake. He referred to the facts and cited the material clauses of the charterparty and the bills of lading. There were two points to consider; (1) whether the whole effect of the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty was wiped out by the clause in the bills of lading as to the liability of the carrier as to quantity; and (2) whether if the shipowners failed on that point they escaped liability by reason of the provision in the conclusive evidence clause "unless error or fraud can be proved." On the first point there was no difficulty whatever. The contention of the shipowners amounted to this: that the charterers and shipowners had come to a mutual agreement to substitute the provision in the bills of lading for the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty. It was very old law that variations between a bill of lading and a charterparty were of no account; also the master would have no authority to vary the charterparty. He referred to the findings of the arbitrator and said that the real question in the case arose under the clause "Quantity stated on bills of lading to be conclusive evidence as to number of bags of sugar shipped unless error or fraud can be proved." It was a necessary inference from the first and second findings of the arbitrator that the figure 2,860 in the bills of lading was erroneous. He referred to Mr. Langton's contention that "error" had been proved, and said that if the proof of any mistake was sufficient it was immaterial whether it arose through negligence, carelessness, or fraud. Dealing with the Solicitor-General's submission that proof of mistake must not be inferred from facts, but must be proved, his Lordship said he thought it was an extremely difficult question, but on the whole he agreed with the arbitrator. It was not enough for the respondents to give evidence from which it might be inferred that there had been a mistake. What must be proved was a mistake in the mate's receipts so that it could be seen how the mistake arose. In those circumstances the award must be upheld.

GOSSE MILLARD, LIMITED v. CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE, LIMITED.*

Contract—Carriage of goods by sea—Obligations of shipowners—Alleged breach of duty—Damage to cargo—Negligence—Onus of proof—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. III., rr. 2, 6, 8; Art IV., r. 2.

The plaintiffs had a quantity of tinplates shipped for conveyance by the defendants' steamer from Swansea to Vancouver, and after the tinplates had been taken on board the ship went to Liverpool and had to be detained there for repairs. For this purpose part of the cargo had to be shifted, and rain got into the hold, and when the tinplates were discharged at Vancouver they were found to have been damaged by rust. In an action for damages for breach of duty in the carriage of the tinplates, the Court found that the facts were as above stated and that if the damage was not caused by rain getting into the hold the cause was unexplained.

Held, that the defendants had failed to carry out the obligation imposed on them by Art. III., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, carefully to stow, keep, and care for the goods, and that, even if the cause of the damage was unexplained, the onus was not on the cargo-owners to prove negligence but on the shipowners to prove that neither they nor their servants had been guilty of negligence contributing to the loss, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed damages from the Shipping Department of the Canadian Government for breach of duty in the carriage of tinplates.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Pilcher appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Miller, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the defendants.

The plaintiffs were engaged in the canning industry in Vancouver, and in February, 1925, they had ordered a quantity of tinplates from Baldwins, Limited, in South Wales. The plates were shipped at Swansea on a steamer, the Canadian Highlander, belonging to the defendants. After they had been taken on board, the steamer went to Liverpool to discharge certain other cargo. While at Liverpool the steamer was damaged by collision with a dock wall, and when the defendants began to do the repairs necessitated by that collision they found that a shaft liner was defective and must be repaired also. In the result part of the cargo had to be shifted, and the steamer was detained at Liverpool for ten weeks. She eventually went to Vancouver and discharged the plaintiffs' tinplates, which, it was found, were to a large extent ruined by rust.

The plaintiffs contended that the plates were in good condition when shipped, and had been damaged owing to the negligence of the defendants in allowing water to reach the cargo.

Another action, brought by the American Canning Company, raised a similar claim in respect of a consignment of tinplates shipped from the works of Richard Thomas and Co. to Vancouver by the same steamer on the same voyage. The two actions were heard together.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs pleaded that the goods were loaded in good order and condition; that the defendants loaded and/or stowed the boxes containing the plates so negligently that many of them were broken and their contents exposed; and that the defendants had also been negligent in shifting and re-stowing the boxes in order to carry out the repairs to the steamer at Liverpool.

By their defence the defendants put in a general denial and referred to conditions in the bill of lading—to the words (a) "shipped in apparent good order and condition," which, they said, amounted only to a description of the goods by the shippers and did not constitute an acknowledgment by the carriers; (b) "tinplates to be deemed insufficiently packed unless in boxes tin-lined and iron-hooped"; and (c) "any statement herein that metal goods of any description have been shipped in apparent good order and condition does not involve any admission by the carrier as to the absence of rust or fresh water damage or other deterioration between tinplates . . . , for which the carrier accepts no responsibility."

They pleaded further that if the plates were damaged it was due to inherent vice, or to insufficient packing because the boxes containing the plates were not tin-lined and were made of unseasoned wood; and that the plaintiffs themselves had been negligent in shipping the goods in wet weather. They further relied on Article IV., rule 2 (a), (c), (d), (i) and (q), of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924.

By their reply the plaintiffs pleaded that the delay at Liverpool constituted a deviation and that the defendants could not, therefore, rely on the exceptions ; and that the defendants had been negligent in not taking care that the plates should not be damaged while the repairs were being carried out.

Mr. JOWITT, in discussing the pleadings, submitted that, if the bill of lading differed from the provisions of the Act, the Act must prevail and the shipowners could not rely on the bill of lading. If delay was necessary for the purpose of making the repairs at Liverpool the defendants should have exercised the power which the contract gave them to trans-ship the goods and should have sent them forward by another ship. Article IV., rule 4, of the Schedule to the Act dealt with the question of deviation and provided that the shipowner should not be liable for any reasonable deviation. Though the delay at Liverpool for repairs might be reasonable from the point of view of the ship, it was not reasonable from the point of view of the cargo-owner.

Evidence having been called for the plaintiffs, Mr. MILLER submitted that the effect of the clause in the bill of lading "shipped in apparent good order and condition," coupled with the fact that complaint was not made at the time of delivery, was that the plaintiffs must prove negligence by the defendants. That was clear from Article III., rule 6, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. which provided as follows :—

"Unless notice of loss or damage and the general nature of such loss or damage be given in writing to the carrier or his agent at the port of discharge before or at the time of the removal of the goods into the custody of the person entitled to delivery thereof under the contract of carriage, or, if the loss or damage be not apparent, within three days, such removal shall be prima facie evidence of the delivery by the carrier of the goods as described in the bill of lading."

That was not inconsistent with the provisions of the earlier rule 2 in Article III., which laid a general obligation on the carrier to "properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for and discharge the goods carried."

The shipper under such a bill of lading as this must prove affirmatively that the carrier had been negligent.

Evidence was then called to show that in loading, stowing, and carrying the goods the servants of the defendants had taken every care. It was suggested that the damage to the plates must have been due to the fact that the boxes containing them were made of wood containing excessive moisture, which had sweated out during the voyage, whereas the plaintiffs had contended that the boxes must have been allowed to get wet by exposure to rain at the time of, or subsequently to, loading, and had remained wet in the hold owing to bad ventilation.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the hearing of which occupied several days, Mr. MILLER addressed the Court. The first matter to be considered was the contract. The policy of the Act was to allow the parties to make contracts for themselves, but subject to a general control provided by the Act. The shipowner was now not under the obligations of an insurer or of a common carrier, but was only under the obligation of an ordinary bailee to take reasonable care. In effect, the Act declared that the shipowner should now be liable only for negligence. He could if he pleased, however, by Article V., accept any further liabilities by special contract.

Mr. JOWITT, interposing, submitted that if a bailee redelivered goods in a worse condition than that in which he received them the burden was on him to show that the deterioration was not due to his negligence.

Mr. MILLER, continuing, submitted that the Act was international in character and, therefore, it was irrelevant to consider the particular law of any one country as it existed before the Act. If other defences failed, the defendants would rely on Article IV., rule 2 (q), and would submit that the words "or without" there must not be read as equivalent to "and without," and that as there had been no actual fault or privity on the part of the defendants themselves there was no liability.

Article III., rule 6, said that if the goods were taken away without notice of damage being given that was prima facie evidence that the goods had been delivered in proper condition, but that provision, relating merely to prima facie evidence, did not justify an inference as to any definite obligation on the shipowner. It was not that the shipowner must pay unless he could bring himself within one or other of the exceptions ; it was for the owner of the goods to show affirmatively that the shipowner had been negligent. It would be enough if he could prove that the condition of the article on delivery was consistent only with negligence by the shipowner. In cases where there was no definite evidence and the shipowners relied on subsection (q) it was enough if their evidence showed that they had been careful in the general performance of their duty (City of Baroda (Cargo Owners) v. Hall Line, Limited, 42 The Times L.R., 717). And even if there was negligence in this case the defendants could rely also on exception (a) of Article IV., rule 2, which provided that the shipowners should not be liable for damage due to the act, neglect, or default of their servants in the management of the ship.

Mr. MILLER then discussed the evidence and submitted that on the facts there was no negligence on the part of the defendants, but that the damage must have been caused by the use of unseasoned wood in making the boxes. All the evidence was consistent with that view, and no alternative had been established.

Mr. JOWITT replied. As to the law, the position was made quite clear by Lord Justice Atkin in The Ruapehu (21 Ll. L., 310). If a man accepted goods as a bailee and failed to return them, or returned them in a damaged condition, the burden of proof was on him to show that he had not failed to exercise reasonable care and skill. Dollar v. Greenfield (reported only in The Times, May 19, 1905) set out the law correctly. Apart from the general law, the Act, by Article III., rule 2, of the Schedule, laid an absolute obligation on the shipowner subject only to the exceptions set out in Article IV., rule 2.

As to the clauses in the bill of lading, Clause 18 provided that tinplates should be deemed insufficiently packed unless packed in tin-lined boxes. But that was only a presumption and did not exclude proof of actual sufficiency of the packing. And on the face of it this clause appeared to be avoided by Article III., rule 8, of the Schedule. In Clause 21 the words "shipped in apparent good order and condition" were only a statement by the shipper and were only intended to prevent any admission by the shipowner as to the condition of goods which he had had no opportunity of seeing.

He referred to Hordern and Sons, Limited v. Commonwealth and Dominion Line, Limited (33 The Times L.R., 344; [1917] 2 K.B., 420), and Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company, Limited (19 The Times L.R., 668; [1903] 2 K.B., 666, at p. 677).

On the facts, the evidence showed that for many years tinplates had been shipped in boxes like those under discussion, and there had never been any complaint, but on this voyage the boxes had been roughly handled on the ship and many of them had been broken.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT stated the facts and said that the damage done to the tinplates was admittedly fresh-water damage. Apart from the delay and detention at Liverpool the voyage was of a normal character.

The plaintiffs had put in affidavits dealing very fully with the damage found at Vancouver, but the defendants' evidence was neither full, precise, nor clear, and he was therefore substantially dependent on the evidence of the plaintiffs. The damage to the Gosse Millard plates was exceptionally serious, and that to the American Canning Company's plates amounted to about 20 per cent.

The real issue was how the damage was caused. Two rival theories had been put forward, one, that it was caused by the inherent defect of the article through the use of unseasoned wood for the packing; and the other, that it was due to wetting from external causes, in particular to exposure to rain during the long stay at Liverpool. It was clear that the goods were not wetted on the way from the works to the dock at Swansea; that no wetting took place during the operation of loading; and that the holds were well ventilated throughout the voyage.

The cause of the damage must be a matter of inference from all the circumstances, and on a review of all the evidence he found it quite impossible to hold that there was anything wrong with the boxes which could account for the damage complained of. On the other hand, during the long stay at Liverpool there must no doubt have been much coming and going in the hold and the hatches must have been removed in whole or in part. Unless exceptional precautions were taken there would be opportunities for rain to get into the hold. He had come to the conclusion that rain did get into the hold at Liverpool in sufficient quantities to account for damage of the kind complained of.

So far as concerned the Gosse Millard shipment, he found as a fact that the damage was due to wetting from rain at Liverpool. The defendants, in ordinary circumstances, exercised great care and skill in dealing with the goods which they carried, and their officers appeared to be admirable seamen. Still, though the negligence was not very blameworthy, he found that they had in this case failed to carry out the obligation imposed on them by Article III., rule 2, of the Act. If he was wrong in that finding the only alternative conclusion was that the cause of the damage was unexplained.

With regard to the claim of the American Canning Company, on the whole of the evidence he had come to the conclusion that the cause of the damage was quite unexplained.

His LORDSHIP continued:—The alternative conclusion at which I have arrived as regards the claim of the plaintiffs Gosse Millard, and the conclusion I have arrived at as regards the claim of the American Canning Company—namely, that the precise cause of the damage cannot be ascertained—makes it necessary to determine as a matter of law on whom is the onus of proof under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, which applies to the shipment in question. The bills of lading were issued in accordance with that Act, as indeed is obligatory under section 3 of the Act, and the bills of lading duly contain an express statement that they are to have effect subject to the rules scheduled to the Act. These rules, which now have statutory force, have radically changed the legal status of sea carriers under bills of lading. According to the previous law, shipowners were generally common carriers or liable to the obligations of common carriers, but were entitled to the utmost freedom of restricting and limiting their liabilities, which they did by elaborate and mostly illegible exceptions and conditions. Under the Act and the rules, which cannot be varied by any bill of lading, their liabilities are precisely determined, and so also are their rights and immunities. In particular Article III. (2) of the rules is in the following terms: "Subject to the provisions of Article IV., the carrier" (which means the carrier and any person employed by him to do the work) "shall properly and carefully load, handle, stow, carry, keep, care for and discharge the goods carried." The word "discharge" is used, I think, in place of the word "deliver," because the period of responsibility to which the Act and rules apply (Article I. (e)) ends when they are discharged from the ship. Article III. (3) requires the bill of lading to state, inter alia, "the apparent order and condition of the goods," that is, on shipment. The words "properly discharge," I think, mean deliver from the ship's tackle in the same apparent order and condition, unless the carrier can excuse himself under Article IV. Hence the carrier's failure so to deliver must constitute a prima facie breach of his obligations, casting on him the onus to excuse that breach. That this is so, I think, is confirmed by the language of Article IV. (1), which deals with unseaworthiness, which, for the purpose I am considering, I disregard, but in respect of which the carrier must prove the exercise of due diligence. Article IV. (2) contains a long list of matters in respect of loss or damage arising or resulting from which the carrier is not to be liable; these excepted causes (c) to (p) inclusive, except (l), are all matters beyond the control of the carrier or his servants, such as sea perils, acts of God, restraint of princes, riots, inherent vice of the goods, &c.; (l) relates to deviation to save life and property; (a) deals with neglect in the navigation and management of the ship, which falls, I think, under a category different from the case of the cargo; (b) relates to fire and gives, following previous statutory protection, a wide exemption. Finally (q) is in these terms: "Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage." I read the second "or" in the above paragraph as meaning "and." In this I agree with the recent decision of Mr. Justice MacKinnon.

The words of the paragraph last cited expressly refer to the carrier as claiming the benefit of the exception, and I think impliedly as regards each of the other exceptions the same onus is on the carrier: he must claim the benefit of the exception, and that is because he has to relieve himself of the prima facie breach of contract in not delivering the goods in condition as received from the ship. I do not think the terms of Article III. put the preliminary onus on the goods owner to give affirmative evidence that the carrier was negligent. It is enough if the goods owner proves either that the goods were not delivered or were delivered damaged. The carrier is a bailee and it is for him to show that he took reasonable care of the goods while in his custody (which includes the custody of his servants on his behalf) and bring himself, if there be loss or damage, within the specified immunities. It is, I think, the general rule applicable in English law to the position of bailees that the defendant (the bailee) is bound to restore the subject of the bailment in the same condition as that in which he received it, and it is for the defendant to explain or offer valid excuse for not having done so. It was for him to prove that reasonable care had been exercised. This was the language of Chief Justice Erle in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Scott v. London and St. Katherine Docks Company (3 H. and C., 596), adopted by the House of Lords in Dollar v. Greenfield (The Times, May 19, 1905). In Travers v. Cooper (30 The Times L.R., 703; [1915] 1 K.B., 73), Lord Justice Buckley, at page 88, to the same effect used the following language: "The defendant as bailee of the goods is responsible for their return to their owner. If he failed to return them it rested upon him to prove that he did take reasonable and proper care of the goods, and that if he had been there he could have done nothing, and that the loss would still have resulted. He has not discharged himself of that onus." The Lord Justice also quotes from an unreported case of Morison, Pollexfen and Blair v. Walton the words of Lord Halsbury: "It appears to me that here there was a bailment made to a particular person, a bailment for hire and reward, and the bailee was bound to show that he took reasonable and proper care for the due security and proper delivery of that bailment; the proof of that rested upon him." The principle is also discussed by Lord Justice Atkin in The Ruapehu (21 Ll. L., 310), who points out that it is wrong to say that the onus does not arise until the bailor has first shown some negligence on the part of the bailee. I think this principle of onus of proof is applicable to the carrier under the Act; indeed in the general exception of Article IV., 2 (q), it is expressly laid down. In the facts of this case, if the shipowners claim (as they do in their pleading) the benefit of that exception, in that the damage was due to wet or damp, they can only so claim on the terms of negativing fault or privity.

So far I have limited my consideration to the terms of the Act and rules. But the bill of lading, after acknowledging receipt of the goods in apparent good order and condition, contains an express term "for delivery from the ship's tackle at Vancouver." This means, in my opinion, in like apparent good order and condition, and is an express undertaking to that effect. If (contrary to my opinion) that express undertaking goes beyond what the carrier's liability is under the Act and rules, that more extended liability will bind him by reason of Article V. of the rules.

Finally, I rely on the language of Lord Sumner, used with reference to the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1904 (now repealed by the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924), which sums up principles equally relevant to the Sea Carriage of Goods Act which I am considering. The reference is Bradley and Sons, Limited v. Federal Steam Navigation Company, Limited (27 Ll. L., 395), where at page 396 Lord Sumner said: "The bill of lading described the goods as 'shipped in apparent good order and condition' and proceeded 'and to be delivered at the ship's anchorage from her deck (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the Port of London.' Though the usual words 'in the like good order and condition' do not appear after the word 'delivered,' it was common ground that the ship had to deliver what she received as she had received it, unless relieved by excepted perils. Accordingly, in strict law, on proof being given of the actual good condition of the apples on shipment and of their damaged condition on arrival, the burden of proof passed from the consignees to the shipowners to prove some excepted peril which relieved them from liability, and further, as a condition of being allowed the benefit of that exception, to prove seaworthiness at Hobart, the port of shipment, and to negative negligence or misconduct of the master, officers, and crew with regard to the apples during the voyage and the discharge in this country."

On the above grounds, if the true conclusion be that the cause of the damage to the tinplates has not been ascertained but is left in doubt, I think the defendants have not discharged the onus upon them to negative negligence of their servants and to prove some excepted peril, and hence must be held liable.

Mr. Miller further relied on Article IV., 2 (a), and contended that if there was neglect on the part of the defendants' servants, it was "in the management of the ship," so that the defendants would be excused. But if the tinplates were damaged through the negligent admission of rain water into the hold at Liverpool, I do not think that that constituted a case of management of the ship. These words refer to matters affecting the ship as a ship, its safety as such, which however might incidentally affect the cargo, such as improperly opening sea connexions, so as indirectly to damage the cargo. The principle was so stated in Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company, Limited (19 The Times L.R., 668; [1903] 2 K.B., 666), where it was somewhat subtly applied to the management of refrigerating machinery, on the ground that its functions were not limited to cooling cargo. I think that in the present case the protection of the tinplate cargo fell under Article III. (2), and not Article IV., 2 (a). Any other view would largely nullify the former provision.

I need only refer to one other matter. Mr. Miller relied on Article 18 of the bill of lading, "The following are not to be deemed sufficiently packed: (a) Tinplates in boxes unless tin-lined and iron-hooped." This provision, if it received effect, would relieve the shipowner from his statutory liability in respect of the actual goods he received for carriage. It would substitute a conventional for an actual liability because the boxes were not tin-lined and no one according to the evidence thought they were. Such a fictitious case of insufficiency of packing involves, I think, an infringement of Article III. (8), because it lessens the shipowners' liability to deliver the actual goods received as received otherwise than as provided by the rules, and is, I think, accordingly null and void and of no effect. (See Hordern and Sons, Limited v. Commonwealth and Dominion Line, Limited (33 The Times L.R., 344; [1917] 2 K.B., 420), and Australasian United Steam Navigation Company v. Hunt ([1921] 2 A.C., 351).

The result is that there will be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

A stay of execution was granted.

A. H. BULL AND CO. v. WEST AFRICAN SHIPPING AGENCY AND LIGHTERAGE COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Negligence—Servant lent—Responsibility for negligence.

When one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in it, must be regarded as the servant of the man to whom he is lent, though remaining the general servant of the person who lent him.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria (Mr. Justice Maxwell dissenting) reversing a decision of Mr. Justice Tew in the Divisional Court.

Mr. George Langton, K.C., and Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., appeared for the appellants; Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Mr. G. St. C. Pilcher for the respondents.

Lord Shaw, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Nigeria reversing, on March 8, 1926, by a majority, the judgment of the Divisional Court, dated December 21, 1925. The Divisional Court had given judgment in favour of the appellants (the plaintiffs) for £2,376 5s. 2d. with interest and costs.

The substance of the claim was for the value of a lighter which became a total loss in circumstances about to be mentioned.

The facts are very simple. Both parties are shipowners, and according to the requirements of their trade the one is in the habit of letting lighters to the other. In June, 1925, the plaintiffs, as agents for the United Shipping Board Corporation Emergency Fleet, let on hire to the defendants a lighter. There was no written agreement of hiring. Part of the agreement was that the lighter should be, as is usual, manned by two lighter boys, that is, coloured labourers. The lighter was transferred on June 2, and the mischance sued for occurred upon the night of June 5. The coloured labourers were, from the moment of the transfer, out of the control of the plaintiffs, and subject to the orders and under control of the defendants.

The use to which the defendants put the lighter was for the purpose of loading ground nuts on to their steamship Rijnland. She was lying in the harbour of Lagos, and on the evening of June 5, 1925, a strong ebb tide was running. Among the duties to be performed by the labourers was, of course, the obedience to all orders regarding the attachment of the lighter to the Rijnland: and it was a necessity of the case that they, or one of them, should be on board to do for themselves, or to obey orders to do, what was required should the ropes be unable to stand the strain of the current. The simplest of all things would have been to catch a rope if thrown from the Rijnland, and the boatswain of the Rijnland explains that if one of the boys had been there he would have thrown a rope.

Unfortunately both of the labourers had decamped; and they had forsaken the duties which they were bound to perform, both of taking charge of the barge, and of giving obedience to the orders of the officers of the Rijnland. The consequence was that the barge, having parted her moorings, drifted with the current out of the harbour of Lagos, and subsequently ran ashore at a point about six miles distant therefrom and broke up before she could be salved.

These are substantially the relevant facts as found in the judgment pronounced by the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Tew. Their Lordships think it right to say in a word, with regard to that judgment, that in their opinion the learned Judge not only came to a right conclusion upon the facts, but that his review as a clear and accurate review of this part of the law, and the decided cases thereon, meets with the Board's entire approval.

The Full Court (Mr. Justice Maxwell dissenting) reversed this judgment—in particular upon the ground that there was no evidence that the lighter boys were at any time necessary except when the craft was under way or in active use. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses had said, "I do not think it advisable as a precaution for one lighter boy to remain on board all night. I don't think it could do any good." Upon this the learned Chief Justice observes:—

"I can find nowhere in the other evidence before the Court an expression of an opinion to the contrary of that held and expressed by the plaintiffs' representative."

Their Lordships have some difficulty in understanding this opinion, which seems to be quite out of accord, not only with the defendants' evidence, but with the admissions made in the Court below.

Fontein, the defendants' agent, swore:—

"When a lighter is alongside a ship at night my boys have orders to remain on board the lighter all night."

Brunt, the master of the Rijnland, says:—

"There was nobody on board that lighter. If there had been anybody to throw a line to, lighter would have been saved."

And on the special point in issue Van Duyn, the boatswain of the Rijnland says plainly:—

"In my opinion all lighter boys ought stay on lighter."

It is somewhat difficult to understand how such evidence should have been disregarded or rather stated to have been non-existent. Their Lordships do not refer further to the matter except to say that they think that the proved facts are correctly viewed by Mr. Justice Tew and not by the Full Court.

The Full Court, however, went further, and held on the question—"Would the owner of a lighter taking reasonable precautions for the safety of the lighter . . . keep a boy on board the lighter at night?" in the negative. In the opinion of their Lordships this was wrong. The plaintiffs had entrusted for the period of the hiring the control of their chattel to the defendants. The lighter was manned by two coloured labourers, and from the very nature of the case the lighter and the men both went out of the control of the plaintiffs, and it is unreasonable to suggest that this control only lasted while the active work of lighterage was being carried on; and the suggestion that the lighter boys passed into the control of the defendants during that active lighterage, but out of the control and back into the service of the plaintiffs when the ship was tied up for the night, seems to have nothing to commend it. The sense, as well as the law, of the position is that during the entire period of hiring the barge had to be watched over by the bailee, and it was the bailee's duties to keep an eye upon the labourers, or to furnish others so that the chattel might not be lost.

Upon the law of the case, it may be said, the facts being as just put, that the cleavage of opinion in Laugher v. Pointer (5 B. and C., 547), in which the Judges were equally divided, has been long disposed of in Quarman v. Burnett (6 M. and W., 499). Baron Parke thus dealt with it at p. 509 :—

"We are therefore compelled to decide upon the question left unsettled by the case of Laugher v. Pointer (supra). . . . We have considered [the judgments] fully, and we think the weight of authority, and legal principle, is in favour of the view taken by Lord Tenterden and Mr. Justice Littledale."

Quarman's case (supra) was stronger on the facts than that of Laugher (supra). In Laugher's case (supra) the facts had been that the owner of a carriage hired a pair of horses to draw it for a day, and the owner of the horses provided a driver through whose negligent driving an injury was done to a horse belonging to a third person. In Quarman's case (supra) the owners of the carriage were in the habit of hiring horses from the same person, to drive them for a day, or for a drive. The owner provided a driver through whose negligence an injury was done to a third party, and it was held that the owners of the carriage were not liable to be sued for such injury. It appeared that the hiring was quite a customary thing, so much so that the owner of the carriage even provided the driver with a livery which he left at his house at the end of each drive.

Their Lordships think it only necessary to refer to Donovan v. Laing (9 The Times L.R., 313 ; [1893] 1 Q.B., 629) for a clear exposition of the question to whom attaches responsibility for the act of a servant transferred, so to speak, for the convenience of working a chattel lent or hired to another. In a sense, that is to say, a general sense, he is the servant of the master who sends him, but upon the practical point of responsibility when he is doing the work of and under the orders or control of the other employer to whom he is sent, he is, in the eye of the law, the servant of the latter and the latter is, in the eye of the law, his employer.

In Donovan's case (supra) the defendants contracted to lend to a firm who were engaged in loading a ship a crane with a man in charge of it ; the man received directions from the firm or their servants as to the working of the crane, and the defendants had no control in the matter. It was held that though the man in charge of the crane remained the general servant of the defendants, yet as they had parted with the power of controlling him with regard to the matter on which he was engaged, they were not liable for his negligence while so employed.

Lord Justice Bowen put the matter thus :—

"The law on the matter now before us seems to me to be perfectly clear. . . . We have only to consider in whose employment the man was at the time when the acts complained of were done, in this sense, that by the employer is meant the person who has a right at the moment to control the doing of the act. . . . It is clear here that the defendants placed their man at the disposal of Jones and Co., and did not have any control over the work he was to do."

The same law had practically been laid down in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Company (2 C.P.D., 205). In the opinion of their Lordships the law stands exactly where Chief Justice Cockburn there put it, namely, as follows :—

"When one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he is lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him."

These cases have a habit of repeating themselves, and there are others in the books to the same effect, but their Lordships think it only necessary to refer to Bain v. Central Vermont Railway Company, decided by this Board ([1921] 2 A.C., 412), in which Lord Dunedin approves of the language of Mr. Justice Cross in the Court of the King's Bench of Quebec, who had adopted the suitable phraseology of "patron momentané" and "patron habituel." The responsibility in respect of which negligence on the part of a servant in circumstances such as of that and of the present case attaches to the former and not to the latter.

Two further points may be mentioned in a word. It is argued that the men's absence from the barge was not negligence. They had deserted their duty at a moment, as it turned out, which was critical for the safety of the ship. While doing so, and at that moment, they were in the service of the defendants. The defendants had not provided any other servants to supply their place, in what was a continuous duty. It seems out of the question to suggest that these circumstances did not constitute negligence for which the respondents were responsible.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal ought to be allowed ; the judgment of the Full Court set aside with costs ; and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored.

The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal.

EASTMAN'S, LIMITED v. SHAW.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Trading profits—Deduction—Multiple shops—Control by head office—Shops opened and closed as demanded by business as a whole—Difference between cost of fitting new shops and receipts from sale of equivalent second-hand fittings from closed shops—Capital expenditure—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case I.

A trading company, carrying on business through a number of branch shops which were all subject to control by the head office, followed a policy of opening and closing branch shops as was demanded by the business as a whole.

Held, that the difference between the cost of new fixtures, fittings and utensils for the new shops and the receipts from the sale of equivalent second-hand fixtures, &c., from the shops that were closed was a capital expenditure and was not a revenue expenditure which could be debited to the trading account of the company to ascertain the profits which were assessable to income-tax.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the division of Finsbury in the county of Middlesex.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the division of Finsbury, Middlesex, held on January 27, 1926, for the purpose of hearing appeals, the appellants, Eastman's, Limited, appealed against assessments made upon them under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts for each of the years ending April 5, 1922, 1923, and 1924 in the undermentioned amounts in respect of the profits from their business as butchers and meat retailers carried on by them at their registered office, 91, Charterhouse-street, Finsbury, and at their various retail shops throughout Great Britain and Ireland, viz. :—

For the year ending April 5,	1922 ..	£256,000
„ „ „	1923 ..	300,000
„ „ „	1924 ..	300,000

These assessments were made upon the appellants in respect of their profits from the business as a whole, and no allowance for wear and tear of machinery or plant had been claimed or made.

The following facts were admitted or proved :—

It was part of the policy of the appellants in carrying on their business to open retail shops throughout the British Isles for the disposal of meat.

In selecting the places and positions in which such shops should be acquired, and in acquiring such shops, the appellants had to bear in mind, not only the potentialities of such shops in themselves, but also the probable effects of carrying on such shops in relation to their business as a whole, the shops being merely branches or departments of that business. In these circumstances it became necessary to open and close shops as the bearing of the business done through them could be estimated in relation to their business as a whole.

The appellants found it less expensive and generally advantageous to dispose of the fixtures, fittings, &c., in shops given up and to acquire other such fixtures, fittings, &c., for new shops acquired by them rather than to transfer the fixtures, fittings, &c., from one shop to another.

Where a new shop was opened in place of a shop that had been given up and the fixtures, &c., installed in the new shop were equivalent to the old fixtures, the excess of the cost of the new fixtures over the price obtained for the old fixtures was treated as revenue expenditure and was debited in the trading account. The sole question before the Court arose in respect of such excess expenditure.

The following statement shows the number of shops employed in the appellants' business in each of the years 1911-22 :—

In the year	1911	1,447
„ „	1912	1,404
„ „	1913	1,291
„ „	1914	1,148
„ „	1915	910
„ „	1916	860
„ „	1917	787
„ „	1918	750
„ „	1919	749
„ „	1920	756
„ „	1921	766
„ „	1922	804

For the three years ending December 31, 1922, the number of shops actually closed and the number of shops opened were :—

During the year	1920 ..	Closed 23	Opened 30
„ „	1921 ..	„ 7	„ 17
„ „	1922 ..	„ 6	„ 44

The expenditure incurred in providing utensils for and in fitting up the new shops for the purpose of carrying on trade therein and the amounts received from the sale of the fittings of the shops closed during the same years were :—

For the year 1920 :—
Expenditure		£833
Receipts		393
		£440
For the year 1921 :—
Expenditure		£4,808
Receipts		434
		£4,374
For the year 1922 :—
Expenditure		£8,067
Receipts		757
		£7,310

It was contended on behalf of the appellants (inter alia) :—(1) that in determining whether expenditure was revenue or capital expenditure it was necessary to look at the nature, scope and policy of the trade assessed, and (2) that on the facts and in the circumstances of this case the excess expenditure referred to was revenue expenditure and, on income-tax principles, an admissible deduction from profits.

The following cases, amongst others, were referred to :—

Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting (30 The Times L.R., 588 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 674).

Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles (8 The Times L.R., 618 ; [1892] A.C., 309).

Usher's Wiltshire Brewery Company, Limited v. Bruce (31 The Times L.R., 104 ; [1915] A.C., 433).

St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton v. Shearsmith (3 The Times L.R., 732 ; 19 Q.B.D., 624).

Smith v. Westinghouse Brake Company (4 The Times L.R., 649).

Granite Supply Association, Limited v. Kitton (8 F., 55).

Southwell v. Savill Brothers, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 513 ; [1901] 2 K.B., 349).

The respondent, the Inspector of Taxes, contended (inter alia) :—(1) that the deduction claimed by the appellants in respect of the expenditure incurred by them in fitting up and opening new shops was not authorized by Rule 3 (d) of the Rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or otherwise, and (2) that the said expenditure was capital expenditure and was not a proper debit item to be charged against the incomings of the trade when computing the balance of the profits for the purpose of assessment to income-tax.

It was agreed between the parties hereto that in the event of the General Commissioners giving their decision in favour of the appellants the profits liable to assessment to income-tax as disclosed by the accounts should be taken to be :—

For the year ending

April 5, 1922 : £236,781, less wear and tear, £3,132,

April 5, 1923 : £300,777, less wear and tear, £30,915,

April 5, 1924 : £298,660, less wear and tear, £31,332, but that if the decision were adverse to the appellants the amounts assessable to income-tax should be taken to be

For the year ending

April 5, 1922 : £236,921, less wear and tear, £3,132.

April 5, 1923 : £302,301, less wear and tear, £30,915.

April 5, 1924 : £302,499, less wear and tear, £31,332.

The General Commissioners, having heard and considered the appeal and the evidence and contentions, were of opinion :—

(1) That it was part of the policy of the appellants to open and to close shops whenever the state of trade made it desirable.

(2) That the question whether the expenditure incurred in opening shops was or was not of a capital nature was not affected by the fact that the appellants owned a large number of shops.

(3) That the expenses of fitting up new shops less the sums received for the fittings of shops that had been closed were expenses incurred at a time anterior to the carrying on of the trade and were of a capital nature and not an allowable deduction as an expense of running the business.

(4) That the assessments to income-tax made upon the appellants ought to be adjusted as follows :—

For the year ending

April 5, 1922, to £236,921, less wear and tear, £3,132,

April 5, 1923, to £302,301, less wear and tear, £30,915,

April 5, 1924, to £302,499, less wear and tear, £31,332, and the General Commissioners adjusted the assessments accordingly.

Dissatisfaction with this determination was expressed on behalf of the appellants as being erroneous in point of law, and in due course the General Commissioners were required to state this case for the opinion of the High Court.

Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the appellants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt delivered judgment in favour of the Crown as follows :—

The figures which are given in the case in respect of the number of the appellants' shops in 1920, 1921, and 1922 reveal that many more, and increasingly many more, shops were opened by them than were closed, and that there was a consequently increasing difference between the expenditure of fitting up new shops and the receipts from dismantling old shops. The contention that a trader is entitled to bring into revenue account any part of an expenditure which he makes so that he may add to the number of his shops would be unarguable, and I cannot believe that that is the point which arises here. One of the paragraphs in the case states : "Where a new shop was opened in place of a shop that had been given up and the fixtures, &c., installed in the new shop were equivalent to the old fixtures, the excess of the cost of the new fixtures over the price obtained for the old fixtures was treated as revenue expenditure. . . ." and I understand that the question for my decision arises in respect of the excess described there, namely, the excess of the cost of new fittings and utensils over the receipts from the sale of equivalent second-hand fittings and utensils. The expenditure of the appellants was not to maintain or replace fittings and utensils, but was for the cost of equivalent fittings and utensils rendered necessary by the circumstance that the appellants "scrapped" those which they had and bought new ones for their new shops.

I do not think that it is disputed that, if a trader has one shop and he gives that up and takes another shop somewhere else, selling the fittings and utensils of his old shop and buying new ones for the new shop, and loses money in the process, he cannot deduct the amount of that loss from his profit for income-tax purposes. The loss on the old fittings is a capital expenditure. The cost of the new fittings is a capital expenditure. If, by selling some of the old fittings, he secures some salvage of his loss on them it is so much the less capital expenditure in amount. That seems to me to appear from Smith v. Westinghouse Brake Company (4 The Times L.R., 649) and Granite Supply Association, Limited v. Kitton (8 F., 55).

Does it make any difference that a man has 20 shops and moves each of them in the same way ? If he does he merely multiplies the expenditure by 20, and it cannot be argued that the multiplication makes the expenditure a revenue expenditure. Mr. Needham says that in the appellants' business there is another element—that their business was not a group of 800 separate businesses but was one business in London with shops throughout the country which were merely parts of the business, and that the appellants have not moved the whole of any business. I cannot see how that circumstance can make any difference. The fact remains that the appellants moved these shops and incurred expense in doing so. The fact that they conducted all their shops from London, thus placing them under one control, cannot possibly make any difference.

Mr. Needham points out that it is found in the case that it was of the essence of the appellants' business that they should keep moving their shops. The General Commissioners find that "it was part of the policy of the appellants to open and to close shops whenever the state of trade made it desirable." Mr. Needham says that the business was really that of a travelling butcher. A travelling butcher who has his stall in one town to-day and in another town to-morrow may very well charge the expenses of travelling and moving his stall and other belongings from town to town as the expenses of his business, but that argument fails here, as this is not a travelling business. It is, to borrow an expression from Granite Supply Association, Limited v. Kitton (supra), a "flitting" business. The appellants substitute a shop which is of a permanent nature, however short may be the time during which it is occupied by them, for another shop which has also been of a permanent nature. That is different from travelling with their business from place to place.

In these circumstances I feel no doubt that my decision must be in favour of the Crown.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PAINE.*

Insurance (Unemployment) — Contributions — Employer's failure to pay — Jurisdiction of justices — Limitation of 12 months' arrears—Claim to recover previous arrears—Effect of justices' order — Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 22 (3) (6).

Under s. 22 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, the jurisdiction of the justices, on a conviction for failure to pay contributions under the Act, is limited to 12 months' arrears.

Held, that if the jurisdiction of the justices is invoked under that section and they make an order for payment of the 12 months' arrears, the sum paid under the order is not to be treated as a payment in satisfaction of all arrears in respect of the same employee, and other proceedings can be taken in any competent Court to recover the arrears for any period preceding the 12 months.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 378) reversed.

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 378).

On an information the Attorney-General claimed from Mr. Ernest James Paine, of Market-street, Wisbech, the sum of £5 0s. 2d., being the balance of arrears of contributions alleged to be payable by him under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920 to 1926, in respect of two men employed by Mr. Paine for various periods between April 14, 1924, and February 6, 1926.

The full amount of unpaid contributions in respect of the two men was £10 15s. 11d., but on April 22, 1926, the respondent was convicted by justices on two informations for non-payment of contributions in respect of the two men and was ordered, after due notice, to pay, and had paid, the sum of £5 3s. 1d., being a sum equal to the amount of the contributions unpaid for 12 months preceding the informations. Credit was also given for stamps irregularly affixed to the value of 12s. 8d.

The respondent contended that the payment of the amount ordered by the justices was a satisfaction of his liability by virtue of section 22 (3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, which provides :—

"Where an employer has been convicted under the foregoing provisions of this section of the offence of failing or neglecting to pay any contribution under this Act, he shall be liable to pay to the unemployment fund a sum equal to the amount which he has so failed or neglected to pay, and on such a conviction, if notice of the intention to do so has been served with the summons or warrant, evidence may be given of the failure or neglect on the part of the employer to pay other contributions in respect of the same person during the year preceding the date when the information was so laid, and on proof of such failure or neglect the employer shall be liable to pay to the unemployment fund a sum equal to the total of all the contributions which he is so proved to have failed or neglected to pay. Any sum paid by an employer under the foregoing provision shall be treated as a payment in satisfaction of the unpaid contributions. . . ."

By subsection (6) :—"Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the Minister from recovering any sums due to the unemployment fund by means of civil proceedings, and all such sums shall be recoverable as debts due to the Crown, and without prejudice to any other remedy may be recovered by the Minister summarily as a civil debt."

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that, the civil jurisdiction of the magistrates having been invoked and an order for payment made thereunder, no other civil proceedings could be taken. He dismissed the information.

The Attorney-General appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. C. W. Lilley appeared for the appellant; Mr. Linton Thorp for the respondent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the appeal must be allowed. By section 1 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, employed persons as defined by reference to the Schedule were to be insured against unemployment. Section 2 gave insured persons the right to receive payments specified in the Act and referred to as unemployment benefit. By section 5 certain contributions were to be made by employers. Section 14 provided for the establishment of an unemployment fund into which contributions were to be paid. The Act contemplated the possibility of failure or neglect on the part of the employer to pay his contributions, and section 22 (2) provided that that failure or neglect should be an offence for which he could on conviction be fined a sum not exceeding £10. Every time that an employer failed to pay a contribution he committed a separate offence.

So far, therefore, there was punishment for non-compliance. Then subsection (3) provided that where an employer had been convicted for failing to pay any contribution he became liable to pay to the unemployment fund a sum equal to the amount which he had failed or neglected to pay. And notice might be served on the employer requiring him to pay other contributions which he was proved not to have paid in respect of the same person within the year preceding the date of the information.

His LORDSHIP read the final words of section 22 (3), and proceeded. So far, there was a scheme for the recovery before the magistrates of money due. Mr. Justice Rowlatt had held that that was a special and exclusive remedy, in spite of subsection (6). His LORDSHIP read the subsection, and, proceeding, said that Mr. Justice Rowlatt seemed to have thought that the scheme provided under subsections (2) and (3) was a scheme which, although not entirely exclusive, yet, if once put into force, excluded any other remedy by civil proceedings. That construction appeared to overlook the proviso contained in subsection (6), the words of which appeared plainly to indicate that the rights given to the Minister to recover sums due to the unemployment fund were not merely alternative, but cumulative.

He (his Lordship) was quite unable to accept the view of the Judge below, which had the effect of saying that the Minister might collect as much as he could by taking criminal proceedings, but that he had no alternative rights. In his (the Master of the Rolls') opinion, the right to recover unpaid contributions as a civil debt was preserved. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the informant for £5 0s. 2d.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON said that he agreed and would not add anything, but for the fact that the Court was differing from the judgment delivered below. But for that judgment he would have thought that the case was perfectly clear. Parliament had provided that if a man was prosecuted for failure to pay weekly contributions towards unemployment insurance, the Crown might give evidence of his failure or neglect to pay other contributions in respect of the same person during the year preceding the information, and he might be ordered to pay the total of such contributions, "which he is so proved to have failed or neglected to pay," "In satisfaction of the unpaid contributions" meant in satisfaction of the contributions due and unpaid in the year preceding the date of the information. On the plain words of the section, read so far, he (his Lordship) would have thought there was no difficulty in recovering other unpaid contributions. But the matter did not stop there, for subsection (6) provided that nothing in the section was to prevent the recovery of "any sums" due to the unemployment fund by means of civil proceedings. Mr. Justice Rowlatt's judgment had prevented the Minister of Labour from recovering sums due to the unemployment fund. He (his Lordship) was quite unable to follow the distinctions made by the learned Judge.

Lord Justice Sargant said that there were two crucial questions in the case: (1) what was the meaning of the phrase "the unpaid contributions," and (2) what was the construction of subsection (6). On both those questions he (his Lordship) agreed with the judgments which had been delivered, that the appeal should be allowed.

NORWICH UNION v. HENSTEAD UNION.*

Poor Law—Derivative settlement—Father of pauper living but having no settlement—Mother not "widowed"—Reversion to birth settlement—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 61), s. 35.

A pauper whose father is living, but is an alien with no settlement in this country, cannot take a derivative settlement from his or her mother under s. 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, because the mother is not "widowed." In these circumstances—which appear to be a casus omissus—the pauper, in the absence of a settlement acquired by residence, retains the settlement of birth.

This was a case stated under section 11 of Baines' Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 45) before an appeal to Norfolk Quarter Sessions.

On November 5, 1926, the respondents obtained an order under the hands and seals of two justices of the peace for the county of Norfolk whereby it was adjudged that the parish of Norwich, in the county borough of Norwich, was the place of the last legal settlement of one Alice Louise Dezert, aged about 30 years (a pauper lunatic confined in the asylum for the said county of Norfolk, and chargeable to the common fund of the Henstead Poor Law Union in the said county), and whereby the appellants were ordered to pay certain sums of money in respect of the expenses of maintenance of the said pauper lunatic. The appellants having duly given notice of appeal to Quarter Sessions this case was stated.

Alice Louise Dezert was the lawful child of Edmond Eugene Dezert and Suzannah Dezert, formerly Ashley, who were married at Norwich on December 17, 1892. The said Alice Louise Dezert was born in the parish of Great Yarmouth on June 19, 1896, and after that date resided in various parishes in England with her father until about 1901, when she accompanied him to France and did not return until 1920. From 1920 till 1925 she resided in various parishes in England, and on December 20, 1925, she was removed from her mother's house in the parish of Framingham Pigot, in the respondents' union, to the Norfolk County Asylum, wherein she was thereafter maintained as a pauper lunatic chargeable to the respondents until November 5, 1926, when the before-mentioned order of justices was made.

The said Edmond Eugene Dezert was a native and subject of France. He resided in various parishes in England from the time of his marriage in 1892 until the year 1901, when he returned to France, where he had ever since resided. At no time did he acquire a legal settlement in this country.

The said Suzannah Dezert resided with the said Edmond Eugene Dezert from the date of the said marriage in 1892 until 1920, when she left him in France and returned to England, where she had ever since resided. The said Suzannah Dezert was born in or about May, 1859, in the parish of Norwich, and she resided in such parish for a term of three years and upwards prior to her marriage in such manner and under such circumstances as to acquire a settlement by residence therein by virtue of section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876.

The appellants contended that the pauper lunatic must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Great Yarmouth by reason of her birth therein.

The respondents contended that the said Alice Louise Dezert must be deemed to have derived the same settlement as her mother—viz., in the parish of Norwich.

Mr. Herbert Davey appeared for the appellants; Mr. Hugh Goitein (Mr. A. S. Leighton with him) for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a special case stated before going to Quarter Sessions under the provisions of Baines' Act. It is only necessary, I think, to summarize the facts of the case. The short point is that a pauper lunatic whose father was a native and subject of France and at no time acquired a legal settlement in England became chargeable as a pauper lunatic in a certain place. An application was then made for an order of justices, and that order provided that the charge for her fell upon Norwich on the ground that she was settled as a pauper in Norwich. The argument of the appellants was that she could not be settled in Norwich because that meant a derivative settlement from her mother, and that she must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Great Yarmouth, inasmuch as she was born in that parish.

The question turns upon the true construction of section 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act of 1876. That section provides as follows: "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband and in the case of a child under the age of 16, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." There have undoubtedly been cases in which a portion of section 35 has had to be construed by the Courts, and some difference of opinion, to which it is not perhaps desirable to apply epithets, has made itself manifest. But we are expressly told that upon this particular point there is no authority, and the matter comes before this Court as res integra. In the case of West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union (21 The Times L.R., 713, at p. 715 ; [1905] A.C., 450, at p. 453) Lord Macnaghten, speaking of the first clause of section 35, said : "By the first clause of section 35 all derivative settlements are abolished with two exceptions—one in the case of a wife, which has no application to the present question ; the other in the case of a legitimate child under the age of 16," and that, if I may say so with great respect, seems to be a perfectly clear analysis of a sufficiently clear provision in the statute. "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person . . . except"—the section begins with a universal negative proposition ; it then proceeds to particular and limited exceptions, and, so far as a child is concerned, the exception is expressly limited to the case of a child under the age of 16, "which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother. . . ." The section, it may be, assumed that in the case of any child, with regard to whom a question of derivative settlement might arise, there would be either a father from whom a settlement might be derived, or, alternatively, a widowed mother from whom a settlement might be derived ; in other words, it regarded, it may be, those two cases as being, taken together, exhaustive, and so the words were added, "as the case may be." The Legislature does not appear to have contemplated a third case in which, while the father still lives, and, therefore, the mother is not a widow, the child cannot derive a settlement from the father, inasmuch as the father, being a native and subject of France as in this case, never acquired a settlement. If that be the true construction, the particular case revealed by the facts in this appeal is a casus omissus, and as no case comes within the exception except the cases which are expressly mentioned, it would follow that the enacting words apply. Whether the true view be that this is a casus omissus, or whether it be that the Legislature must be taken to have considered this case and not included it within the exception, in either event, as it seems to me upon the clear construction of this part of this section, this case is not included within the exception.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It follows, therefore, that with regard to this pauper lunatic there is no possibility of a derivative settlement, and so the question what is her settlement depends upon other considerations, and she is remitted for that purpose to the place of her birth. In 1849, in the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of All Saints, Derby (14 Q.B., 207, at p. 216), Mr. Justice Coleridge said : "It is an established principle that every English subject has a settlement by birth, prima facie ; that is, till an acquired settlement is shown."

In the course of the argument, various matters have been stirred, which, in my opinion, do not really arise. We are not concerned here with the true interpretation, whatever it may be, of the third part of this section. We are dealing, and we are dealing for the first time, with the true interpretation of the first part of this section upon the particular facts of this case. Regarding the matter in that way, I think that this appeal succeeds.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I am of the same opinion, and I incline to the view that the present case is a casus omissus from this statute ; in other words, that section 35, in the first branch of it, contemplates that every child under the age of 16 will either have a father who has a settlement, or, if the father is dead, that it will have a widowed mother who has a settlement. In the present case, this pauper when she was under 16, and in fact since that time, has neither had a father with a settlement of his own, nor has she had a widowed mother with a settlement of her own ; the result is that she is a person who is, by the statute, not to be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, and, secondly, is relegated to the place of her birth, which is her settlement. I agree, therefore, that the judgment should be entered for the appellants here.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—I agree.

EVERTON v. WALKER.*

By-law — Reasonableness — Ultra vires — Restraint of trade—Severn Navigation Acts, 1842 to 1920.

By the Severn Navigation Act, 1920, s. 9, extending s. 16 of the Severn Navigation Act, 1914, the Severn Commissioners were empowered to make by-laws "for prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked. . . ."

None of their enabling Acts empowered the Commissioners to impose tolls on persons embarking or disembarking.

To prevent the dangerous racing of rival steamers starting from private landing-stages at Worcester, the Commissioners made a by-law : "No person shall anchor or moor any passenger vessel near to or against any portion of Worcester Quay for the purpose of enabling any passenger to be taken on board or disembarked from such passenger vessel . . . if and so long as the Corporation of the City of Worcester maintain . . . a pier . . . or piers . . . connected with the quay and available for giving access from the quay to a passenger vessel . . . and allow any persons desirous of travelling by a passenger vessel to enter upon and pass along the said piers . . . who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent, such sum, not exceeding twopence, as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person, which sum shall allow the person paying the same to pass along the said piers . . . to the quay when disembarking from the said passenger vessel on the same day as that on which the said sum was paid."

Held (Shearman, J., dissenting), that this by-law was not ultra vires, unreasonable, or in restraint of trade. It did not impose a tax or toll upon the public but restricted the duration of the by-law for the protection of the public to the period during which the charge made (assuming that the Corporation were entitled to make any charge at all) did not exceed twopence.

The justification for the charge, if its legality were challenged, was not to be found in the by-law, but must be derived aliunde.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Per Lord Hewart, C.J. : Though the reasonableness of a by-law is a question of law, the Court should pay great regard to the findings of local justices upon a by-law made by a body of persons with knowledge of local conditions.

This was a case stated by justices for the City of Worcester.

Informations were preferred by Charles Isaac Carey Walker, the respondent, under by-law number 25 of the by-laws made on July 3, 1922, by the Severn Commissioners in exercise of the powers vested in them by the Severn Navigation Acts, 1914 and 1920, against James William Henry Everton, the appellant, for that he :—

(a) On September 25, 1926, in the City of Worcester, unlawfully allowed a passenger or passengers to embark upon a passenger vessel, the Belle, from the Worcester Quay at a place on the quay other than the landing stage maintained by the Corporation of Worcester above the Worcester Bridge, contrary to the said by-law 25 ; (b) on September 27, 1926, committed a like offence.

The informations were heard on November 2, 1926, when the appellant was fined £1, or 14 days' imprisonment in default, on each charge.

Upon the hearing of the said informations the following facts were proved or admitted :—

That the Severn Commissioners were a public body to whom Parliament had by the Severn Navigation Acts, 1842 to 1920, entrusted the improvement and maintenance of the navigation of the river Severn from Stourport to Gloucester. The river Severn was in the summer much used for pleasure traffic on steamers, launches, rowing boats, &c.

That the quays at the City of Worcester were vested in the Corporation of Worcester, but were open to use by the public.

That there were five steamers certified by the Board of Trade running trips on the river and starting from the Worcester quays ; that the usual trip extended from Worcester through Camp Lock, about four miles above Worcester, and thence to Holt about four miles further up the river. That one of these steamers, the Belle, belonged to and was worked by the appellant.

That it was not desirable for two or more steamers to start on the same trip at or about the same time as it led to racing, and was dangerous to people in small boats.

That a steamer proprietor could start from the Worcester Quay whenever he liked, so that two or three steamers might start at the same time.

That the times of starting of the five steamers varied considerably and on some days two or three steamers started at or about the same hour, while on other occasions there were intervals of 15 minutes or more between the times of starting from the Worcester Quay.

That about four miles above Worcester there was a lock on the river called Camp Lock and more than four miles above that lock there was another lock called the Holt Lock.

That steamers from Worcester made journeys up and down the river but the usual trip was from Worcester to Holt, where there were two riverside inns at which pleasure parties were entertained.

That steamers starting from the Worcester Quay at about the same time on the trip to Holt had raced so as to be the first to get through the Camp Lock (which they took about 10 minutes to pass through), so as to reach Holt before the other steamers.

That if steamers started in turn from the corporation landing stage there would be no racing to Camp Lock as the time occupied in taking the passengers on board the second steamer would give the other so much start that racing would be impossible, but that the provision of the landing stage would not prevent racing on the return journeys.

That the Severn Navigation Acts did not contain any specific statutory power to make a charge for entry upon the landing stage.

That there were eight sets of steps on the east side of the river Severn leading down from the Worcester Quay. At, against or near five of these sets of steps were rafts or landing stages owned and used by the owners of passenger vessels who embarked and disembarked their passengers on to their respective passenger vessels from such rafts or landing stages. That these rafts had been used by the respective passenger vessel owners for many years, and the passenger vessels owned by the respective owners were moored against the rafts or landing stages.

That the appellant had carried on his business by himself and his predecessors for upwards of 40 years, and other passenger vessel owners for many years, and had used the rafts belonging to them respectively, which were moored to the quay walls on the river Severn at the steps leading from the quay to embark and disembark passengers on to their respective vessels. There were five passenger vessels moored to the Worcester Quay, the largest vessel being licensed to carry 326 passengers.

That on occasions in one day crowds of passengers embarked and disembarked from the passenger vessels at the quay walls in the City of Worcester, embarking and disembarking from the different rafts or landing stages.

That the Corporation landing stage was on the river Severn and was constructed of wood and iron. To gain access to it passengers had to descend two flights of artificial steps over the river, the length of the landing stage being 120 feet.

That Worcester Quay had been used by the public to obtain access to and from the river Severn without payment of tolls or charges since the quay walls were erected. By the Severn Navigation Act, 1842 (section 253), the Severn Commissioners compounded with the City of Worcester Corporation in respect of all tolls and charges to which the Corporation were at that time entitled in respect of merchandise, articles and things whatsoever carried or conveyed into through or out of the City of Worcester on the river Severn. That the river Severn was a free river until the navigation locks were constructed. That the appellant alleged that he was not in charge of the Belle at the time when the passengers embarked on it on September 25 and 27, 1926.

That the by-laws made by the Severn Commissioners on July 3, 1922, were properly made in accordance with the requirements of their Acts of 1914 and 1920 and were duly confirmed by the Minister of Transport.

That by-law 25 was made after much consultation between the Severn Commissioners and the Corporation of Worcester and that such by-law was made (amongst other things) for the prevention of racing between steamers on the river and for the better regulation of the embarcation and disembarcation of passengers at Worcester Quay.

That the landing stage provided by the Corporation of Worcester pursuant to the said by-law was properly constructed and suitable to the extent of its accommodation for the purposes named in the by-law and was capable of accommodating one steamer loading and another unloading passengers at the same time and at all material times was available for use on payment of the sum of one penny for each person.

That the Corporation proposed to issue a weekly list of the days and hours at which steamers would leave the landing stage showing the order of starting each week, so that each steamer would in turn be the first to start.

That a representative of the Corporation of Worcester in giving evidence for the respondent undertook that if the use of the landing stage should be so great as to necessitate further facilities of the same character the Corporation were ready and willing to erect a second landing stage.

That the appellant, in his evidence, did not deny that he had stated to a committee of the Corporation that he would not use the landing stage whether there was a charge or not.

That on September 25, 1926, passengers were embarked on the appellant's steamer Belle—which was a steamer certified by the Board of Trade—at Worcester Quay at a place other than the Corporation landing stage, and that the appellant was present while passengers were embarking.

That on September 27, 1926, passengers were embarked on the appellant's steamer Belle at Worcester Quay at a place other than the corporation landing stage, and that tickets for such steamer were issued to the passengers by the appellant's wife.

That the appellant admitted that on September 25 and 27, 1926, the steamer Belle was navigated by men in his employment and that he received the monies paid by the passengers thereon.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that by-law 25 was void on the following grounds :— (1) That it was ultra vires ; (2) that it was unreasonable ; (3) that it was in restraint of trade ; and he supported his contention on the following grounds :—

(a) That neither the Severn Commissioners nor the Corporation of the City of Worcester were by any of the Severn Navigation Acts empowered to make or create a charge or toll by any by-law for the user of landing stages constructed on the river Severn over which persons might pass to embark or disembark on or from passenger vessels on such river and that the Worcester quays were free to the public.

(b) That by-law 25 worked injustice and imposed a charge or toll upon all persons seeking to embark or disembark on or from passenger vessels arriving at or departing from Worcester Quay.

(c) That the by-law was too wide, there being no qualification or limitation.

(d) That the capacity of the Corporation landing stage was limited and not suitable or sufficient for allowing the number of persons embarking and/or disembarking on or from passenger vessels arriving at or departing from Worcester Quay and that congestion would be caused if all passenger vessels were compelled to embark or disembark passengers at such landing stage.

(e) That the entry to the Corporation landing stage was in a dangerous position, railway lines being laid within a few feet of the entrance and that crowds of people on occasions used the passenger vessels for conveyance up and down the river Severn.

(f) That by-law 25 was in restraint of trade, as it compelled the passenger vessel owners to embark or disembark passengers from one particular landing stage, i.e. (the Corporation landing stage) and restrained passenger vessel owners from allowing their old landing stages (i.e., their places of business) to be used to embark and disembark passengers using passenger vessels owned by them—thus interfering with established businesses which had been carried on for many years at particular place or places at the respective landing stages.

(g) That passenger vessel owners contracted to carry a number of persons at an inclusive price and if the toll were imposed in respect of the embarking or disembarking of passengers at the Corporation landing stage it would diminish the profits of the passenger vessel owners which at present were not large.

The appellant further contended that upon the facts it was not proved that he was in charge of the passenger vessel Belle or personally allowed any passenger to embark on such vessel, and he was therefore not guilty of the offences alleged to have been committed and that the loading up of vessels at the Corporation landing stage would take unnecessary time and cause delay to passengers and congestion of traffic.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the said by-law was a reasonable one and that it was not ultra vires nor was it in restraint of trade and in support thereof the following grounds were put forward :—

(1) That the by-law was made by a public authority, the Severn Commissioners, and confirmed by a Government department, and was deemed necessary to prevent dangerous racing on the river and therefore should be supported in accordance with the principles laid down in Kruse v. Johnson (14 The Times L.R., 416 ; [1898] 2 Q.B., 91) and Clayton v. Peirse ([1904] 1 K.B., 424).

(2) That the by-law was not unreasonable as it did not prohibit the trade of running passenger steamers on the river but merely regulated the embarkation and disembarkation of the passengers.

(3) That the by-law was not ultra vires of the Severn Commissioners as it was authorized by the Severn Navigation Act, 1914, section 16, and the Severn Navigation Act, 1920, section 9.

(4) That the by-law would have been valid even if it had imposed a charge for use of the landing stage (Nash v. Manning, 58 J.P., 718), but that as a matter of fact the by-law did not impose any charge, merely providing for payment of such sum as the Corporation were entitled to charge.

(5) That the appellant was not entitled to raise the question of the power to impose a charge, or the amount of the charge imposed, as he was not shown to be aggrieved by the charge, since it was not proved that any person had ever objected to pay it.

(6) That if the question of making a charge were open to the appellant the making thereof was justified by the fact that the Corporation had provided a landing stage which was a further facility added to Worcester Quay enabling passengers to embark on, or disembark from a passenger vessel and, if the by-law had not been made, the Corporation could have charged to a person using this facility any sum they pleased ; but that as soon as the by-law was made requiring the use of this facility, it ceased to be juris privati only, and the Corporation could not make an arbitrary charge but only a reasonable and moderate charge. Allnutt v. Inglis (12 East, 527).

(7) That the charge of one penny per person was a reasonable and moderate charge.

The justices' attention was also called to the following cases :—Arlidge v. Islington Borough Council (25 The Times L.R., 470 ; [1909] 2 K.B., 127) ; Rex v. Faversham (8 Term Rep., 352) ;

Gray v. Sylvester (14 The Times L.R., 10) ; Strike v. Collins (2 The Times L.R., 421) ; Collins v. Wells Corporation (1 The Times L.R., 328) ; Scott v. Glasgow Corporation (15 The Times L.R., 498 ; [1899] A.C., 470) ; Da Prato v. Partick Corporation (96 L.T., 398), and Sutton Harbour Improvement Company v. Foster (No. 2) (36 The Times L.R., 590).

The justices were of opinion that the said by-law was a reasonable one and that it was not ultra vires, or in restraint of trade, and that it was properly made and confirmed and that the appellant had committed breaches of it on September 25, 1926, and September 27, 1926, and was liable to the penalties provided for by the said by-laws.

The Severn Navigation Act, 1842 (5 Vict., c. xxiv.), by section 186 empowered the Commissioners to take certain tolls (not including tolls for passengers embarking or disembarking on the river banks) and, by section 210, to make by-laws for limited purposes. By section 253 the Worcester Corporation compounded for tolls due to them under old rights.

By the Severn Navigation Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. xlii.), section 16, power was given to the Commissioners to make by-laws, inter alia,

"For the good rule government and regulation of the traffic on and the navigation of the river and of persons using the river and the prevention of misconduct and of offences against good order thereon. . . .

"For regulating the anchoring and mooring of vessels in the river and for preventing vessels anchoring mooring or remaining stationary for an unreasonable time in the river or against the banks thereof or at any wharf quay pier jetty or landing place. . . .

"For regulating the payment and receipt of tolls fees and charges payable to the Commissioners."

The Severn Navigation Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. xxiv.), provided an amended schedule of navigation and lock tolls, but did not provide for tolls on embarking or disembarking. By section 9 the power of the Commissioners to make by-laws was further amended by the addition (inter alia) of the following paragraph :—

"For prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked loaded or unloaded on the river on to or from vessels plying on the river. . . . Provided that the Commissioners shall not under this section make any by-law prescribing any place or places at a public wharf or quay belonging to the mayor aldermen and citizens of the city of Worcester . . . without the previous consent in writing of [that] corporation. . . ."

By-law 25 provided : "No person shall anchor or moor any passenger vessel near to or against any portion of Worcester Quay for the purpose of enabling any passenger to be taken on board or disembarked from such passenger vessel or shall permit or allow any passenger to embark upon any passenger vessel from the quay or to disembark from any passenger vessel on to the quay if and so long as the Corporation of the City of Worcester maintain either above or below Worcester Bridge a pier or landing stage or piers or landing stages connected with the quay and available for giving access from the quay to a passenger vessel moored against the said piers or landing stages and allow any persons desirous of travelling by a passenger vessel to enter upon and pass along the said piers or landing stages from the quay to the passenger vessel moored against the said piers or landing stages who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent such sum, not exceeding twopence, as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person, which sum shall allow the person paying the same to pass along the said piers or landing stages to the quay when disembarking from the said passenger vessel on the same day as that on which the said sum was paid."

Mr. Joy, K.C., and Mr. Engelbach appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Simes for the respondent.

Mr. Joy contended that the Severn Commissioners had no power to make a charge for embarcation or disembarcation, and that the part of the by-law which purported to subject users to a charge was bad. The Corporation had no power, statutory or other, to make a landing stage, and the expenditure of public money upon it was ultra vires. The reference to public wharves and quays in section 9 of the Act of 1920 could not refer to existing landing stages. If a statute was intended to take away existing rights it must do so in express terms. The Act empowered the Commissioners to prescribe "the place or places at public wharves, &c." This by-law purported to prescribe times, days, and hours.

Mr. Justice Shearman referred to Parker v. Clegg (2 L.G.R., 608).

Mr. Joy referred to Kruse v. Johnson (14 The Times L.R., 416 ; [1898] 2 Q.B., 91) and Scott v. Pilliner (20 The Times L.R., 662 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 855) on the question of reasonableness. Further, the by-law was uncertain ; apparently persons who embarked at Holt or elsewhere could not disembark at Worcester at all. There was no responsibility or duty laid on the Corporation to ensure that the landing stage should be available for a steamer at the time prescribed for it. What was the meaning of "available ?" Suppose the appellant wished to sail at 3 p.m. and found the Corporation landing stage booked for 3, 3.30, 4, 4.30, &c. Was it available ?

Mr. Justice Shearman.—Mr. Montgomery, I think I am the only person who desires to hear you, but the reasonableness of the by-law is a question of law for this Court. I can see no authority for the Corporation charging any fee themselves or for the by-law giving them power to do so. If it is ultra vires as imposing a tax on the public, of course anyone is entitled to evade it.

Mr. Montgomery.—If no power exists the question can be raised any day by any person saying "I am going on the pier without paying," and in other ways. But here there is a public body with power to specify the place of embarcation, and they say that the proper quay is the Corporation quay. The by-law only sanctioned such sum as the Corporation might be entitled to charge. That was outside the by-law.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—I regret very much that I am in disagreement with the other members of the Court. In my judgment this appeal should be allowed. In my view the objection which was taken in the Court below to this by-law on the ground that it was invalid as being unreasonable and in restraint of trade, which objection was overruled by the Court below, was right, and therefore I think this appeal should be allowed.

I do not wish to read the whole of this long case, but I think these facts appear from the findings. Finding No. 2 is that the quays at Worcester, that means Worcester Quay, the whole of it, are vested in the Corporation of Worcester but are open to use by the public. Finding No. 16 is : "Worcester Quay has been used by the public to obtain access to and from the River Severn without payment of tolls or charges since the quay walls were erected." That means that this part of the River Severn, from the sea up to some eight miles, I think it is, above Worcester was a free navigable river. It appears from the statutes which are incorporated in this case that it was a free navigable river where people could travel up and down and land without charge from time immemorial; that right was interfered with by the statutes which begin in the year 1842 and go on to the year 1920. Those statutes authorize the imposition of such fees as were imposed by those Acts, but no others. I, of course, accept without demur the findings that there has been considerable pleasure traffic upon the river; that that pleasure traffic has become dangerous to the general public using the river in small boats; that it was not desirable for two or more steamers to start on the same trip at or about the same time as it led to racing, and was dangerous to people in small boats. No doubt it was something of the sort that led to the passing of the Act of 1920, section 9 of which gives additional powers to make by-laws, and, among others, those powers are: "For prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked loaded or unloaded on the river on to or from vessels plying on the river." The words relevant to this case are "passengers may be embarked or disembarked." Of course, all by-laws must have reference in the interests of the public to the safe and reasonable navigation of the river. In pursuance of that object by-law 25, the only one in question, was passed in the year 1922. I need not read the whole of it. When that by-law was passed the Worcester Corporation had not a landing stage or stages at all, and it contemplated that, so soon as they built an available landing stage, thereupon this by-law should come into force, and it says not only that a passenger vessel for the purpose of embarking or disembarking passengers is not to be moored at any place other than at this stage which had not as yet been built, but it could only embark or disembark passengers "who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent such sum not exceeding 2d. as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person," and the words go on to say that a sum not exceeding 2d. should include embarcation and disembarcation on the same day. It is argued by Mr. Montgomery that that meant "such sum if any" and left the question open whether any charge was leviable at all; in other words, that it contemplated that there might be a charge or there might not be a charge and it contemplated that some day before very long some passenger would indulge in a law-suit to decide whether any fee was chargeable or not. I am unable to think that that is the meaning of it at all. It seems to me that the only reasonable meaning to give to this by-law, which is all in one sentence and not possibly severable, is: "We are not going to allow the Corporation to charge anything excessive but only such sum as they may be reasonably entitled to charge," and no doubt it is intended that the charge should recoup them for the expense of making a landing stage. The whole object of the by-law, in my view, is not to stop a legal nuisance for the purpose of the safety of navigation and of preventing racing, by allowing steamer owners to take up passengers only at certain definite times at certain definite places, but it is contemplated that a reasonable fee should be charged to people embarking and disembarking. In my view that by-law meant to encourage the Worcester Corporation to impose a fee for embarking and disembarking, and assumes that if the fee came within the reasonable limit of 2d. this could lawfully be charged. It is imposing a tax on everybody who goes on a pleasure steamer, and, to my mind, that is the clearest interference with a legitimate trade. The trade of taking a passenger for a pleasure cruise on a navigable river is a long understood and well understood trade. To say that you shall only take people on board who pay some owner for the privilege of getting on board at a landing stage which he has spent money in building, to my mind goes beyond the possible purview of what can be done on a river which is free for the navigation of the public. I think that is the short answer. I think it is clear on the findings that while the Corporation of Worcester had originally claims or rights to fees from merchants, they bargained them away, and the findings of the case about the river being free and navigable show they have not, and never have had, any right to charge for embarkation and disembarkation. On those grounds I think this by-law is bad.

I have only a few other remarks to make. I do not attach any importance to the finding in this case first of all that the appellant said that nothing would induce him ever to go to the Corporation pier. I do not think that ought to have found its way into the case. It has no bearing on the matter, and it seems as if a litigant lost his temper. There is another finding in the case that the advocate for the Corporation, when the point was being argued that this stage of the Corporation was not large enough, pledged himself that the Corporation would make it bigger if required. That again is one of those excited remarks made by advocates which sometimes occur in other Courts than a magistrate's Court and have no bearing whatever as to the decision of the case. Some of these findings I should not think of questioning, namely: "That it was not desirable for two or more steamers to start on the same trip at or about the same time as it led to racing, and was dangerous to people in small boats," and "That a steamer proprietor could start from the Worcester Quay whenever he liked, so that two or three steamers might start at the same time." This rather points to a suggestion that while a time-table might be fair and reasonable there is nothing in the world to prevent these Commissioners from making a by-law as to steamers not starting from any part of Worcester Quay, whether from a private stage or elsewhere, except at such time as is directed by the Worcester Corporation, and that the by-law does not give an exclusive monopoly to the Worcester Corporation to charge a fee to every passenger using their landing stage. The same object could easily have been effected as to all these private landing stages if there were a by-law framed preventing the steamers from starting within such times of one another or otherwise than at such fixed times as the Commissioners should publish, as I understand they desire to do. In other words, without framing a bad by-law they could very easily frame a good by-law without creating this monopoly and making a charge which is a tax upon the industry; they could have passed other regulations which could easily be passed and which would have the same beneficial effect.

For the reasons I have given I think the appeal should be allowed.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—I regret that I cannot come to the same conclusion. The question is whether this by-law is unreasonable or ultra vires or in restraint of trade. The magistrates find that it is not. The Severn Commissioners under the Act of 1920 are given power to make by-laws: "For prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked loaded or unloaded on the river on to or from vessels plying on the river." For certain reasons of policy it was thought desirable that the various passenger steamers plying on the river should start from one uniform spot so that they would not all start at once, and they should start in succession so as to prevent racing. The by-law which is impugned in its operative part provides that every passenger steamer shall resort for the landing and embarking of passengers to one quay only. They have selected the quay or landing place of the Corporation of Worcester, and if the by-law stopped there it would not be open to very much of the criticism that has been urged against it. It is said that it goes further and is bad because it imposes a tax on the public. Now if the Commissioners by any by-law did purport to impose a toll or tax upon passengers I should quite agree that the by-law would be bad because under their special Acts they are not given any powers to impose a tax or toll upon passengers. But in truth, as I read this by-law, the position is this. They have directed that these steamers shall resort only to one place, namely, the Corporation landing stage. They then go on in the interests of the public to say, having some knowledge that the Corporation either does or proposes to make some charge, that this by-law shall only be in operation provided that the charge made by the Corporation, if any is made, does not exceed the sum of 2d. That does not seem to me in the least to be a by-law imposing a tax on the public. It has added to the by-law a provision for the protection of the public with regard to the possible action of a third party over whom the Commissioners have no power, and as to whose rights the Commissioners have no authority to say anything. I think the shortest answer to the question, Is it or is it not true that this by-law imposes any taxation on the public? is this: Suppose any member of the public was minded to dispute his liability to pay this taxation and that had to be determined by any tribunal, no human being opposing his claim would seek to say: "Oh, but you are liable by virtue of this by-law"; his liability would have to be established by some legal right of the Corporation to impose the charge. It does not seem to me that this by-law imposes any charge whatever; the only thing it does is to make a provision which shall limit and restrict the possibility of some other person making a charge, and for that reason it does not seem to me there is anything wrong in this by-law. The reasons given in the case with some elaboration show that its purpose, to restrict the resort of these steamers to one spot, is reasonable. The by-law, I think, is certainly not ultra vires because it is in direct pursuance of this Act to prescribe a place or places, and so forth. I do not think it is in restraint of trade.

For these reasons I think this appeal should be dismissed.

The Lord Chief Justice.—It is with profound respect and sincere regret that I differ in this case from the judgment of my brother Shearman. The prosecution here was under certain by-laws made by the Severn Commissioners, and the real question to which this special case gives rise is a question whether the particular by-law referred to, which is by-law 25 of the last series of by-laws, was a reasonable by-law or was ultra vires or in restraint of trade. In approaching that question I think the true canon is laid down in words, often cited, but never too often, in the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen in Kruse v. Johnson (14 The Times L.R., 416; [1898] 2 Q.B., 91, at p. 99): "When," said Lord Russell, "the Court is called upon to consider the by-laws of public representative bodies clothed with the ample authority which I have described and exercising that authority accompanied by the checks and safeguards which have been mentioned, I think the consideration of such by-laws ought to be approached from a different standpoint. They ought to be supported if possible. They ought to be, as has been said, 'benevolently' interpreted, and credit ought to be given to those who have to administer them that they will be reasonably administered. This involves the introduction of no new canon of construction. But, further, looking to the character of the body legislating under the delegated authority of Parliament, to the subject-matter of such legislation, and to the nature and extent of the authority given to deal with matters which concern them, and in the manner which to them shall seem meet, I think Courts of justice ought to be slow to condemn as invalid any by-law, so made under such conditions, on the ground of supposed unreasonableness." Applying those observations to the present case, I cannot help observing that we are really being asked to consider the reasonableness of a by-law made on the spot by a representative and aggregate body for the better and safer navigation by passengers of a particular part of the river Severn, and it seems to me that it is material—I speak for myself—that one unfortunately knows too little of the course, the dimensions and the other individual features of the river Severn in that part of it, the particular position of the locks which are to be navigated by passenger vessels going to and from Worcester, the habits, and especially the festive habits, of the population and the particular methods of local competitive traders. All these matters and many others were well within the knowledge, on the one hand, of the delegates who constituted the Severn Commission, and, on the other hand, of the elective persons who constituted the Corporation of the City of Worcester. Nor do I think that it is immaterial that the justices in this case, Worcester justices sitting in Worcester, have come to the conclusion, after hearing all the relevant facts and, at least, all the relevant arguments, that this by-law was a reasonable one and was not ultra vires or in restraint of trade. It is, of course, true that the question here is not a question of fact, but is a question of law. But nevertheless the questions of fact are highly material to the question of law when the question of law is whether in a given situation, and for the purpose of dealing with a particular evil, a particular remedy is, or is not, a reasonable remedy, and it seems to me that the observations of Mr. Justice Channell, as he then was, in the case of White v. Morley (15 The Times L.R., 360; [1899] 2 Q.B., 34) are apt to the present controversy. In that case Mr. Justice Channell said this, at page 39, referring to the case of Burnett v. Berry (12 The Times L.R., 362; [1896] 1 Q.B., 641): "Since that case was decided, the case of Kruse v. Johnson (supra) has been heard, and has thrown a good deal of light on the previous decisions as to the reasonableness of by-laws. I think that the principle of that decision is that, where a thing is of such a character as that it can be a nuisance, it is to rest with the local authority to say whether it shall be considered to be a nuisance in the particular locality for which they have power to make by-laws. The Court can say whether it is reasonably possible for the prohibited act or thing to be a nuisance; but they cannot say whether it should or should not be forbidden in the particular locality." That case is, therefore, an additional authority for holding that this by-law is not unreasonable. And in like manner in the case of Friend v. Brehout (30 The Times L.R., 587 ; 79 J.P., 25), a case decided in the year 1915, Mr. Justice Bray in giving judgment, referring to a certain point, said : "The next point taken is that the by-law is unreasonable because it is too wide and it ought to have dealt with only a portion of the area. That must be a question of fact for the magistrates, and they have decided it. They had evidence on both sides, and it is impossible to say that they were not justified in holding the by-law to be not unreasonable." And in the same case Mr. Justice Avory, with reference to the same point, said : "I see no ground for saying the by-law is unreasonable, but I express no opinion on that ; it is not a matter with which this Court ought to deal. It was a question of fact for the justices and there was evidence on which they could find as they did." Mr. Justice Atkin, as he then was, concurred.

I am not saying that this question which this Court has now to decide is a question of fact. I am far from saying that, but I do think, having regard to the nature of the subject-matter, that this Court ought not to disregard the findings of the local justices dealing with this local problem and the local method proposed for solving it by persons locally elected and locally responsible.

With regard to the making of this by-law it seems to me that by the operation of section 16 of the Severn Navigation Act, 1914, and section 9 of the Severn Navigation Act, 1920, the Severn Commissioners clearly had power to make a by-law falling within this category. I say nothing for the moment of its special provisions. By the earlier section to which I have referred the Commissioners were empowered to make such by-laws as they thought fit, among other things for regulating the anchoring and mooring of vessels in the river, and by section 9 of the later Act they were empowered to make by-laws for "prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked loaded or unloaded on the river on to or from vessels plying on the river."

But it is said that this by-law, although no doubt it falls within the class of topic with which the Commissioners might properly deal, is nevertheless by reason of its special provisions unreasonable, ultra vires, and in restraint of trade. I take the last phrase first : "in restraint of trade." Upon analysis that phrase proves to mean no more than this, that it compels some alteration, I think a comparatively slight alteration, in the mode in which a particular trade was heretofore carried on. The argument that the by-law is ultra vires is the same argument, spelt differently, as the argument that it is unreasonable, and in the last resort it depends upon this proposition, that the by-law is unreasonable inasmuch as it imposes, or purports to impose, a charge in the nature, it is said, of a tax upon the public—that part of the public, in other words, which embarks upon or disembarks from passenger vessels using this part of the River Severn. I pause to say that it is perfectly obvious to my mind that that is not the point upon which this case was fought in the Court below. There is nothing novel in that ; one is quite used to it, just as much used to it as to the circumstance that the real points in the appellant's favour are always, or nearly always, points which do not appear in the case. But here it is expressly stated in the case that the appellant in his evidence did not deny that he had stated to the committee of the corporation that he would not use the landing stage whether there was a charge or not, and I think that the relevancy of the insertion of that paragraph, which may have been inartistically done, is that it is intended to show that the real point was not the point which might be thought to be the useful point when the case came before the Divisional Court. In like manner, I see that it is found that a representative of the Corporation of Worcester, in giving evidence for the respondent, undertook that if the use of the landing stage should be so great as to necessitate further facilities of the same character the Corporation were ready and willing to erect a second landing stage. Before I come to the conclusion that that is mere irrelevancy or the offer of a bribe to the tribunal, or otherwise objectionable, I look to the contentions then raised on behalf of the appellant and I find this : "That the capacity of the Corporation landing stage is limited and not suitable or sufficient for allowing the number of persons embarking and/or disembarking on or from passenger vessels arriving at or departing from Worcester Quay, and that congestion would be caused if all passenger vessels are compelled to embark or disembark passengers at such landing stage." The inference I draw is that this evidence is a portion of the answer made to the argument adduced before the justices that this by-law was unreasonable, and I think that, the argument being made, it evidently was a relevant answer.

But is it true to say that this by-law imposes a toll or charge upon the public ? The operative part of the by-law is the first part, which provides that : "No person shall anchor or moor any passenger vessel near to or against any portion of Worcester Quay for the purpose of enabling any passenger to be taken on board or disembarked from such passenger vessel, or shall permit or allow any passenger to embark upon any passenger vessel from the quay or to disembark from any passenger vessel on to the quay, if and so long as the Corporation of the City of Worcester maintain, either above or below Worcester Bridge, a pier or landing stage, or piers or landing stages, connected with the quay and available for giving access from the quay to a passenger vessel moored against the said piers or landing stages, and" —now come the words of which complaint is made— "allow any persons desirous of travelling by a passenger vessel to enter upon and pass along the said piers or landing stages from the quay to the passenger vessel moored against the said piers or landing stages, who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent such sum not exceeding 2d. as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person, which sum shall allow the person paying the same to pass along the said piers or landing stages to the quay when disembarking from the said passenger vessel on the same day as that on which the said sum was paid." The by-law begins with a prohibition : no person shall anchor ; no person shall permit ; no person shall allow. Then there follows a passage showing the period during which the prohibition is to operate, and it is to operate "if"—because the pier had not yet come into existence—"if and so long as the Corporation maintain and allow," so and so ; it is a defining and limiting provision as to time, and it is when one comes to the second limb of that limitation as to time that these words about charge occur : "allow any persons . . . who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent such sum not exceeding 2d. as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person." If the Corporation have not the right to do that it seems to me the by-law never comes into exercise at all. It is made upon the assumption that the Corporation have that power aliunde. This by-law does not purport to give the power, but it makes it a condition of the duration of the period during which the prohibition created by the by-law is to last that the Corporation are to give these facilities. The nature of the condition is in itself a restrictive condition. If the Corporation raise the fee above 2d., then the prohibition in the beginning of the by-law does not apply. The by-law, I think, assumes that the Corporation have the power to impose that charge; it does not itself purport to impose that charge; and it was not at all upon that point that the case was fought in the Court below.

It seems to me that the justices were justified in coming to the conclusion to which they came, that this by-law was a reasonable one; that it was not ultra vires; and that it was not in restraint of trade. In these circumstances and for these reasons, regretting as I do that the Court is not unanimous in this matter, I think that this appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

RANSON v. BURGESS.*

Lotteries—Printer of tickets—Sale of complete set—Lottery to be conducted by purchaser—Printer not further interested—No lottery in existence at date of sale—Publication of proposal or scheme—Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV., c. 60), s. 41.

The appellant, a printer, sent to the respondent some specimen tickets for "Weekly Naps and Football Doubles" together with a printed document inviting him to purchase complete sets of tickets for various Divisions of the Football League. For example, for 10s. he would supply 231 tickets each containing the same "winning nap" on a horse race, but a different combination of two of the 22 teams in the First Division (231 being the total of possible combinations). The purpose was that the respondent should sell each of these tickets at 6d. each and should give a prize to the person whose ticket bore the names of the two teams which scored most goals on a given date. Out of the proceeds the respondent was to provide the prize or prizes, the balance being retained by him as profit. The appellant took no further share in the lottery or the proceeds beyond the original 10s. for the tickets.

Held, that the appellant was rightly convicted of publishing a proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery.

This was a case stated by an Alderman of the City of London.

On December 31, 1926, the appellant appeared at the Guildhall Justice Room, in the City of London, to answer an information laid by the respondent, a detective inspector of the City of London police, which charged that the appellant on October 26, 1926, in the said City of London, unlawfully published a certain proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery not authorized by any Act of Parliament, entitled "Weekly Nap with free Football Doubles," contrary to section 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823.

The Alderman convicted the appellant and ordered him to pay a fine of £25 and a further sum of £10 10s. for costs, or in default, to be imprisoned for three calendar months.

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved:—

(a) That on October 26, 1926, the respondent, in response to a letter written by him in the name of Fred Martin, received from the appellant an envelope which contained, among other documents, the following:—

(i.) A white envelope containing two printed letters.

(ii.) Some specimen tickets and envelopes.

The material part of one of the said letters (which was exhibited to the case) was as follows:—

(b) That on November 8 following the respondent sent to the appellant a postal order for 10s. and returned therewith one specimen ticket and envelope, and in reply received on November 9 a bundle of 231 tickets and envelopes for which payment had been made by the said postal order.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(c) That there were 22 Football Teams in the First Division, and therefore a complete set of tickets in respect of the same to secure that each combination of two should be different was 231. That the "Winning Nap" was constant on each of these tickets, whilst the combination of football teams was different.

(d) That the appellant contemplated that these tickets were to be sold by the respondent, each in its envelope, the purchaser having no choice of the football teams upon the ticket he bought, and that a prize should be paid to the holder of that ticket which bore the names of the two football teams scoring most goals, and a consolation prize should also be given by the respondent.

(e) That after the sale to the respondent by the appellant of the said tickets and envelopes the appellant took no further interest in the matter; that was, the appellant did not take or intend to take any money for the sale of separate tickets at 6d. each, nor did he hold himself liable for providing the prize.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant:—

(1) That all that he had done was to sell in the ordinary commercial sense certain pieces of printed paper which might or might not be afterwards employed in the conduct of a lottery.

(2) That the mere publication of tickets to Inspector Burgess in this manner did not amount to a proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery within the meaning of section 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823, 4 Geo. IV., c. 60, any more than the sale of tickets to the inspector was a sale of tickets or chances in a lottery.

(3) That in order to bring the appellant within the prohibition in the said section 41 it was necessary to show that he was taking some part in the actual conduct of a lottery then in being.

Reference was made to the Ready Money Football Betting Act, 1920, and it was contended that if the Legislature had intended to prohibit at the source the printing of tickets and other material which might be used in the conduct of a lottery some enactment relating to lotteries similar to that relating to ready money football betting would be in force.

The case of Dew v. Director of Public Prosecutions (37 The Times L.R., 22) was cited and it was contended that in all reported cases except the said case cited the publication alleged was a publication by way of public announcement or advertisement of a lottery actually being conducted.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the facts proved established the offence charged, and that the matter that was published by the appellant to the respondent amounted to a proposal or scheme for the sale of the said tickets, and that each purchaser of such a ticket would obtain, in addition to the "Weekly Nap" the chance that his ticket might contain the names of the two football teams scoring most goals and thereby he would become entitled to the prize offered.

The Alderman was of opinion that the appellant had published to the respondent a proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery not authorized by any Act of Parliament. The scheme published by the appellant to the respondent was that these tickets were to be sold by the respondent, each in its envelope, the purchaser having no choice of the football teams upon the ticket he bought, and that a prize should be paid to the holder of that ticket which bore the name of the two football teams scoring most goals, and a consolation prize should also be given by the respondent. He therefore convicted the appellant upon the said information and ordered him to pay a fine of £25 and a further sum of £10 10s. for costs, or in default to be imprisoned for three calendar months.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether, upon the above statement of facts, the Alderman came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

Mr. Roland Oliver, K.C., and Mr. McClure appeared for the appellant; Mr. Percival Clarke, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by an alderman sitting at the Guildhall Justice Room. The question arises upon an information laid by the respondent, who is a detective inspector of the City of London police, charging that the appellant on October 26, 1926, "unlawfully published a certain proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery not authorized by any Act of Parliament, entitled 'Weekly Nap with free Football Doubles,' contrary to section 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823."

The magistrate convicted the appellant and has stated this case.

The question is whether, upon the material before the Court, the Alderman came to a correct determination and decision in point of law. What happened upon October 26, 1926, the day named for the offence, was that the respondent, in answer to a certain letter written by him in the name of Martin, received from the appellant a certain envelope, and that envelope contained certain documents, namely, another white envelope which, in its turn, contained two printed letters, and secondly, the main envelope contained certain specimen tickets and envelopes; that is all that was received on October 26. Certain other and supplementary things were received on November 9.

Now it is not denied that those documents which were sent on October 26, 1926, being really samples of the bulk sent on November 8, 1926, were documents deliberately designed as what has been described as the paraphernalia or apparatus of a lottery. The scheme of the lottery is made quite obvious by those documents. It was that the purchaser, for example in the case of First Division football, of 231 tickets, for which he paid 10s., might re-sell them individually at 6d. apiece. The total number of combinations in relation to 22 football teams competing in the manner represented being 231, the purchaser of one of those 231 tickets must get the particular statement of the winning result which would entitle him to a prize. Mr. Roland Oliver, with his usual frankness, has admitted that if the matter had been carried out to its conclusion, that is to say, if the moment had been reached when the sale of these tickets had actually begun, it could not be denied that they were tickets in a lottery and that there was a sale of tickets in a lottery; but, he says, as there was not yet an actual lottery in existence, and as what was in contemplation was not a definite and specific matter, this prosecution was misconceived, although it may be that there was good reason for commencing some other kind of prosecution against this printer. That is the submission which was made to the magistrate and it is succinctly expressed in this case. It was contended that in all the reported cases, except one, the publication alleged was publication by way of public announcement or advertisement of a lottery actually being conducted. In my opinion, that argument, which has been laid fully before us in the present case, proceeds upon too narrow a view of section 41 of the Lotteries Act of 1823. If I may read a portion of that section, it provides as follows: "If any person or persons shall sell any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances in any lottery or lotteries, authorized by any foreign potentate or State, or to be drawn in any foreign country, or in any lottery or lotteries, except such as are or shall be authorized by this or some other Act of Parliament to be sold, or shall publish any proposal or scheme for the sale of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, except such lottery or lotteries as shall be authorized as aforesaid," that person is liable to certain penalties.

It seems to me clear that that section covers a considerable variety of things, some of which are in futuro. For example, the very words employed show that the lottery referred to may be in the future—"to be drawn," "any lottery to be drawn in any foreign country"; and having said that, the section goes on: "or in any lottery or lotteries, except such as are or shall be authorized"; and what it dealt with is not only the sale of a ticket or a chance, or a share of a ticket or a share of a chance, but what it also dealt with is, (1) a publication of a scheme, and (2) a publication of a proposal, and the words "proposal" and "scheme" seem to me most naturally to indicate that there may be a certain ingredient of futurity, and I cannot see any ground whatever for saying that because the sale of tickets had not been actually begun, this was not the publication of a proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets in a lottery to be begun. I do not think that it is in the least necessary that the actual lottery should have advanced so far that the sale of tickets had already begun; it is enough that there was the publication either of a scheme or of a proposal for the sale of tickets in a lottery to be begun, and it is conceded that here the lottery must have begun the very moment when the ticket was first sold.

The case of Dew v. Director of Public Prosecutions (37 The Times L.R., 22; 85 J.P., 81) seems to me to be in point. There a person had sent to a printer, for the purpose of being printed, a draft circular containing a proposal for the sale of tickets in a lottery, and that circular was printed, and it was held that the person publishing the proposal, the printer, was liable to be convicted, even though no copy of the circular ever reached any person to whom it was afterwards addressed. Lord Reading, giving the judgment of the Court, said at page 81 of the J.P. Report: "Those statements are to my mind sufficient to support the conviction. They show that the circulars containing a proposal and scheme for the sale of tickets in a lottery were printed by a company. To that company the envelopes were sent by the appellant. The circulars were ordered by the appellant, and were printed and prepared for posting. The payment for the printing of the circulars and for their preparation for posting was made by the appellant by means of cheques signed by another person. A large number of circulars were printed and stamped ready for posting and were posted, but all were prevented from reaching the addressees, and there is no evidence that any circular was ever delivered to or reached any addressee"; and a little later the judgment proceeds: "When the draft circular was received by the printers for reproduction, and it was reproduced, some printer must have read at least one circular, but it has been argued that that is not publishing a proposal. The fallacy in that argument is that publishing a proposal means nothing more than making known a proposal to someone other than the person who originates it. As soon as it is established that the proposal was made known to another person, the proposal has been published. It is clear that this proposal was made known to the printer and therefore there was publication to the printer."

Now I cannot help thinking that that doctrine applies also the other way round. A man who goes to the printer to have the scheme printed, publishes the scheme to the printer: why is it any the less true that a printer, who has, let us say, in stock a great number of ready-made schemes for lotteries, publishes one of those schemes as soon as he communicates that scheme to any other individual? I think there are various ways in which this offence may be put. In one view of the facts, the printer and the recipient of his printing might be said to be working together in a lottery; in another view it might be said the printer is publishing a proposal for the sale of tickets in a lottery; and in another view it might be said the printer is proposing a scheme for the sale of tickets in a lottery, and it seems to me to be quite immaterial that the lottery referred to is a lottery thereafter to be brought into actual public operation by a sale of tickets which has not yet begun.

In my opinion the Alderman came to the right conclusion in this case, and I think that this appeal fails.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion. When one looks at the plain words of the statute, I think the acts charged come clearly within it. This man published a proposal for the sale of lottery tickets and he also, in the circular which he sent, made quite clear what the scheme of the proposed lottery was. I think it comes most clearly within both these words, "proposal" and "scheme" in the Act, and, therefore, the conviction was right.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON.—I agree.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. WILTSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Children — Youthful offender — Reformatory school—Residence—Liability for maintenance —Children Act, 1908 (8 Ed. VII., c. 67), s. 74 (1) (3) (7).

A youth resided at various places in London until the end of June, 1926. He was then taken to stay with his grandparents in Wiltshire for three months while his mother went abroad to her husband. He had then no home to which he could return in London. On July 18, 1926, he committed an offence in Wiltshire and was ordered to be sent to a reformatory school, London being specified in the order as his place of residence, the London County Council being thereby made liable for his maintenance.

Held, that there was no evidence of an actual residence in London at the date of the offence, and therefore, though he was in Wiltshire only on a temporary visit, he was presumed to reside there under s. 74 (3) of the Children Act, 1908, and the liability for his maintenance fell on the Wiltshire County Council.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by justices for Wiltshire.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Marlborough in the county of Wilts on August 27, 1926, one Morrie Morrison, a youthful offender, was convicted of having committed an offence at Froxfield in the county of Wilts on July 18, 1926, and was ordered to be detained in a certified reformatory school for the period of five years pursuant to the provisions of the Children Act, 1908, and his place of residence in the said order was specified to be London, within the area for which the London County Council were the local authority under the said Act, whereby the London County Council became liable for the maintenance of the said youthful offender in the said school.

Being aggrieved by the decision of the said Court as to the place of residence of the said youthful offender, the appellants, the London County Council, on November 9, 1926, applied under section 74 (7) of the Children Act, 1908, to a Petty Sessional Court, acting in and for the place for which the Court which made the order acted, and complained that the youthful offender was resident in the area of the respondents, the Wilts County Council, at the time of the commission of the offence for which he was ordered to be sent to the said reformatory school.

Upon the hearing of this application the respondents were heard, and on January 31, 1927, the justices refused to make an order transferring the liability to maintain the said youthful offender from the appellants to the respondents.

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

(a) Morrie Morrison was born on March 24, 1912. He was the illegitimate son of Hazel Fairbank Vernon (otherwise known as Chapman or Downey).

(b) On July 18, 1926, Morrie Morrison was living and sleeping with his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Chapman, at Froxfield, in the county of Wilts. He had been brought there by his mother (Mrs. Downey) at the end of June, 1926, because she was going abroad for three months. About 14 days later and before July 18, 1926, Mrs. Downey sailed for Rio de Janeiro to join her husband, who was already there.

(c) Before he was taken to Froxfield, Morrie Morrison was working at the Naval and Military Club, Piccadilly, London, as a lift-boy for one month, living in, but had left this situation on coming to Froxfield.

(d) Before that he had been living at 20, Regent's Park-terrace, Camden Town, London, of which house Mr. Downey held a lease, and in which he and his wife resided. Morrie Morrison lived there for three weeks with Mrs. Downey and slept there, Mr. Downey being away.

(e) Before that he had lived and slept for four years at 37, Westbourne-terrace, London, as a boarder with a Mrs. Curston, his mother paying his keep. Mrs. Curston was not a relative.

(f) He had visited Froxfield twice before on short holidays.

(g) He had seen Mr. Downey only three times in all, and he had never stayed in the house while Mr. Downey was there.

(h) When Mrs. Downey took him to Froxfield, she asked Mrs. Chapman to look after him for three months while she and her husband went abroad, and Mrs. Chapman agreed to do this in return for a weekly payment, but she would not have agreed to take him for longer than three months.

(i) On July 18, 1926, the only place with relatives or friends to which Mrs. Chapman could have sent him was to Mrs. Downey's brother, who lived at Reading. His mother was abroad and he had no home then.

(j) Mr. Downey was a motor manufacturer and had a business in London with several branches. This business was still being carried on.

(k) In July, 1926, before going to Rio de Janeiro, Mr. Downey had surrendered the lease of 20, Regent's Park-terrace, and had stored his furniture.

(l) The original order of August 27, 1926, was put in evidence by consent of the parties.

On the part of the appellants it was contended that :—

(a) Morrie Morrison ceased to reside in London when he left his employment at the Naval and Military Club and went to Froxfield.

(b) He in fact resided at Froxfield between the end of June, 1926, and the time when he committed the offence in respect of which he was ordered to be sent to a reformatory school or alternatively he must be presumed to have resided in Froxfield pursuant to section 74 (3) of the Children Act, 1908, that being the place where the offence in question was committed.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that :—

(a) The onus of proof was on the London County Council that the youthful offender was resident in the area of another local authority, and they had not discharged that onus.

(b) The evidence given on behalf of both the appellants and the respondents proved that the youthful offender's visit to Wiltshire was of a very temporary character, and that his stay at Froxfield did not constitute a residence in the area of the respondent council within the meaning of the Children Act, 1908.

The justices' attention was directed to the following decisions :—London County Council v. Birmingham Corporation (40 The Times L.R., 76 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 248), Stoke-on-Trent Corporation v. Cheshire County Council ([1915] 3 K.B., 699), Berkshire County Council v. Reading Corporation (37 The Times L.R., 642 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 787), Leicester Corporation v. Stoke-on-Trent Corporation (83 J.P., 45).

The justices, being of opinion that on July 18, 1926, the youthful offender was on a temporary visit to his grandmother at Froxfield, found as a fact that on that date his residence was in London, and they dismissed the application.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether upon the above statement of facts the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. A. F. Engelbach appeared for the appellants ; Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices, and the question arises in the following way. A youthful offender named Morrison was convicted on August 27, 1926, of having committed an offence at Froxfield, in the county of Wilts, on July 18, 1926. He was ordered to be detained in a certified reformatory school for a period of five years, pursuant to the provisions of the Children Act, 1908. In that order his place of residence was specified as being London, within the area for which the London County Council are the local authority under the Act. The effect of the order, therefore, was to make the London County Council liable for the maintenance of Morrison in the school to which he was sent. The London County Council, who are the present appellants, objected to that decision, under the provisions of section 74, subsection (7), of the Children Act, 1908, and complained that the youthful offender was, within the meaning of that Act, resident at the material time in the area of the respondents, the Wiltshire County Council.

The justices, having heard that complaint, refused to make an order transferring the liability from the appellants to the respondents, and accordingly the appellants applied for a case to be stated, and the question raised by this case is whether the justices, in the conclusion to which they came, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

The provisions of this Act are, one would think, sufficiently clear. The part of the Act in which the section occurs is a part dealing with expenses of certified schools. Section 74, subsection (1), provides as follows: "Where a youthful offender is ordered to be sent to a certified reformatory school, it shall be the duty of the council of the county or county borough in which he resides (to be specified in the order) to provide for his reception and maintenance in a certified reformatory school suitable to the case, having regard to the requirements of this part of this Act." Subsection (2) provides: "Where a child is ordered to be sent to a certified industrial school, it shall be the duty of the local education authority of the district in which he resides (to be specified in the order) to provide for his reception and maintenance in a certified industrial school suitable to the case, having regard to the requirements of this part of this Act." Then follows, in subsection (3), a definition of "residence" for the purposes of these provisions: "For the purposes of the foregoing provisions of this section a youthful offender or child shall be presumed to reside in the place where the offence was committed, or the circumstances which rendered him liable to be sent to a certified school occurred, unless it is proved that he resided in some other place." In other words, prima facie, the place where the offence was committed is, for the purposes of this Act (though there are no doubt various Acts of Parliament of which the same thing could not be said) the place of residence of the child. If that prima facie presumption is to be rebutted, it can be rebutted only by proof that at the material time he did in fact reside in some other place. Then follow certain ancillary provisions, as, for example, that "Where the court by which the detention order is made is a court of assize or a court of quarter sessions, the court shall remit to a court of summary jurisdiction for the place where the youthful offender or child was committed for trial the determination of his place of residence"; and then by subsection (7) it is provided that "Where a local authority, that is to say, as respects reformatory schools the council of a county or county borough, and as respects industrial schools a local education authority, are aggrieved by the decision of a court as to the place of residence of a youthful offender or child, they may within three months after the making of the detention order apply to a petty sessional court acting in and for the place for which the court which made the order or determined the place of residence acted, and that court, on proof to its satisfaction that the youthful offender or child was resident in the area of another local authority, and after giving such other local authority an opportunity of being heard, may transfer the liability to maintain the youthful offender or child in a certified school to that other local authority." In other words, it is not then too late to put forward the proof referred to in section 74, subsection (3). Prima facie, the place where the offence was committed is the place of residence. It may be proved in the first place that the child resided in some other place, or it may be wrongly believed upon evidence that he resided in some other place, but in the one case as in the other if a local authority is aggrieved it has its remedy by way of complaint, and then the question for the Court is, as it is in subsection (3): Is it satisfied that the youthful offender or child was resident in the area of some other particular local authority?

It has been suggested faintly that because the words "for the purposes of the foregoing provisions of this section" appear in subsection (3), the word "resided" in subsection (3) means something quite different from what it means in subsection (7). In my opinion that is a desperate argument. "The foregoing provisions of this section" are provisions relating to liability in respect to residence, and that also is the subject-matter of complaint.

Here the question which the justices had to decide was where, for the purposes of this Act, it was true to say that this youthful offender resided at the material time. If there was no evidence to show that in fact at the material time he resided in some other place, then the provisions of the statute are conclusive that the place where he committed the offence must be taken for the purposes of this Act to be his place of residence. Now, how is that Act to be construed? Nothing is less useful than seeking to explain a term in one Act of Parliament by reference to the decisions about a like term occurring in other Acts of Parliament alio intuitu. So far as this Act of Parliament is concerned, I should like to refer to the brief and clear judgment (if I may, without presumption, say so) of Mr. Justice Avory in the case of Stoke-on-Trent Corporation v. Cheshire County Council ([1915] 3 K.B., 699, at p. 706). "In my opinion," said Mr. Justice Avory, "it is a question of law. Mr. Montgomery was right in saying that the word 'residence' is capable of various constructions according to the statute in which it appears. I am satisfied that in the Children Act, 1908, it means the place where the person actually resides, as distinguished from the place where he may be said constructively to reside. In my judgment the justices were wrong in law in that respect, for it is clear that they have held that the statute is satisfied by the youthful offender having a constructive residence with his father. I think that they were also wrong in law in holding that there was evidence that the boy was residing with his father. There was no evidence of residence, either actual or constructive, with his father."

In the present case it was never said or suggested that Froxfield in Wiltshire was the place where for the purposes of this Act this boy permanently lived, ate and slept. It was conceded that his residence there with his grandmother was purely temporary. The only ground on which Froxfield was said to be his residence was that Froxfield was where the offence had been committed and that it was not and could not be shown that he had at the material time any other place of residence; and in those circumstances the contention of the London County Council was that for the purposes of this Act Froxfield must be treated as his residence, inasmuch as Froxfield was the place where the crime was committed. That being so, the question before the justices who have stated this case was: Was it true to say that at the material time this child really had a residence in London, where it was contended the place of his residence was ?

Now I say frankly that during a part of the argument of this case my mind was inclined to the view which the justices took ; but I am perfectly satisfied, after the able argument of Mr. Engelbach, that that view was wrong. The facts of the case, so far as the chronology is concerned, may be very briefly stated. This child, an illegitimate child, was born in March, 1912. From May, 1922, to May, 1926, he undoubtedly lived in Westbourne-terrace as a boarder with a Mrs. Curston. From May 7 to May 31, 1926, he was staying with his mother in Camden Town, in her husband's house, in the absence of the husband, and from June 1 to June 30, 1926, he was in service at the Naval and Military Club in London and living in it. On July 1 he went to stay with his grandmother at Froxfield, and while he was there, on July 18, he committed the offence at Froxfield. In the meantime his mother and her husband had gone to Rio, the house in London was given up, the lease was surrendered, and though the child had for some time been living in London it was, I think, in fact quite untrue to say that London then was his place of residence. The justices have found as a fact in this case that when Mrs. Downey—that is his mother—took Morrison to Froxfield, she asked Mrs. Chapman to look after him for three months while she and her husband went abroad, and Mrs. Chapman agreed so to do in return for a weekly payment, but she would not have agreed to have him for longer than three months. More than that, the case also finds that on July 18, 1926, the only relative or friend to whom Mrs. Chapman could have sent the boy was a brother of Mrs. Downey's who lived in Reading. The child's mother was abroad and he had no home then. In other words, he was homeless, and as he was homeless it was not possible for the respondents to prove that he was residing in London. It is suggested that if the question had been one of poor law settlement, other considerations might have applied, as, for example, whether his residence in London was interrupted for the purposes of the Poor Law by the temporary visit to the grandmother in Wiltshire. The nature of that question illustrates by contrast the nature of the question which arises under this statute, and I am satisfied that the only proper conclusion, for the purposes of this statute, upon these materials, was that the effort to prove that this boy at the material time in fact resided in London failed, and that therefore the question of his residence was determined by the opening words of section 74, subsection (3) ; in other words, he must be presumed to reside in the place where the offence was committed.

In those circumstances it seems to me that these justices came to an erroneous conclusion, and that this appeal ought to be allowed, and that the case should go back to the justices with the opinion of this Court upon this point.

Mr. Justice Shearman.—I am of the same opinion, and I base my judgment on the short ground that there was no evidence on which the justices could reasonably find that on July 18, 1926, Morrison's residence was in London.

I need not read again the sections of the statute which my Lord has read. It is clear that if the offence is committed in one jurisdiction that is deemed to be the place of residence until the onus has been shifted by the persons who oppose that presumed residence by showing in fact that there is a residence somewhere else. Ever since the case of Stoke-on-Trent Corporation v. Cheshire County Council ([1915] 3 K.B., 699) it has been well settled, and remains the settled law, that for the purpose of this statute "residence" means actual residence. The argument has been used that that can never mean constructive residence. When you look at that case, and other cases, it is however clearly laid down that a short temporary residence or holiday visit does not create a residence, and therefore it may be that a constructive residence may exist in one sense of the word when somebody has left the place where he sleeps and eats—his real home—for a few days' temporary visit elsewhere, as in the case of a person who is living with his parents and who runs away for a few days : it could not be said that because he had slept somewhere else the night before the offence that he was resident there, and indeed facts of that nature were given in evidence in the Stoke-on-Trent case (supra), to which I have referred.

The facts found by the magistrates in this case are shortly these. This boy, who was illegitimate, had lived, as far as they could trace him back, at a boarding house at the expense of his mother for some years ; he had then been for a week or two in the house where his mother was living with her then husband, while the husband was away, and he had been for a month living in as a servant of a club. The magistrates then go on to find that he had been definitely taken away by his mother from that job and sent to the country for a temporary visit down in Wiltshire. The magistrates, looking at the whole evidence, when they found that the mother and her husband had left the country, stored their furniture, and sold their house, held in plain English words that at the time when he was sent into the country to his grandmother the boy had no home. It seems to me idle to contend that, having no place in London to go back to, and no residence or address, he had got at that time, on July 18, a residence in London, when the magistrates found that his employment and his home in London had both been got rid of definitely and finally, and that he had no home in London.

On those facts, therefore, it seems to me that the magistrates were wrong. It may well be that they could have found that this boy never acquired a new residence by living at Froxfield, but as the statute says that he must be deemed to be living there until it is proved that he had a residence somewhere else, as soon as it is proved that he had no residence anywhere else, the statutory residence comes into effect.

In my view, therefore, the case must go back to the magistrates with the intimation of our opinion that they were wrong.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—I agree. The material date here is July 18, 1926. If the question had arisen, apparently, a short time previously, there was ample evidence that a short time previously the boy was resident in London. It is no doubt rather difficult as an intellectual feat to clear out of one's mind the facts as they were a month before, but I agree that the facts show that there was no evidence that on July 18 he resided in London.

HARNETT v. FISHER.*

Lunacy — Certification—Negligence—Detention under reception order—Statute of Limitations —Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16), ss. 3, 7—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 5), s. 331—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 61), s. 1.

The plaintiff was in 1912 certified as a lunatic by the defendant, a medical man, under s. 4 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and a reception order was then made, under which the plaintiff was detained and was taken to a licensed house. He was kept under detention until October, 1921. In an action brought in May, 1922, for negligence in giving the certificate the defendant denied negligence and pleaded the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, which bars actions on the case six years after the cause of action. The jury found that when the certificate was given the plaintiff was not of unsound mind and that the defendant did not use reasonable care, and they awarded the plaintiff damages.

Held, that the action was barred by s. 3 of the Act of 1623 and the plaintiff could not rely on the protection given by s. 7 of that Act to a person who when the cause of action accrued was non compos mentis, inasmuch as the jury had found that at that time he was not of unsound mind.

Per Lord Blanesburgh : The only statute of limitations applicable was the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and the action was barred by the six months' limitation imposed by s. 1 of that Act, which had the effect of reducing to six months, from the date of the plaintiff's release, the limitation of twelve months imposed by s. 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, since the apparent total repeal of s. 331 of the Act of 1890 by the Act of 1893 was in reality only partial.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 745 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 402) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 745 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 402) dismissing an appeal by the plaintiff from the verdict and judgment entered for the defendant (the respondent) at the trial of the action before Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury (42 The Times L.R., 486).

The action was brought by the appellant, Mr. William Smart Harnett, farmer and fruitgrower, of Springfield, Newington, near Sittingbourne, Kent, for damages against the respondent, Dr. Holdrich Fisher, of High-street, Sittingbourne, a duly qualified medical man, for negligence in signing a medical certificate under the Lunacy Act, 1890, to the effect that the appellant was a lunatic and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment.

The certificate was signed on November 10, 1912, and the writ in the action was issued on May 31, 1922.

The appellant alleged that by reason of the respondent's negligence the appellant was detained as a lunatic for nearly nine years from November 10, 1912, until October 15, 1921.

The respondent pleaded (inter alia) that he acted in good faith and with reasonable care, that he would rely on section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and, further, that the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16).

The general facts of the case are fully stated in the report of the case of Harnett v. Bond (41 The Times L.R., 509 ; [1925] A.C., 669).

At the conclusion of the trial Mr. Justice Horridge put certain questions to the jury which, with the answers thereto, were as follow :—

" (1) Was Mr. Harnett of unsound mind on November 10, 1912, when he was certified by Dr. Fisher ?—No.

" (2) Did Dr. Fisher act with reasonable care in certifying him ?—No.

" (3) Damages ?—£500."

After argument the Judge gave judgment for the respondent, ordering that verdict and judgment should be entered for him on the ground that, the jury having found that on November 10, 1912, the appellant was a sane man, the appellant's right of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations. That judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Scrutton), subject to a variation on the question of costs.

The appellant appeared in person ; Mr. Alexander Neilson, K.C., and Mr. T. Carthew appeared for the respondent.

The appellant, in opening the appeal, contended that the plea that the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations failed on several grounds. First, the question of non compos mentis, being a question of status, was a question of law rather than of fact. Although he was in fact sane, he was legally a lunatic, and as he was under all the disabilities of a lunatic so he was entitled to all the privileges. Secondly, he pleaded estoppel. The respondent had certified that he (the appellant) was insane, and could not now be heard to say that he was sane. Thirdly, the appellant pleaded restraint. Although he had always been desirous of bringing the action, he could not do so without assistance while he was under detention. During that period time did not run against him because he was prevented, by circumstances over which he had no control, from bringing the action. Nor was there any person who was likely to assist him in taking proceedings. His brother would not, as it was on his petition that he was detained as a lunatic ; nor would his wife, who was appointed receiver of his property, as she wanted to get him certified ; nor would Dr. Adam, at whose house he was detained, for he refused to forward a letter which he had written to his solicitor.

The appellant, continuing, said that his first point was that, though in 1912 he was sane in fact, he had the legal status of non compos mentis and suffered all the disabilities arising from that status. He was therefore entitled to the privileges of that status and fell within the exception in the Statute of Limitations. In support of this contention he reviewed the facts relating to his detention as a lunatic down to 1916, the earliest period at which this action could have been begun, and showed that he was prevented, first, by Dr. Adam, in whose charge he was, and, afterwards, by the Master in Lunacy from communicating with his solicitor and taking legal proceedings. There was no reason for that course. He was reported as well conducted and in good health, and he had ample means. His income was about £1,500 a year. Also, he was never allowed to know the grounds on which he was certified and there had been no re-certification as the statute required. On that ground also he was entitled to his discharge. In the previous case of Harnett v. Bond (supra) Dr. Bond had pleaded the Statute of Limitations, but the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, refused to take advantage of that plea as he did not think it was right to do so.

He (the appellant) was de facto in precisely the same position as if he had really been a lunatic. This was illustrated by the decision of the House in Harnett v. Bond (supra), which raised a question as to the order for leave of absence under which he left Dr. Adam's house on December 12, 1912. That order empowered Dr. Adam to take him back before the expiration of his leave if his mental condition required it. That, it was contended, meant if his mental condition in fact required it, but Lord Cave took a different view and held that the medical officer in whom the power to retake was vested was the judge of his mental condition.

His next point was estoppel. The respondent could not be heard to say that the appellant was not a lunatic, because both in his certificate and in his evidence he maintained the contrary, and the respondent repeated that contention in his case in this House (Bloomenthal v. Ford, 13 The Times L.R., 240; [1897] A.C., 156; North Eastern Railway Company v. Wanless, L.R., 7 H.L., 12). He, a Kentish farmer, was placed in an embarrassing position by the action of the respondent, and he could not use his faculties in the same way as he might otherwise have done.

His third point was restraint. Time did not run against him while he was under detention (Stedman v. Hart, Kay, 607, at p. 611). He was impeded in his action by circumstances over which he had no control. Section 82 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, showed that the Legislature did not contemplate that a person detained as a lunatic could bring an action during detention. Time would not run against him until he knew the facts; but he never saw the respondent's certificate until 1921, when he was free (see Molloy v. Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, 22 The Times L.R., 525). It might be argued that he might have taken proceedings when he was out on leave in 1912, but such proceedings would have been stayed, because the action would have had to have been brought by a next friend and he had no one whom he could ask to be his next friend. Also, if he had issued a writ he could not have put in a statement of claim, for he had never seen the certificate; and, lastly, he would have been taken back to the asylum. It was contrary to the intention of the Legislature that he should be deprived of his legal rights and should have no help at all. There was ample justification for giving judgment in his favour on grounds both of law and of justice. The House would be slow to apply the statute to defeat an honest claim (Boatwright v. Boatwright, L.R., 17 Eq., 71, at p. 74). If he had made out a prima facie case for saying that the Statute of Limitations did not apply, he proposed to deal with two other contentions raised by the respondent: (1) that he (the respondent) owed no duty to the appellant to exercise reasonable care; and (2) that the detention was due to the independent order of the justices and not to the certificate. On both those points the Courts below had decided in his (the appellant's) favour.

Mr. Neilson, in opening for the respondent, after expressing his appreciation of the moderation and restraint with which the appellant had conducted his case, said that the question turned ultimately on the construction of the Limitation Act of 1623.

Lord Blanesburgh suggested that that Act had nothing to do with the matter. Section 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, prescribed a special period of limitation in the case of an action brought under section 330, and that period was one year after release. On that hypothesis the appellant's action was not out of time, as it was brought seven months after he regained his liberty. It was true that section 331 was repealed by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, but there was a question as to the extent of that repeal (Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. XIX., ¶ 365). Assuming that the repeal operated, the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, prescribed a special limitation of six months, and on that hypothesis the appellant was out of time; but it had been held that that Act required to be pleaded and that the respondent had not done.

Mr. Neilson then formally applied for leave to amend his pleadings by pleading the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and was provisionally allowed to continue his argument on the footing that leave had been granted. He said that the act complained of was clearly an act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament within the meaning of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and on any view of that Act the appellant was out of time.

The certificate only came into existence for the purpose of the reception order, and was something done in the execution of the statute. The cases of Kent County Council v. Folkestone Corporation (21 The Times L.R., 269; [1905] 1 K.B., 620) and T. Tilling, Limited v. Dick, Kerr and Co., Limited (21 The Times L.R., 281; [1905] 1 K.B., 562), were distinguishable because the act there complained of was not done in pursuance of a public or statutory duty. Alternatively, this action was a pure action for negligence. There was no distinction between this kind of action and any other action for breach of duty, and there was nowhere anything to suggest that the statute of James had been repealed. It was true that the expression "want of reasonable care" was the language of section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, but that was the common way of describing negligence.

Lastly, it was not the giving of the certificate which caused the detention, but the order of the justice. That was the view of Lord Reading in Everett v. Griffiths (37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631), which ultimately reached this House. That view was founded upon Thompson v. Schmidt (8 The Times L.R., 120), and it was accepted by Lord Justice Scrutton. It was true that when Everett v. Griffiths (supra) was before this House Lord Finlay expressed his disapproval of that view, but the decisions of the Courts below were affirmed on other grounds, and Lord Finlay's observations were obiter only. In his (Mr. Neilson's) submission it was the act of the justice which brought about the appellant's detention. On those grounds the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be sustained.

The appellant, in reply, said that at the trial he claimed no damages for detention; he simply claimed for wrongful certification.

The House took time for consideration.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords: The respondent, a country doctor in Kent, was asked by another doctor, an old friend of his, to examine his patient, the present appellant, with a view to certifying his opinion of his mental state, and the respondent consented to do so. From a window he watched the appellant for a short time in the street and took note of his demeanour, and subsequently he made an attempt to get into conversation with him. In the result he signed a certificate in the form required by the Lunacy Act, 1890, in which he pronounced the appellant to be of unsound mind. The appellant's brother, who presented the necessary petition for a reception order, took this certificate and that of the other doctor before-mentioned to a justice of the peace, who thereupon made the order and the appellant was placed in confinement as a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. All this happened on November 10, 1912.

Although on some subsequent occasions the appellant regained his liberty to a limited extent, he remained under detention till October 15, 1921, when he made his escape and remained at large till a sufficient period had elapsed to prevent his being again detained without further certification and a further order. From that time he has been at liberty. On his application the Master in Lunacy on December 12, 1921, discharged the receivership order over his property and income, which had been made on July 17, 1913, and on May 31, 1922, he began the present action against the respondent.

The statement of claim alleged negligence as a medical man in connexion with the examination and the certificate, and claimed damages resulting therefrom in respect of the entire period of almost nine years' detention. Negligence was alleged under two separate heads: (1) an inadequate examination, made without due care, and after perfunctory and momentary observations of the plaintiff's demeanour; and (2) certification without due consideration and on insufficient grounds and an incorrect recital, in the certificate, of the facts, which he purported to have observed himself. This latter allegation really meant that the facts stated in the certificate were not true, not that it did not correctly set out what the respondent alleged that he had in fact observed. No point appears to have been made at the trial that the respondent had been careless in the wording of the certificate, as distinguished from carelessness in ascertaining the grounds for it.

The original defence, in addition to traverses, relied specifically on sections 330 and 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. A formal amendment three years later pleaded 21 Jac. I., c. 16. An informal notice of reply was subsequently given by the plaintiff alleging (a) that during the period of his detention he was, within the contemplation of that Act, non compos mentis or was to be treated as such in law and in fact under the circumstances alleged in the statement of claim, and (b) that the defendant, whose certificate had caused his prolonged detention, ought not to be heard to allege that the claim was barred by lapse of time or that the plaintiff was compos mentis on November 10, 1912.

On these pleadings the cause went to trial before Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury in Middlesex, and in answer to the learned Judge's questions the jury found as follows:—Was the plaintiff of unsound mind on November 10, 1912?—No. Did the defendant act with reasonable care?—No. Damages £500. No question was put as to the good faith referred to in section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Thereupon judgment was entered for the defendant on the ground that the action was statute-barred under the Act of 1623, but the verdict has not been challenged. The Court of Appeal unanimously affirmed this judgment. Hence this appeal.

My Lords, the respondent has not for present purposes disputed that a cause of action would arise at common law as for breach of duty towards the appellant, if the respondent was actually wanting in reasonable care in his examination and in forming his conclusion as to the appellant's state of mind. I need therefore express no opinion on this question.

The ground of the decision of both Courts below may be tersely put thus. The jury found conclusively that on the day of the examination the appellant was of sound mind, and he is not shown ever to have been otherwise. If, then, the appellant never has been non compos mentis he could not bring himself within the disability section (section 7) of the statute of James, and the period of six years ran from November 10, 1912. He cannot be allowed to blow hot and cold and to say for the purposes of getting the verdict and damages that he was sane all along, and yet, for the purpose of meeting the plea of the statute, that he must nevertheless be deemed to have been insane so as to prevent time from running.

My Lords, the appellant, who appeared at your Lordships' Bar in person, not only conducted himself with great propriety and moderation, but laid his legal argument before your Lordships in a way which was equally of assistance to your Lordships and to his own case. He said briefly that under the Lunacy Act, 1890, and for its purposes, he was made a lunatic and treated in person and property accordingly, and that for any purpose of bringing the present action he was in fact to all intents as much disabled as if he had been non compos mentis. As a practical matter it would have been impossible for him to have begun his action till after he had made his escape. On a "liberal" construction, the statute should be read as bringing this state of things within the disability section.

To this I am afraid I must say, as was said by both Courts below, that the Act does not say so, and cannot be made to say so, without wresting it from its language in a way that is not permitted to us. The object of the Act is to protect defendants against belated claims—not merely those defendants who have a good defence and to that extent need no protection, but those also who have not or who, owing to lapse of time, can no longer count on making out a sufficient answer (Perry v. Jackson, 4 Term Rep., 516, at p. 519; A'Court v. Cross, 3 Bing., 329, at p. 332; Tolson v. Kaye, 3 B. and B., 217, at p. 222). The present action is an action on the case, and, being within the Act, is prima facie statute-barred, unless the appellant can bring himself within the only words in the disability section which touch him, namely, non compos mentis. What those plain words mean is further shown, if that be necessary, by the words used to express the opposite state, viz., "of sound memory." They describe an actual mental condition, which the jury's word "sane" negatives, and not a treatment imposed or a disability suffered, because the plaintiff has been wrongly supposed to be in that mental state, by whosesoever fault, even that of the defendant himself, this may have been brought about. On one occasion, about a month after the reception order was made, the appellant was allowed to leave the asylum provisionally and was actually at large for some two days, and after his return there he was in frequent communication with his solicitor and occasionally saw him personally. I think, however, that one may accept the statement that even the issue of a writ against the respondent was beyond his power, much as it would have been if, though sane, he had been bedridden and in poverty, but in the latter case no one could doubt that his disability was not one of those named in the section. Neither will it do, if he was called insane when he was really sane. The question is not, as the appellant put it, of the status of a lunatic, imposed on him after the making of the reception order, but of his mental condition of sanity or insanity, and this has been finally disposed of in his favour by the verdict. I am not concerned to justify what the Legislature has enacted or to regret that it has gone no further to assist persons in the appellant's position. I therefore agree entirely with the conclusion of the Court of Appeal.

After the appellant had concluded his argument a question was raised by one of your Lordships, which, though it had not been raised before either here or below, is of much importance. It was whether the right statutory limitation had been relied on. The Lunacy Act of 1890 provided in section 331 that any action, brought by any person who had been detained as a lunatic, against any person for anything done under the Act, must be brought within 12 months after the detained person's release. If this is the Act which applies, the action was brought in time. This section, however, is included in the schedule of repeals attached to the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. A question has been raised, but not I think decided, as to the extent to which this repeal goes, and it is said that, although the terms of the Act of 1893 seem at first sight to provide for an absolute repeal, the true reading of it is that section 331 is kept alive for the purpose of claims against persons who are within section 331 but are not among those protected by the Act of 1893. In that case, assuming that these later limitation sections would preclude the application of the general Act, either section 331 remains in force and this action was begun within time, or, if the defendant is within the ambit of the Act of 1893, the limitation which it contains, dating as it does from the time when the cause of action accrued, would not be available to protect the respondent, because that Act had not been pleaded.

I think it was the opinion of all your Lordships that leave to amend by pleading the Act of 1893 ought to be granted to the respondent in the circumstances, the only question to be settled now being that of the terms, if any, to be imposed, if it were necessary to hold that the defendant was within the protection of the Act of 1893, in so far as he was sued for any act done in pursuance of the Lunacy Act, 1890, or in respect of any neglect in the execution of that Act or of any public duty; but the question would further arise, How far, if at all, is he thus sued in these proceedings?

I am strongly of opinion that no terms should be imposed as a condition of the grant of this leave. By section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, a successful defendant is entitled as of right to costs of the action as between solicitor and client. It seems to me that the defendant is not more in fault in overlooking the Act of 1893 than his opponent. They were in equal ignorance, and not they alone. Nobody thought of this point at all. In the case of limitation sections, passed for the protection of defendants, it ought not to be presumed that a second provision constitutes an implied repeal of the first pro tanto, unless their respective terms are inconsistent with one another, and a limitation to 12 months from the alleged lunatic's restoration to liberty is not inconsistent with a term of six years from his first detention. As to the Act of 1893, the question is, whether the defendant was acting under it at all. If, though I should not concede it without hearing argument on the point, the language and purpose of the Act of 1893 or that of 1890 require that the periods of limitation there given are to be substituted for and are exclusive of those given in the statute of James, I think that the plaintiff, instead of arguing the statute of James from Court to Court, ought to have contended at the outset that it did not apply, and that the defendant's choice lay between an Act which did not help him and an Act which he had not pleaded. Other terms as to leave to amend might then have been timely and fair. I think it is enough, if, so far as leave to amend is concerned, the result remains the same as if the Act of 1893 had not been brought into the discussion. After all, the defendant has not had the chance of getting solicitor and client costs at the trial.

It appears to me, however, that no amendment is needed, because it really is the statute of James that applies to this case. What is the action to which the Act of 1893 applies? It is one brought for doing or neglecting to do an act under any statute of the kind described, in this case the Lunacy Act, 1890. As far as the present action is concerned the only such act is signing the certificate in the prescribed form. When, however, we look at the statement of claim and still more at the substance of the case as proved at the trial and since alleged on two appeals, the gist of the action is not the signing of the prescribed form of certificate but the lack of care in examining into the appellant's mental state and in forming an adverse opinion about it. The negligence, for which the action was brought, could only arise in this connexion. The claim was not for breach of a statutory but of a common law duty. Negligence as a medical practitioner acting in the course of his private practice is what is charged against the respondent.

Any principle on which this cause of action could be sustained would be equally applicable if the defendant had signed nothing but had given his opinion to the magistrate orally. The rest is either a separate cause of action under the Lunacy Act, 1890, for which no damage could be recovered since the detention order was the order of the justice and not of the doctor, or is a mere item in the damages claimed for the negligence. It may be that in view of section 317 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the proceedings to be taken in case of mis-statements made in medical certificates under the Act are criminal proceedings only. In my opinion the present cause of action being on the case for an alleged common law breach of duty, the statute of James was the statute applicable. I think that, whether the pleadings are amended on the terms I suggest or not at all, this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, England, dismissing an appeal by the present appellant against the verdict found for the present respondent, and the judgment entered up thereon dated April 27, 1926. The appellant is a farmer, and fruit and hop grower, residing at Baroona, 19, Vale-road, Balham. The respondent is a duly qualified medical man who has for many years practised at Sittingbourne in the county of Kent. The appellant in his case sets forth his grievance and his alleged cause of action against the respondent in the following terms:—

"3. The writ in the action was issued on May 31,

1922, claiming damages against the respondent for negligence in certifying the appellant to be a lunatic and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment.

" 4. By his statement of claim delivered on July 12, 1922, the appellant alleged :—

" (a) That on November 10, 1912, his brother Arthur Harnett presented a petition to one R. G. E. Locke, a justice of the peace for the county of Kent, for an order for the reception of the appellant as a person of unsound mind into the licensed house of one Dr. G. H. Adam, at West Malling, Kent.

" (b) That the said petition was accompanied by a medical certificate made by the respondent in his capacity as a medical practitioner in which he alleged that he had personally examined the appellant and come to the conclusion that he was a lunatic and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment.

" (c) That by the said certificate the respondent had formed such conclusions on the facts and grounds therein set forth.

" (d) That the facts and grounds alleged in the said certificate were inaccurate in the respects set forth in paragraph 4 of the statement of claim.

" (e) That the said petition was also accompanied by a medical certificate made by Dr. F. W. H. Penfold, since deceased.

" (f) That on the same day, November 10, 1912, the said R. G. E. Locke made an order upon the said petition accompanied by the said certificates authorizing the said Dr. G. H. Adam to receive the appellant as a patient into his said licensed house.

" (g) That the same day, November 10, 1912, the appellant was received under the said order at Dr. Adam's said licensed house and thereunder there detained from November 10, 1912, until February 22, 1913, and thereafter detained under the said order at divers asylums and places registered or licensed for the reception of lunatics (more particularly specified in paragraph 8 of the statement of claim) until October 15, 1921, when he escaped."

The appellant is entirely in error in supposing or thinking that he was after February 22, 1913, detained in any asylum under the authority of the order of November 10, 1912. His subsequent detention was, by the House of Lords, held to have taken place under proceedings with which neither Dr. Adam nor the respondent were connected, and for which neither of them is responsible.

The appellant proceeds to aver—

" (h) That the respondent in making his said medical certificate was negligent and acted without reasonable care in the respects set forth in paragraph 9 of the statement of claim."

In paragraph 9 of the statement of claim the tort for which the appellant sues the respondent is described as follows :—

" 9. The defendant in making the said medical certificate acted without reasonable care in the respects following. There was no real examination of the plaintiff by the defendant for the purposes of the said certificate at all ; the examination alleged by the defendant in the said certificate was momentary, perfunctory, and a sham. The grounds upon which the defendant made his said certificate were entirely insufficient and the defendant gave the said certificate without proper consideration as to the sufficiency of the said grounds. Further the defendant gave the said certificate upon grounds which so far as they relate to facts indicating insanity observed by the defendant at the time of the alleged examination amount to nothing at all."

On October 13, 1922, the respondent delivered his defence. He admitted paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 6 of the statement of claim, alleged that the facts stated in paragraph 4 were inaccurately set forth, and made no admission as to the allegations contained in paragraphs 7 and 8. As to paragraph 9 of the statement of claim he denies the allegation of fact therein contained and avers that in all the matters therein referred to he acted with good faith and with reasonable care and in pursuance of the Lunacy Act, 1890. He further states that he will at the trial of the action rely on section 330, subsection 1, and section 331 of the said statute. The respondent admits that the appellant was detained as a lunatic, but denies that the detention was at the places or for the periods referred to in paragraph 10 of the statement of claim, and further denies that such detention was due to any negligence on his part.

On December 16, 1925, the respondent, pursuant to an order of that date, amended his defence by adding the following paragraph :—

" The plaintiff's alleged right and/or rights of action did not accrue, if at all, within six years before the commencement of this action, and was and/or were barred by the Limitation Act of 1623, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16."

On March 3, 1926, the appellant's solicitor, Mr. Harry Coulson, wrote to the respondent's solicitors, Messrs. Le Brasseur and Oakley, a letter, informing them that as there had not been time to file a reply to the new defence it was the appellant's intention to apply to the Judge at the trial for leave to contend by way of reply to the amended defence—

" (a) That at the time of the accrual of the plaintiff's cause of action herein and until October 15, 1921, he was, within the contemplation of the statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, non compos mentis or to be treated as such in law and in fact, having regard to the matters pleaded in the statement of claim—and

" (b) That for the purpose of his said plea of the said Statute of Limitations, the defendant, by reason of the matters pleaded in the statement of claim, cannot be heard to say that the plaintiff was compos mentis on November 10, 1912, when the said certificate was given by the defendant, the said reception order was made by the said Locke and/or the plaintiff was received into the said licensed house of the said Dr. G. H. Adam, and/or between the said 10th November, 1912, and the 15th October, 1921."

In the 9th paragraph of the appellant's case it is stated that at the trial the appellant through his counsel agreed to confine his claim for damages for negligence to the period from November 10, 1912, to the time the plaintiff was received and detained by Dr. G. H. Adam at West Malling. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury for several days in the month of April, 1926. The learned Judge left the three following questions to the jury :—

" (1) Was the plaintiff of unsound mind on the 10th November, 1912 ? to which they answered, No.

" (2) Did the defendant act with reasonable care ? to which the jury also answered, No.

" (3) What damages, if any ? and they answered £500."

The respondent does not seek to have that verdict set aside.

Thereupon the learned Judge directed a verdict and judgment to be entered for the respondent on the ground that the Limitation Act, 1623, 21 Jac. I., c. 16, was a good defence at law.

The Court of Appeal unanimously held that the appellant's action in this case fell within the third section of the statute of Jac. I., which definitely provides that such an action is barred after the lapse of six years from the accrual of the cause of action. The cause of action in this case admittedly accrued on November 10, 1912. And the action in respect of it was not instituted till May 31, 1922, nearly ten years afterwards.

It is unnecessary to set forth the words of the statute.

The appellant contends, however, that notwithstanding that the jury have found that he was, on November 10, 1912, of sane mind, and have awarded him £500 damages in respect of the detention he has suffered owing to the negligence of the defendant in giving a certificate to the effect that he was insane, he was in fact non compos mentis during the whole time from November 10, 1912, till October 15, 1921, when he regained his liberty ; and that therefore the time limit of six years only ran against him from the latter date. The Court of Appeal without calling on counsel for the respondent dismissed the appeal. They varied the judgment of Mr. Justice Horridge on the question of the costs of those issues on which the appellant had succeeded. On this no point arises in the present appeal, and in all other respects they affirmed Mr. Justice Horridge's decision. Their Lordships concur with the Court of Appeal. They think their decision was perfectly sound and right on the question raised before them. During the progress of the hearing in this House, however, attention was called by one of its members to the question of the possible application of the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, to certain provisions of the Lunacy Act, 1890, affecting in some respects its administration. This is a matter of such importance that I think it should be dealt with. The former of these statutes is entitled : "An Act to generalize and amend certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties."

The first section enacted :—"Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provision shall have effect : (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof. . . ." The final clause of this section enacted : "This section shall not affect any proceedings by any department of the Government against any local authority or officer of a local authority."

By section 2 it was enacted : "There shall be repealed as to the United Kingdom so much of any public general Act as enacts that in any proceeding to which this Act applies—(a) the proceeding is to be commenced in any particular place, or (b) the proceeding is to be commenced within any particular time . . . and in particular there shall be so repealed the enactments specified in the schedule to this Act to the extent in that schedule mentioned. . . ." The Act of 21 James I., c. 16, is not mentioned in this schedule. The Lunacy Act of 1890 is mentioned in it, but section 331 of that Act alone is repealed and the repealed section only provided that any action brought by any person who had been detained as a lunatic against any person for anything done under the Act should be commenced within 12 months next after the release of the party bringing the action. This section would not apply to the appellant even if not repealed, as he was not released from Dr. Adam's licensed house where he was detained, but from which he escaped.

The aim and proper construction of this Act of 1893 have been many times considered and ruled upon by this House and many other legal tribunals both in England and in Scotland. One point has been definitely established, that the statute does not necessarily apply to all the acts of public companies, corporations, or quasi legislative bodies which are intra vires. In the case of Bradford Corporation v. Myers (32 The Times L.R., 113 ; [1916] 1 A.C., 242) the construction of the statute was most carefully considered, and a great number of cases reviewed. There the corporation, a municipal body, were authorized by Act of Parliament to carry on the undertaking of a gas company, bound to supply gas to the inhabitants of their district, and empowered to sell coke produced in the manufacture of the gas. The defendants contracted to sell and deliver to the plaintiff a ton of coke. By the negligence of the corporation's agent the coke was shot through the shop window of the purchaser. More than six months after this accident the purchaser commenced an action against the corporation for negligence.

The Court of Appeal held that the corporation were not entitled to the protection they claimed. They then appealed to this House.

Lord Buckmaster, then Lord Chancellor, in delivering judgment, after expressing rather scanty approval of the ground of decision in the case of Sharpington v. Fulham Guardians (20 The Times L.R., 643 ; [1904] 2 Ch., 449), which excluded an action for breach of contract from the protection of this statute, in a clear, pithy and pregnant passage of his judgment, described the nature and character of the acts which the statute was designed to protect, and said : "While the preamble is necessary thus to constrict the meaning of the persons whom the statute is intended to protect, the words of the section themselves limit the class of action, and show that it was not intended to cover every act which a local authority had power to perform. In other words, it is not because the act out of which an action arises is within their power that a public authority enjoy the benefit of the statute. It is because the act is one which is either an act in the direct execution of a statute, or in the discharge of a public duy, or the exercise of a public authority. I regard these latter words as meaning a duty owed to all the public alike or an authority exercised impartially with regard to all the public. It assumes that there are duties and authorities which are not public, and that in the exercise or discharge of such duties or authorities this protection does not apply. This distinction is well illustrated by the present case. It may be conceded that the local authority were bound properly to dispose of their residual products ; but there was no obligation upon them to dispose by sale, though this was the most obvious and ordinary way. Still less was there any duty to dispose of them to the respondent. No member of the public could have complained if the respondent had not been supplied ; nor had any member of the public the right to require the local authority to contract with him. The act complained of arose because one of the servants of the appellants, acting in the course of an errand on which they had power to send him, but on which they were not bound in the execution of any Act or in the discharge of any public duty or authority to send him, in breach of his common law duty to his fellow citizens caused damage by his personal negligence. In my opinion an action for such negligence is not within the class of action contemplated by the statute."

To the same effect is the case of Clarke v. St. Helens Borough Council (85 L.J., K.B., 17).

An effort was made to distinguish this case from the case of Bradford Corporation v. Myers (supra), which I do not think was very successful.

I now turn to the provisions of the Lunacy Act of 1890, for the purpose of considering the nature, scope and aim of those of its provisions dealing with the proceeding of which the appellant was the subject.

It may well be that a medical man who treats a patient, or purports to express an opinion on that patient's bodily or mental state of health, is bound to do the work he has undertaken to do with reasonable care and skill. In this case it was alleged by the appellant and found by the jury that the respondent was guilty of negligence in giving a certain certificate, dated November 10, 1912, pursuant to the provisions of section 4 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, upon which, coupled with a similar certificate of the same date given by Dr. Penfold, since deceased, both accompanying a petition presented to Richard Good Edward Locke, the justice of the peace for the county of Kent specially appointed as the judicial authority under section 6, subsection 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the latter gentleman made an order authorizing Dr. G. H. Adam to receive the appellant as a patient in his licensed house at West Malling. This order contains a declaration by the said R. G. E. Locke to the effect that he had personally seen the appellant before making the order.

Negligence is a breach of duty, but the question is to whom this duty to use reasonable skill and care is owed. This action is founded on the assumption that it was owed to the appellant. The additional question is whether the alleged act of the defendant in abstaining from exercising due and reasonable skill and care in granting his certificate was an act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority. These words must, I think, bear the meaning attributed to them by Lord Buckmaster in Bradford Corporation v. Myers (supra, at p. 247). The language of the Act does not cover all the acts which a local authority has power to perform. It is because the act is one which is an act either in the direct execution of a statute or in discharge of a public duty or in the exercise of a public authority that it is covered.

By section 4 of the Lunacy Act of 1890 it is enacted that in a case such as this, "a person, not being a pauper or a lunatic so found by inquisition, shall not be received and detained as a lunatic in an institution for lunatics or as a single patient unless under a reception order made by the judicial authority hereinafter mentioned." The order is to be obtained upon a private application by petition accompanied by a statement of particulars and by two medical certificates on separate sheets of paper. The statement of particulars accompanying the petition is in this case very full and convincing.

"Upon the presentation of the petition" (section 6) "the judicial authority shall consider the allegations in the petition and statement of particulars, and the evidence of lunacy appearing by the medical certificates, and whether it is necessary for him personally to see and examine the alleged lunatic, and if he is satisfied that an order may properly be made forthwith he may make the same accordingly, or if not so satisfied, he shall appoint as early a time as practicable, not being more than seven days after the presentation of the petition for the consideration thereof, and he may make such further or other inquiries of or concerning the alleged lunatic as he may think fit."

The statement of particulars accompanying the petition may be, and in this case is, very important, referring, for instance, to the lunacy of relatives, but one finds that by section 317 of the statute the petitioner, and the makers of a reception order, or of a medical or other certificate, or of any statement in respect of bodily or mental condition, are all placed in the same boat, and are all made guilty of a misdemeanour, if in any of the above-mentioned documents they make a wilful misstatement of any material fact.

It is difficult to see on what principle a petitioner who is guilty of negligence in framing his statement of particulars, but not guilty of misstatement of any material fact, should not be liable to be sued for that negligence as the doctor may be who negligently frames his certificate on examining the alleged lunatic. If the latter comes within the statute of 1893 the former would seem necessarily to be within it also, as he is within the 317th section of the statute of 1890.

Section 28 of the Act of 1890 is headed "Requirements of Reception Orders and Medical Certificates."

It enacts that a medical certificate shall be made and signed by a medical practitioner. It is to state the facts upon which the certifying medical practitioner has formed his opinion that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic, distinguishing facts observed by himself from facts communicated by others. It provides that a reception order is not to be made upon a certificate founded only on facts communicated by others. By section 28 (4) it is provided that every medical certificate made under and for the purposes of the Act shall be evidence of the facts therein appearing, and of the judgment therein stated to have been formed by the certifying medical practitioners on such facts, as if the matters therein appearing had been verified on oath. This reveals the true nature and function of the medical certificates. They are pieces of evidence just as the statements of the petitioner are pieces of evidence, and are supplied to the judicial authority to help it to decide on the matter of the petition. Many precautions are taken to make this evidence as reliable as possible. The succeeding sections set out these precautions.

Section 29 requires that the person or persons giving the certificate should have personally examined the alleged lunatic. Where two medical certificates are required each medical practitioner must examine him separately. Section 31 provides that one of the medical certificates accompanying a petition shall, where practicable, be under the hand of the usual medical attendant of the alleged lunatic. If that cannot be done the reason is to be stated in writing to the judicial authority to whom the petition is presented, and is to be deemed part of the petition.

Section 32 (1) provides: "No person shall be received or detained as a lunatic in any institution for lunatics or as a single patient where any certificate accompanying the reception order has been signed by any of the following persons:—

"(a) The manager of the institution or the person who is to have charge of the single patient.

"(b) Any person interested in the payments on account of the patient.

"(c) Any regular medical attendant in the institution. . . ."

It is by section 33 further provided that "a medical practitioner who is a commissioner or a visitor shall not sign any certificate for the reception of a patient into a hospital or licensed house unless he is directed to visit the patient by a judicial authority under this Act, or by the Lord Chancellor, or a Secretary of State, or a committee appointed by a Judge in lunacy." Thus everything that could well be done has been done to detach the medical practitioner who signs one of these certificates from the staff of the institution in which the lunatic is to be confined. He cannot have any interest in the payments made on account of any patient confined. In one sense the general public in a community have an interest in the ability, skill, qualification and effectiveness of the medical men residing and practising in that community. The aid of one or more of these can, in any case if need be, be obtained by private contract, but in the matter of the reception of an alleged lunatic in an asylum or licensed house, the giver of a certificate owes no duty to the general public or to any public institution or authority whatever. He is not an employee of the State or of any municipal body carrying on certain services for such bodies. He is simply engaged as a medical man to give an opinion as to a patient's state of health, as he would be to diagnose the state of health of any patient who in his daily practice called upon him to prescribe for him.

I therefore am clearly of opinion that the Public Authorities Protection Act of 1893 does not apply to the appellant's action, and that his remedy is barred by the Act of 21 James I., and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords: I agree with the reasons given and the conclusions arrived at by the noble and learned Viscount on the Woolsack. At the same time I have to admit that it seems to be a strange result that the fact that the appellant proved to the satisfaction of the jury that he never was non compos should enable the respondent to escape from the damages awarded against him for his negligence, but I can see no answer to the plea of the statute of limitations on which the respondent relies.

LORD BLANESBURGH (read by LORD CARSON).—My Lords: The appellant was well entitled to Mr. Neilson's tribute of respect for the moderation and ability with which he presented his case at your Lordships' Bar. By verdicts of two juries, he, in Lord Buckmaster's words in Harnett v. Bond (41 The Times L.R., 509; [1925] A.C., 669), "while a sane man has been imprisoned in a private lunatic asylum and it follows that he has suffered a grievous wrong for which no money payment can provide an adequate compensation." His moderation and ability displayed in this case only served to disclose as in a flash the extent of that wrong. But great as it has been, it can furnish no justification for an order upon the respondent to make the money payment which the jury here have awarded against him, if in truth the appellant's claim against the respondent is out of time and the objection that it is has been properly taken.

And, my Lords, if the statute of James applies to this case at all, it must, I think, be agreed that the action is out of time. The argument of the appellant upon the construction of that Act, sensible and forcible though it was, left, I thought, almost untouched the reasoning and conclusions both of Mr. Justice Horridge and of the Court of Appeal.

But the appellant's argument raised, in my mind at all events, the gravest doubt whether a limitation statute to which such a construction was applicable could really have been left by the Legislature to govern the particular claim made by him in this suit. If it be the function of an appropriate limitation period to hold the scales evenly between plaintiff and defendant, the statute of James seemed to be singularly unsuited to a claim like the present—equally so, indeed, whether its true construction was that for which the appellant contended or that put forward by the respondent. On either view the statute must, if applicable, bring in not a few similar cases dire results in its train. If, for example, the appellant's contention were to be upheld that in such a case as this the duration of a plaintiff's de facto insanity imputed to him as a result of the defendant's certificate is, like a period of genuine insanity, to be excised from the limitation period, it would, indeed, be oppressive on a medical defendant acting, as the respondent here acted, in perfect good faith, that not within a short period after the disability ceased, but in a suit commenced six years later, he might be called upon to justify his actions, possibly almost, if not entirely, forgotten. If, on the other hand, during the same de facto disability, with consequences to a plaintiff as devastating and paralysing in their incidents and restraints as if he were in fact insane, time, as the respondent contends, was continuously running in favour of the defendant, it would only be necessary that the period of restraint should be sufficiently prolonged and the wrong done to the plaintiff in that respect sufficiently grievous for him to be deprived by the statute of all remedy, however unjustifiable or even malicious the defendant's acts might have been.

But the improbability that the Legislature had left a claim of this kind to be governed in the matter of limitation by a statute so clumsily inappropriate was shown also by considerations still more pertinent. The provisions of section 82 of the Lunacy Act of 1890 itself are even more significant in the same direction. By that section it is provided that the Secretary to the Commissioners shall, upon the discharge of a person who considers himself to have been unjustly confined as a lunatic, furnish to him upon his request, free of expense, a copy of the reception order and certificate or certificates upon which he was confined, and, if the order was made upon petition, also of the petition and statement of particulars upon which the reception order was made. That is to say, it is only upon his discharge that the person considering himself to have been unjustly confined is to be supplied with a copy of the certificate upon which his claim to redress in such an action as this depends. Could it have been supposed by the Legislature when enacting that section that the claim of the person so unjustly confined might by that time have become statute-barred? I did not think so, and thus was I led to inquire for myself whether some other period of limitation than appellant's position which the statute of James, had not been specially devised by the Legislature for a claim like this, a limitation period which would be consistent with the implications of section 82 and would be free from the injustice to those in the appellant's position which the statute of James, had it been left applicable, might bring in its train.

And, my Lords, I have, on examination, reached the conclusion that there is such a limitation period in fact specially prescribed by statute, and, relatively unimportant as in the present instance the result may be to the appellant, the principle involved may be of such wide-reaching consequence in other cases that I make no apology for directing your Lordships' attention to the matter with some particularity.

My Lords, this action was, I think, correctly described by Mr. Justice Horridge in his considered judgment after the trial, as one by the plaintiff against the defendant, a medical man, for having without reasonable care on November 10, 1912, given a certificate under section 4 (2) of the Lunacy Act, 1890, that the plaintiff was a lunatic and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. The claim really is one based upon the well-known case of Hall v. Semple (3 F. and F., 337) for damages due to the breach of the duty which, as there laid down, the defendant owed to the plaintiff under the Lunacy Act of 1890 not to give a certificate without exercise on his part of reasonable care. The statement of claim here, it is true, does not define the cause of action so precisely. The Lunacy Act, 1890, is not in terms there referred to and the suit may thus appear to be framed independently of that Act. But the allegations of the claim were not so regarded by the defendant, who, in paragraph 4 of his defence, alleges that in respect of the matters complained of "he acted in good faith with reasonable care and in pursuance of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and that in particular he will rely upon section 330, subsection 1, and section 331 thereof at the trial."

The issue so raised was accepted. Upon it the whole trial proceeded. The plaintiff did not challenge the defendant's good faith. The defendant did challenge the plaintiff's sanity. The questions put to the jury accordingly were two: 1. Was the plaintiff of unsound mind on November 10, 1912? 2. Did the defendant act with reasonable care? To each question the jury answered, "No," and in answer to a third question they assessed the damages at £500.

My Lords, upon these findings two points were made before Mr. Justice Horridge by the defendant. The first was that Hall v. Semple (supra) was not good law and that the defendant owed no duty under the statute to exercise reasonable care—no duty upon the defendant apart from the statute, I may observe, was ever suggested. The second was that the cause of the plaintiff's detention as a lunatic was the independent order of the justice and not the certificate of the defendant. Both points were decided by the learned Judge against the respondent. Neither of them is raised by him now. The point under Hall v. Semple (supra) remains where it was left by this House in Everett v. Griffiths (37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631). There the correctness of that decision was assumed but not decided. Now its correctness is no longer challenged. The jury's verdict accordingly stands and the plaintiff's right to judgment under it is acknowledged, subject only to the question of limitation. That is the one issue before your Lordships, and upon that issue the questions that remain are, what statute of limitations applies, and has that statute been pleaded?

My Lords, in his original defence, the respondent pleaded only one limitation, section 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. The scope of that section is for present purposes important. It can perhaps best be appreciated if reference be had first to section 330 (1) which, as above stated, is also pleaded. That subsection provides that a person who, after the passing of the Act, inter alia, signs a certificate purporting to be a certificate under the Act "shall not be liable to any civil . . . proceedings . . . on any . . . ground if such person has acted in good faith and with reasonable care." It is, inter alia, with reference to such a certificate and such proceedings that section 331 provides that "any action brought by any person who has been detained as a lunatic against any person for anything done under this Act shall be commenced within twelve months next after the release of the party bringing the action," a provision, it will be noted, in entire consonance with section 82, to which reference has already been made.

Here I pause to mention that the corresponding section 105 of the Lunacy Act, 1845, then in force, was treated by Mr. Justice Crompton in Hall v. Semple (supra, at p. 358) as the appropriate limitation statute in a case like this. "It is provided," he says, "that no action shall be brought against any person for anything done in pursuance of the Act, unless the same shall be commenced within twelve months [next after the release of the party bringing the action]; and if this action had not been commenced within that period I should have thought that part of the section applied."

Section 331 of the present Act was accordingly well pleaded. But the section was repealed in 1893; a fact which apparently was overlooked when the defence was delivered. Presumably the repeal was subsequently discovered by the defendant's advisers, and under an order dated December 16, 1925, the defence was amended by adding a paragraph to the effect that the plaintiff's alleged rights of action were barred by the statute of James, the Limitation Act, 1623. In other respects, however, the defence remained unamended; section 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, is still pleaded in paragraph 4.

Now, my Lords, if I have correctly appreciated and faithfully recorded the true limits and scope of this suit as fought and decided, I cannot myself doubt that if section 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, had remained unrepealed, that section and it alone prescribed the only period of limitation to which this action was subject. Is then that position which goes back at all events to 1845 entirely lost now, although section 82 of the Act still remains in force. In my judgment, no. The section, although repealed, still speaks, albeit in modified terms. The repeal is effected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, an enactment whose purpose is to generalize and amend certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory or other public duties, and difficult as it has been in many cases to ascertain the true effect of that enactment, no difficulty, I think, arises in this instance. It is only necessary to compare the provisions of section 331, which is expressly repealed, with the following provision of the Act of 1893 to see that that section still lives in an amended form. The words are these:—

"Where after the commencement of this Act any action . . . is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament . . . or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act . . .

"(a) The action . . . shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced . . . in case of a continuance of injury or damage within six months next after the ceasing thereof . . ."

I cannot doubt, my Lords, that in that amended form section 331 of the Act of 1890 repealed expressly by the statute still operates, applicable as before to the respondent's certificate, but shortening the period after what in the Act of 1890 in the case of a plaintiff who has been detained as a lunatic is termed his "release" to a term which without doubt or possible question makes it a complete bar to the present suit. For, my Lords, while, if section 331 had been the section applicable, there might have been some question whether the detention for which the respondent was responsible came to an end within 12 months before the institution of the action—I myself, in agreement with my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson, think it had come to an end long before—there can be no doubt at all that it came to an end more than six months before its institution. The appellant escaped finally from confinement on October 15, 1921, and this action was not commenced until May 31, 1922. In my judgment, therefore, the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, is the Statute of Limitations, and the only Statute of Limitations which applies to this action. If pleaded it would have been a complete answer. But it is not pleaded. Accordingly, unless leave is now given to the respondent to amend his defence by rectifying that omission, he has, in my judgment, no answer to this appeal.

But Mr. Neilson applied for leave to amend his defence in that respect should amendment be necessary. I entirely agree that in the circumstances leave to amend should be granted, and on terms which are not onerous. My Lords, these terms, if they rested with me, would be that as the price of the amendment the respondent should lose his costs of the appeal. I know that the objection was not taken by the appellant himself, but, if my view of the matter be right, the respondent, on his unamended defence, is in mercy, and the appellant has not had that opportunity of reconsidering his position, which he would have had if the true statute had been timeously put forward. If he had by a proper defence been made to realize that his action was out of time not because although he had suffered all the penalties of lunacy he was still to be regarded as sane, but because it was commenced too late after his escape, he might never have persisted in it at all. I cannot myself doubt that the appellant has at all events prosecuted this appeal mainly if not wholly by reason of the intolerable position, as he regarded it, in which the statute of James as interpreted below appeared to place him. To deprive the respondent of the costs of the appeal only would therefore appear to be not ungenerous to him.

My Lords, as will be seen, the appellant gains little by this finding in his favour. But other plaintiffs in his position may gain much. The view I have presented to your Lordships may be wrong. But if it is, a very serious state of things is thereby disclosed. For it results that section 331, prescribing a period of limitation at least as old as the Act of 1845 and sensible and fair in its operation has been repealed by a general Act with no corresponding provision substituted, and with the result that plaintiffs in the position of the appellant are now, for the first time as I think, relegated to the statute of James which is, as I hope I have shown, entirely inappropriate to their case. If this appeal fulfils no other useful purpose, it will at least have served to draw the attention of those engaged in the amendment of the Lunacy Laws to a matter which is not unworthy of their consideration.

VISCOUNT SUMNER.—My Lords, I desire to say that my noble and learned friend Lord Wrenbury concurs in the judgment which I have already read and in the motion about to be proposed.

WOOLWICH CORPORATION v. ROBERTS.*

Local Government—Wages paid by borough council—Auditor's finding that wages were excessive—Surcharge—Discretion of council—Whether absolute—Requirement of reasonableness—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 120), s. 62.

In 1920 the Fulham conference of representatives of metropolitan borough councils recommended a scheme for a scale of wages to be adopted by such councils, and the appellants, the Woolwich Borough Council, adopted the scheme for employees other than those whose wages were regulated by trade union rates. The scheme established a minimum rate for the lowest grade of employees, and it did not provide for any sliding scale if any difference should arise in the cost of living. The Joint Industrial Council recommended another scheme which did provide a sliding scale according as the cost of living went up or down. The appellants then adopted the Industrial Council's scale, subject to this, that if it fell below the Fulham scale they adopted the latter. In 1924 the payments were greater than if the Industrial Council's scale had been strictly adhered to, and the district auditor surcharged upon the appellants those parts of the wage payments which were more than 12½ per cent. in excess of the Industrial Council's scale, the 12½ per cent. being allowed by him in respect of the appellant council's discretion in the matter. The appellant council obtained a rule nisi to quash the surcharge on the ground that under s. 62 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, they had a right to pay such wages as they might think fit.

Held, that the discretion conferred by the Act must be a reasonable discretion, and the district auditor was entitled to hold the wages payments to be so excessive as to make it his duty to interfere, and the rule nisi must be discharged.

Roberts v. Hopwood (41 The Times L.R., 436; [1925] A.C., 578) followed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (90 J.P., 197) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (90 J.P., 197) affirming an order of the Divisional Court, which discharged an order nisi, obtained by the appellants, for a writ of certiorari directing the removal into the King's Bench Division, for the purpose of being quashed, of certain disallowances and surcharges made by the respondent as district auditor on November 5, 1925.

The disallowances amounted to £8,000 and covered the wage charges included in the accounts of the appellant council for the year ending March 31, 1924, and the surcharges related to the same matters. The items disallowed were those parts of the wage payments made by the council in the year 1923-24, which were more than 12½ per cent. in excess of the standard rates as recommended by the awards issued by the Joint Industrial (or Whitley) Council for the Administrative County of London and applicable to manual workers employed by local authorities. No disallowance was made in respect of the wages paid to the manual workers in technical grades as the appropriate trade union awards were followed in settling the amounts of these payments.

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The amount paid in excess of the Joint Industrial Council awards came to £18,473 during the year. That was reduced to £8,000 (i.) by deducting the 12½ per cent. margin allowed for the council's discretion in the matter; (ii.) by disregarding all payments which were less than 3s. a week in excess of that margin; and (iii.) by giving the council the benefit of the doubt in any question arising in connexion with the grading of the workmen.

In 1919 the Fulham Borough Council convened a conference to which all the Metropolitan borough councils were invited to send representatives. The conference met in January, 1920, when representatives from 22 of the Metropolitan boroughs were present. At that meeting the conference, after full inquiry, agreed upon a scheme of grading and wages which they recommended for adoption by all Metropolitan borough councils.

In May, 1920, the appellant council adopted a scale of minimum rates of wages for such of their employees as were not engaged in any trade to which a trade union rate of wages applied. These minimum rates were arrived at by adopting the scheme recommended by the Fulham Conference, which was based upon a minimum wage of £3 10s. 6d. per week for the lowest grade of employees (called grade "A" employees). During the whole of the year in respect of which the disallowances and surcharges were made, this minimum rate was paid to grade "A" employees.

The respondent contended that the wage payments of the council in the year in question were so excessive as to make it his duty to interfere and that the wages disallowed were illegal and ultra vires.

The appellant council contended that the discretion vested in them by section 62 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, was not limited to the payment of such wages as the district auditor might consider necessary or reasonable and that, in the circumstances, the wages in fact paid by the council were lawfully paid in the honest and bona fide exercise of that discretion.

The Divisional Court (the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Shearman, and Mr. Justice Roche) were of opinion that this case was concluded by Roberts v. Hopwood (the Poplar case) (41 The Times L.R., 436; [1925] A.C., 578) and Roberts v. Cunningham (the Bethnal Green case) (42 The Times L.R., 162) and discharged the rule nisi. That decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Atkin, and Lord Justice Sargant).

Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Arthur H. Davis appeared for the appellants. The respondent, who appeared in person, was not called upon to argue.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, This is an appeal against a judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of the Divisional Court which discharged an order for a certiorari which had been obtained against a surcharge which had been made by the district auditor against the Mayor and Councillors of Woolwich and certain individual parties who were members of the council in respect of overcharges in their accounts of the year ending March 31, 1924. The case has to do with payments made to employees other than those employees whose wages were regulated by trade union rates.

Now the payments made to employees by these borough councils are made according to various grades, but the real question that arises in this case is as to the payment made to the lowest grade. In 1919 there was a conference of various borough councils, known as the Fulham Conference, and that Fulham Conference recommended a scale of payments also drawn up according to grades, but it had what I may call two peculiarities. In the first place it established an absolute minimum for the lowest grade of £3 10s. 6d., and, in the second place, it did not provide for any sliding scale if there should ensue a difference in the cost of living. It only purported to deal with the year 1920, and, therefore, what may appear, especially in the last matter, a lacuna, might really, if things had remained unchanged, not be found out to be a lacuna, because it might have met again and dealt with the question of the differences in cost of living if such differences had occurred in fact. That scheme was adopted by the Woolwich Council on May 12, 1920. The history of the payment of the lowest grade in the employment of the Woolwich Council was this: What may be called the pre-war payment was £1 10s.; in 1915 it was raised to £1 12s.; and then, as living got dearer and dearer, it was raised again and again till, on the eve of May 12, 1920, it was £3 3s. 6d. Of course, the result of adopting the Fulham scale was that it was raised to £3 10s. 6d. But on June 8, 1920, there was another body which met, known as the Industrial Council, and they suggested a general scale for the payment of this class of persons by boroughs. Their scale was rather differently arranged from the Fulham scale, because in particular it provided for a sliding scale according as the cost of living went up and down. On July 14, 1920, the Woolwich Council "adopted," as they called it—because undoubtedly I think it is something very like a misnomer—the Industrial Council's scale. Their idea of adoption was to say this: "When the Industrial Council's scale provides better terms than the Fulham scale we take it, but if, owing to its sliding scale, it goes below the minimum of the Fulham scale then we do not take it, but we stay by the Fulham scale." The result of that in history was this: Immediately after that the cost of living began to rise and, in accordance with their view, they took the Industrial Council's scale, with the result that in February, 1921, the minimum wage had risen to £4 8s. 6d. Then times changed and the cost of living began to fall, and in February, 1922, the Industrial Council's scale of rates had fallen to exactly what the minimum Fulham scale would give, and though it went on falling, of course, under their resolution, there the payments stuck; and, when we come to the year with which the auditor has dealt, the actual payment made by the borough council of Woolwich was 11s. 4d. greater than that payment which would have been made if the Industrial Council scale had been exactly followed. What the district auditor has done is this: He has not for one moment surcharged that whole amount; he has only surcharged 3s. 11d. of it, and 7s. 5d. of it he has left alone. The way he arrived at it was that he began from the scale as it had been calculated according to the Industrial Council and then he allowed a 12½ per cent. increase, but the result, of course, has been that there is a surcharge to the amount of 3s. 11d. and that surcharge in toto arrives at the very substantial sum of £8,000.

As your Lordships are well aware, the law on this matter was finally disposed of in your Lordships' House by the case of Roberts v. Hopwood (41 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1925] A.C., 578), generally known as the Poplar case. By section 62 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, a metropolitan borough council, as the successors of the Board of Works, shall employ such servants as may be necessary and may allow to such servants such wages as the council may think fit. It was argued in that case—and it received the sanction of the opinion of Lord Justice Atkin, although I think he was the only Judge of the five Judges who had to do with it who came to that opinion—that that was an absolute right and that, whatever they fixed, it could not be touched. But the judgment of this House was not that. The judgment of this House was that although there was a discretion it must be a reasonable discretion, and, if it was found that the wages actually paid were not reasonable in the whole circumstances of the case, then it was the duty of the district auditor to surcharge.

Now the argument of the Woolwich Council in this case is this : The Industrial Council's scale had a sentence in it in these words : "Existing privileges to continue. Nothing contained in the wages scheme shall operate to reduce the present wages of any employee in a borough where better conditions prevail" ; and they say the result of that is : "We introduced the Industrial Council's scale and with it, of course, that proviso. At the moment of so introducing the Industrial scale we had adopted the Fulham scale and, therefore, the result of that clause is to continue the Fulham scale wherever it is better than the Industrial scale ; and obviously it is better if it has a fixed minimum below which you never can get, whereas the Industrial Council's scale says you can get below any particular figure if the cost of living alters." The first remark I should like to make upon it is that I think really that is a thoroughly wrong way of looking at the whole question. Neither the Fulham scale nor the Industrial Council's scale has any real authority. They have no statutory authority, and they have no authority of any kind. They operate as a practical guide when you are going to say what is a reasonable payment, and I have no doubt whatsoever that, if in 1920 (as they did) the Woolwich Council paid what was recommended by the Fulham scale, it would have been held in 1920 that that was a reasonable payment. But that is a perfectly different thing from saying that you really can settle this question by the terms of these reservations in these two documents. What the auditor in this case has found is that, with the reduced cost of living staring them in the face, they went on paying wages far in excess of the amount for which the Industrial Council's scale would have shown a justification. In making the argument that they do—namely, that that saving clause kept on the Fulham scale, they seem to me to do two things that are wrong. In the first place they necessarily assume that the Fulham minimum was a minimum for all time. The Fulham Conference did not say so, and I do not suppose that if the Fulham Conference had been asked they would ever have replied that it was meant to be a minimum for all time. But beyond that, and quite beyond that—and this is quite enough—if, as a matter of fact, a payment is unreasonable it does not make it reasonable because you label it "Fulham payment."

Therefore, my Lords, upon the whole matter I come, without the slightest hesitation, to think that the district auditor here has really been very merciful to the borough council in what he has done, because he has made a very large allowance, and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed.

LORD ATKINSON.—My Lords, I concur.

LORD WRENBURY.—My Lords, I concur. I think the case is entirely covered by the principles adopted by this House in the Poplar case, Roberts v. Hopwood (41 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1925] A.C., 578), and the only matter which has struck my mind is the extraordinarily moderate amount at which, it seems to me, the district auditor has surcharged Woolwich.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—My Lords, I concur. I would only add these two remarks : First, it may be reasonable to take the scale recommended by the Joint Industrial Council as a measure of wages, but to except the rate prevailing in a particular borough from that scale does not make the excepted rate reasonable. Secondly, it seems sometimes to be forgotten that the council of a borough is not the employer. It is only the steward of the ratepayers and inhabitants and must act as a faithful steward.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords, I concur.

IN RE RYDER AND STEADMAN'S CONTRACT.*

Law of Property—New legislation—Transitional provisions—Undivided shares—Entirely subject to jointure rentcharge—Settled land—Statutory trusts—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), Schedule I., Part IV., par. 1 (2), (3)—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 18), s. 1 (1).

The expression "not being settled land" in the Law of Property Act, 1925, First Schedule, Part IV., paragraph 1, sub-paragraph (2), and the expression "settled land" in the next sub-paragraph, indicate whether the land is or is not settled immediately before the coming into force of that Act. Therefore where on December 31, 1925, three persons were tenants in common of Blackacre, subject to a jointure rentcharge, but with an indemnity in respect of the same, they were, on January 1, 1926, entitled to sell Blackacre as joint tenants holding upon the statutory trusts within the meaning of sub-paragraph (2).

Decision of Astbury, J. ([1927] 1 Ch., 509), reversed.

The facts of this appeal from Mr. Justice Astbury's decision upon a vendor and purchaser summons appear from the judgment, but may be summarized as follows :—

By a conveyance dated April 14, 1924, the Duke of Marlborough and the Marquess of Blandford appointed Blackacre, part of their family estates, to three persons (hereinafter called the vendors) as tenants in common in fee simple subject to a rentcharge for a jointure payable to the Marchioness of Blandford, but with the benefit of a covenant by the Duke to pay the same, and an indemnity. On February 13, 1926, the vendors contracted to sell to a purchaser, subject to the jointure, but with the benefit of the indemnity. The purchaser contended that on January 1, 1926, owing to the existence of the charge for the jointure, Blackacre became settled land under the Settled Land Act, 1925, section 1 (1) (v), and was therefore "settled land" within the meaning of the Law of Property Act, 1925, First Schedule, Part IV., paragraph 1 (3), and that therefore the trustees of the Marlborough settlement were the persons to convey. The vendors contended that Blackacre was not settled land on January 1, 1926, as it was not settled land "immediately before the commencement of this Act," within the meaning of the opening words of Part IV., and that therefore they held as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts under the provisions of paragraph 1, sub-paragraph (2) of Part IV., and could make title as such. Mr. Justice Astbury took the view put forward by the purchaser.

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vendors appealed.

Mr. Farwell, K.C., and Mr. Walter Banks appeared for the appellants; Mr. Hubert Rose for the respondent.

The arguments and material sections of the Acts of 1925 appear in the judgments.

The following considered judgments were delivered.

The Master of the Rolls.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury given on February 17, 1927, upon a vendor and purchaser summons, taken out by the vendors, for a declaration that a requisition made on behalf of the purchaser had been sufficiently answered, and a good title shown. By a conveyance on sale dated April 14, 1924, the Duke of Marlborough and his eldest son, under their powers, appointed Blackacre to the three vendors in fee simple as tenants in common in equal shares, subject to the jointure charged upon certain freehold estates including Blackacre, but with an indemnity therefor. By a contract dated February 13, 1926, the three vendors agreed to sell Blackacre to the purchaser, subject to the jointure, but with the benefit of the indemnity, so that the price was not affected by the jointure.

The vendors contended that on January 1, 1926, the date when the Settled Land Act, 1925, and the Trustee Act, 1925, and the Law of Property Act, 1925, came into operation, Blackacre vested in them as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts for sale under Schedule I., Part IV., paragraph 1 (2), of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and that they were now the estate owners with power to convey, subject to the jointure, and to give a proper receipt for the purchase money. The arguments for and against this contention are set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury ([1927] 1 Ch., 509), where the facts are also fully stated. Mr. Justice Astbury decided against the vendor's contention, and they appeal. The question for this Court is what is the true construction to be placed upon certain clauses in Schedule I., Part IV., of the Law of Property Act, 1925. This is the first case in which the construction of that Act, and of its concomitant Acts, has come before this Court. The three Acts are interconnected not only by the subject-matter to which they relate, but also by the definition clauses contained in them.

It is obvious that the terms of these three Acts, embodied in a total of 400 sections, and 14 schedules, not to mention other relevant Acts which came into operation on the same day, must give rise to a number of problems in conveyancing and in the law under which property is held and dealt with. The Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, which makes amendments in these three Acts, adds its testimony to this statement. These problems must now be determined by the rules of law applicable to the interpretation of statutes. They cannot be solved by reliance upon the opinions of able writers of text books yet living, or of those who have been closely and devotedly identified with the passage of this legislation through Parliament. Such persons may be expected to know what was the original intention of the Bill introduced into Parliament, and what was the purpose and design of later amendments; but words in the statute must be considered and construed as they stand, even if that construction may involve subsequent difficulties, or even hardship, in cases that are conceived as possible to arise. "A sense of the possible injustice of legislation ought not to induce your Lordships to do violence to well settled rules of construction, though it may properly lead to the selection of one rather than the other of two possible interpretations of the enactment." See per Lord Herschell in Arrow Shipping Company v. Tyne Improvement Commissioners (10 The Times L.R., 551; [1894] A.C., 508, at p. 516). It may, however, be observed that Mr. Justice Astbury says of the construction of the Act adopted by him: "There is no doubt that in this particular case the Acts have worked a very serious hardship on the vendors."
